

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

ESTABLISHMENT OF MILITARY JUSTICE—PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF THE ARTICLES OF WAR.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 2, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to the call of the chairman, in the room of the Committee on Appropriations, at 1.30 o'clock p. m., Senator Francis E. Warren presiding.

Present, Senators Warren (chairman), Lenroot, and Chamberlain.

The bill under consideration by the subcommittee is here printed in full as follows:

S. 64. A BILL To establish military justice.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this act shall be known as the military justice act, and the articles included in this section shall be known as the Army articles and shall at all times and in all places govern the Army of the United States.

I. PRELIMINARY PROVISIONS.

ART. 1. DEFINITIONS.—The following words when used in these articles shall be construed in the sense indicated in this article, unless the context shows that a different sense is intended, namely:

- (a) The word "officer" shall be construed to refer to a commissioned officer;
- (b) The word "soldier" shall be construed as including a noncommissioned officer, a private, or any other enlisted man;
- (c) The word "company" shall be understood as including a troop or battery; and
- (d) The word "battalion" shall be understood as including a squadron.

ART. 2. PERSONS SUBJECT TO MILITARY LAW.—The following persons are subject to these articles and shall be understood as included in the term "any person subject to military law," or "persons subject to military law," whenever used in these articles: Provided, That nothing contained in this act, except as specifically provided in this article, shall be construed to apply to any person under the United States naval jurisdiction, unless specifically provided by law.

(a) All members of the military forces of the United States, including all officers and soldiers belonging to the Regular Army, all cadets of the United States Military Academy, all members of the Army Nurse Corps, and all contract surgeons, all volunteers from the dates of their muster or acceptance into the military service of the United States, and all other persons lawfully called, drafted, or ordered, into, or to duty or for training in, the said service, from the dates they are required by the terms of the call, draft, or order to obey the same; and all officers of the Marine Corps when detached for service with the armies of the United States by order of the President: Provided, That an officer or soldier of the Marine Corps when so detached may be tried by military court-martial for an offense committed against the laws for the government of the naval service prior to his detachment, and for an offense committed against these articles he may be tried by a naval court-martial after such detachment ceases; and all other persons who now are or may hereafter be made members of the Military Establishment by law;

(b) All retainers to the camp and all persons accompanying or serving with the armies of the United States without the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, and in time of war all such retainers and persons accompanying or serving with the armies of the United States in the field, both within and without the territorial jurisdiction of the United States though not otherwise subject to these articles;

(c) All persons under sentence adjudged by courts-martial.

II. COURTS-MARTIAL.

ART. 3. COURTS-MARTIAL CLASSIFIED.—Courts-martial shall be of three kinds, hereinafter designated and hereafter to be known as—

General courts;
Special courts; and Summary courts.

A. COMPOSITION.

ART. 4. WHO MAY SERVE ON COURTS-MARTIAL.—All officers and soldiers in the military service of the United States and officers and soldiers of the Marine Corps when detached for service with the Army by order of the President, shall be competent to serve on general and special courts, and all such officers shall be competent to serve on summary courts for the trial of any persons who may lawfully be brought before such courts for trial, except as may be hereinafter otherwise provided.

ART. 5. GENERAL COURTS.—General courts shall consist of eight members, three of whom in the case of the trial of a private soldier shall be privates, and in the case of the trial of a noncommissioned officer or warrant officer shall be noncommissioned or warrant officers, respectively.

ART. 6. SPECIAL COURTS.—Special courts shall consist of three members, one of whom in the case of the trial of a private soldier shall be a private, and in the case of the trial of a noncommissioned or warrant officer shall be a noncommissioned or warrant officer, respectively.

ART. 7. SUMMARY COURTS.—A summary court shall consist of one officer who shall be the officer of the command deemed by the appointing authority best qualified therefor by reason of rank, experience, and judicial temperament.

B. BY WHOM APPOINTED.

ART. 8. GENERAL COURTS.—The President of the United States, the commanding officer of a territorial division or department, the superintendent of the Military Academy, the commanding officer of an Army corps, a tactical division, or of any isolated body of troops consisting of a regiment or more which, by reason of delay and difficulty of communication with it, the President shall find it necessary to constitute a separate general court jurisdiction, may appoint general courts; but when the organization of the forces is such as to justify such a course the President may direct that any commanding officer herein named shall not exercise such power.

ART. 9. SPECIAL COURTS.—The commanding officer of a district, a brigade, a regiment, or any isolated body of troops consisting of a battalion or more, which superior authority may deem it necessary to constitute a separate special court jurisdiction, or authority superior to such commanding officer, when deemed desirable by him so to do, may appoint special courts; but superior authority may convene a special court for the trial of a member of any isolated body of troops less than a battalion when in any particular case it is found by him to be necessary; and such superior authority, when the organization of the forces is such as to justify such a course, may direct that any commanding officer herein named shall not exercise such power.

ART. 10. GENERAL AND SPECIAL COURTS, HOW ORGANIZED.—The appointing authority of a general or special court shall designate a panel, which he shall increase as may be found necessary, consisting of those who are by him deemed fair and impartial and competent to try the cases to be brought before them, and from such panel the court shall be constituted, as hereinafter provided.

ART. 11. SUMMARY COURTS.—The commanding officer of a regiment or of any detachment of troops may appoint summary courts, but such summary courts may in any case be appointed by superior authority when by the latter deemed desirable. When but one officer is present with the command, he shall be the summary court of that command.

ART. 12. APPOINTMENT OF COURT JUDGE ADVOCATES.—The authority appointing a general or a special court shall appoint for the court a judge advocate. No person shall be appointed judge advocate for a general court unless at the time of his appointment he is an officer of the Judge Advocate General's Department, except that when an officer of that department is not available the appointing authority shall appoint an officer recommended by the Judge Advocate General of the Army as specially qualified by reason of legal learning and experience to act as judge advocate, and the officer appointed as judge advocate of a special court may be an officer of the Judge Advocate General's Department if such an officer is available, and whenever such officer is not available the appointing authority shall select that available officer of his command whom he deems best qualified therefor by reason of legal learning or aptitude and judicial temperament. The judge advocate shall not be a member of the court, but shall sit with it at all times in open session and shall fairly, impartially, and in a judicial manner perform the following duties and such others not inconsistent herewith as may be prescribed by the President in virtue of article 41:

- (a) To organize the court from those on or added to the panel designated by the appointing authority for the purpose;
- (b) Rule upon all questions of law properly arising in the proceedings, including challenges and questions touching the competency and impartiality of the court;
- (c) Advise the court and convening authority of any legal deficiency in the constitution and composition of the court or in the charge before it for trial;
- (d) At the conclusion of the case and before the court proceeds to deliberate upon the findings, sum up the evidence in the case and discuss the law applicable to it, unless both he and the court consider it unnecessary;
- (e) Take care that the accused does not suffer any disadvantage in consequence of his position as such, or of his ignorance or incapacity, and for that purpose the judge advocate may call and examine such witnesses as may appear to him necessary or desirable to elicit the truth;
- (f) Approve a finding of guilty and approve only so much of a finding of guilty of a particular offense as involves a finding of guilty of a lesser included offense, when as a matter of law the evidence of record requires such action; and such action shall be held to be the action of the court;
- (g) Announce the findings of the court-martial and upon conviction of the accused impose sentence upon him;
- (h) Suspend in whole or in part any sentence that does not extend to death or dismissal.

His rulings and advice given in the performance of his duties and made of record shall govern the court-martial. If the judge advocate dies, or from illness or any cause whatever is unable to attend, the court shall adjourn and another judge advocate or law member shall be appointed by the proper authority, who shall act for the residue of the trial or until the judge advocate or law member returns.

C. JURISDICTION.

ART. 31. GENERAL COURTS.—General courts shall have power to try any persons subject to military law for any crime or offense for which the punishment prescribed by these articles involves death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge, and any other person who by the law of war is subject to trial by a military tribunal: Provided, That no officer shall be brought to trial before a general court appointed by the Superintendent of the Military Academy.

ART. 14. SPECIAL COURTS.—Special courts shall have power to try any person subject to military law for any crime or offense not capital made punishable by these articles, and any other person who by the law of war is subject to trial by a military tribunal; but special courts shall not have power to adjudge death, dismissal, loss of files, dishonorable discharge, confinement for more than six months, or any other penalty which under article 48 may not be imposed in lieu or in addition to confinement for six months or less.

ART. 15. SUMMARY COURTS.—Summary courts shall have power to try any person subject to military law except an officer, a cadet, or a soldier holding the privileges of a certificate of eligibility to promotion, for any crime or offense for which the punishment authorized by these articles does not involve death or dishonorable discharge; but summary courts shall not have power to adjudge confinement for more than one month, nor restriction to limits for more than three months, nor forfeiture or detention of pay for more than three months.

ART. 16. NOT EXCLUSIVE.—The provisions of these articles conferring jurisdiction upon courts shall not be construed as depriving military commissions, provost courts, or other military tribunals of concurrent jurisdiction in respect of offenders or offenses that by statute or by the law of war may be triable by such military commissions, provost courts, or other military tribunals.

ART. 17. OFFICERS—HOW TRIABLE.—In no case shall an officer when it can be avoided be tried by officers inferior to him in rank.

D. PROCEDURE.

ART. 18. PREFERRING CHARGES.—No charge shall be preferred for trial before a general or special court unless it shall be signed by a person subject to military law who shall make oath that he has actual personal knowledge as to the truth of the matters set forth in said charge and that the same are true in substance and in fact, or who in case he has not such personal knowledge shall make oath that he has personally investigated the matters set forth in said charge and that the same are true, in substance and in fact, to the best of his knowledge and belief.

ART. 19. REFERRING AND FORWARDING CHARGES FOR TRIAL.—No officer with authority to appoint a special court shall refer any charge to such court for trial nor shall any commanding officer charged with such duty forward any charge to an officer having authority to appoint general courts until he shall have made or caused to be made a thorough investigation as to the truth of the matter set forth in the charge, and he shall not refer such charge for trial unless he believes that the charge can be sustained and in the interests of the service and of justice can not be disposed of without trial, nor shall such officer forward any charge to any appointing authority of a general court until he shall have made or caused to be made a thorough investigation as to the truth of the matters set forth in said charge, in which he shall hear whatever the accused may desire to say in his own behalf and any available witnesses requested by the accused, and in so forwarding any charge he shall accompany it with statements of the substance of the testimony taken on both sides during the investigation and all other evidence, including such statement, if any, as the accused may have voluntarily made during the investigation.

ART. 20. CHARGE MUST BE LEGALLY SUFFICIENT.—No charge shall be referred to or be tried by a general court unless an officer of the Judge Advocate General's Department charged with such duty shall have indorsed in writing upon the charge that in his opinion an offense made punishable by these articles is charged with legal sufficiency against the accused and that it has been made to appear to him that there is prima facie proof that the accused is guilty of the offense charged, nor unless the officer referring the charge believes that in the interests of the service and of justice the charge can not be disposed of except by trial by general court-martial.

ART. 21. APPOINTMENT OF PROSECUTORS.—For each general or special court the appointing authority shall appoint a prosecutor and for each general court one or more assistant prosecutors, when necessary, each of whom shall be competent to perform all the duties of the prosecutor. The prosecutor shall prosecute in the name of the United States. Such prosecutor may be an officer of the Judge Advocate General's Department, and if such an officer be not available, the prosecutor shall, whenever practicable, be an officer or enlisted man deemed by the appointing authority specially qualified for the duty by reason of learning in or aptitude for the law.

ART. 22. RIGHT OF COUNSEL.—In all court proceedings, except a summary court, the accused shall have the assistance of and be represented by military counsel of his own selection, and he may have the like assistance of civil counsel if he so provides. Such civil counsel shall be civilian lawyers and such military counsel shall be officers or soldiers; and any officer or soldier under command of the appointing authority who shall be selected by the accused shall be assigned as counsel unless the appointing authority shall furnish the court with a certificate which shall be placed in the record that such assignment can not be made without serious injury to the service and setting forth the reasons therefor. If military counsel be not selected by the accused, the appointing authority shall assign as military counsel to assist in his defense an officer who is well qualified as to rank and experience in the service and who has, if any such there be within the command, special learning in or aptitude for the law.

In any case before a general court in which the accused is without civil counsel and in which he shall make it appear to the judge advocate that he needs, but is without available means to procure, the assistance of civil counsel, the judge advocate shall employ civil counsel, wherever it is practicable so to do, and fix the amount of compensation for his services, which shall be paid out of any funds available for the purpose; and if the trial shall result in a lawful conviction, the judge advocate may order that the Government be reimbursed by a stoppage of such amount, or any part thereof, against the pay of accused at the rate of two-thirds of his monthly pay until the amount ordered stopped be paid.

ART. 23. CHALLENGES.—An accused before a general court shall have the right to two peremptory challenges and before a special court to one peremptory challenge; and he shall have the right to challenge members of a general or special court for cause stated, which shall include the grounds for principal challenge and challenge to the favor as recognized at common law. If the accused shall file in the proceedings an affidavit of prejudice, accompanied by a certificate of counsel of record that such affidavit is made in good faith, alleging specific grounds to show that the officer appointing the court has bias or prejudice against him or that the court, by reason of any matter touching its constitution or composition can not do justice, the court shall proceed no further until the judge advocate shall decide whether it is able to proceed with absolute impartiality in the pending case, and if he decides that the court can not proceed with absolute impartiality the court shall not be competent for the trial of the pending case, and he shall report to the appointing authority; thereupon the next superior authority may appoint a court for the trial of said case. And whenever an accused shall file a like affidavit alleging bias or prejudice of the judge advocate, such judge advocate shall proceed no further in the case, but another shall be appointed.

ART. 24. OATHS.—The judge advocate of the court shall administer to the members of the court, before they proceed upon any trial, the following oath or affirmation:

"You and each of you do swear (or affirm) that you will well and truly try and determine according to the evidence the matter now before you between the United States of America and the person to be tried, and that you will duly administer justice without respect to the rank or position of the person to be tried or of any other person, and without partiality, favor, or affection, according to the law and the evidence, to the best of your understanding; and you and each of you do further swear (or affirm) that you will not divulge the findings or sentence of the court until they shall be announced in open court. Neither will you disclose or discover the vote or opinion of any particular member of the court unless required to give evidence thereon as a witness by a court of justice in due course of law, so help you God."

When the oath of affirmation has been administered to the members, the president of the court shall administer to the judge advocate an oath or affirmation in the following form:

"You do solemnly swear (or affirm) that you will administer justice without respect to the rank or position of the person to be tried or of any other person, and that you will faithfully and impartially discharge and perform all the duties incumbent upon you, according to the best of your abilities and understanding and agreeably to law, so help you God."

And the judge advocate of the court shall then administer to the prosecutor, and to each assistant prosecutor, if any, an oath or affirmation in the following form:

"You, A B, do swear (or affirm) that you will faithfully, fairly, and to the best of your ability perform your duties as prosecutor (or as assistant prosecutor) before this court, so help you God."

All persons who give evidence before a court-martial shall be examined on oath or affirmation in the following form:

"You swear (or affirm) that the evidence you shall give in the case now in hearing shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help you God."

Every reporter of the proceedings of a court-martial shall, before entering upon his duties, make oath or affirmation in the following form:

"You swear (or affirm) that you will faithfully perform the duties of reporter to this court, so help you God."

Every interpreter, in the trial of any case before a court-martial, shall before entering upon his duties make oath or affirmation in the following form:

"You swear (or affirm) that you will truly interpret in the case now in hearing, so help you God."

In case of affirmation, the closing sentence of adjuration will be omitted. The oath of a witness, reporter, and interpreter will be administered by the judge advocate of a general or special court-martial or by the summary court-martial.

ART. 25. CONTINUANCES.—The judge advocate of a court may for reasonable cause grant a continuance to either party for such time and as often as may appear to be just.

ART. 26. REFUSAL OR FAILURE TO PLEAD.—When an accused arraigned before a court fails or refuses to plead, or answers foreign to the purpose, or after a plea of guilty makes a statement inconsistent with the plea, or makes a plea of guilty improvidently or through lack of understanding of its meaning and effect, the judge advocate of the court or the summary court shall direct that a plea of not guilty be entered, and the court shall thereupon proceed accordingly.

ART. 27. PROCESS TO OBTAIN WITNESSES.—Every judge advocate of a court and every summary court shall have power to issue the like process to compel witnesses to appear and testify which courts of the United States having criminal jurisdiction may lawfully issue; but such process shall run to any part of the United States, its Territories and possessions and such judge advocate or summary court shall give notice to such persons subject to military law as may appear to be necessary as witnesses for the Government and for the defense to appear and testify at a certain time and place, and such persons so notified shall immediately make application for the necessary orders enabling them to appear at the time and place specified; and the said judge advocate or summary court shall subpoena such number of civilian witnesses on behalf of the Government and of the defense as may appear to be necessary and material, and the fees of which witnesses for the accused shall be paid by the Government and in the same manner as its witnesses: Provided, That the accused makes application under oath before the trial or, in case of necessity, during the trial, setting forth the names of such witnesses and what he expects to prove by them, in order that the judge advocate or summary court may be advised whether or not the testimony be material to the issue.

ART. 28. REFUSAL TO APPEAR OR TESTIFY.—Every person not subject to military law who, being duly subpoenaed to appear as a witness before any court, commission, court of inquiry, or board, or before any officer, military or civil, designated to take a deposition to be read in evidence before such court, commission, court of inquiry, or board, willfully neglects or refuses to appear, or refuses to qualify as a witness, or to testify, or produce documentary evidence which such person may have been legally subpoenaed to produce, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, for which such person shall be punished on information in the district court of the United States or in a court of original criminal jurisdiction in any of the territorial possessions of the United States, jurisdiction being hereby conferred upon such courts for such purpose; and it shall be the duty of the United States district attorney or the officer prosecuting for the Government in any such court of original criminal jurisdiction, on the certification of the facts to him by the military court, commission, court of inquiry, or board, to file an information against and prosecute the person so offending, and the punishment of such person, on conviction, shall be a fine of not more than $500 or imprisonment not to exceed six months, or both, at the discretion of the court: Provided, That the fees of such witness and his mileage, at the rates allowed to witnesses attending the courts of the United States, shall be duly paid or tendered said witness, such amounts to be paid out of the appropriation for the compensation of witnesses.

ART. 29. COMPULSORY SELF-INCRIMINATION PROHIBITED.—No witness before a court, commission, court of inquiry, board, or before any officer conducting an investigation or any officer, military or civil, designated to take a deposition to be read in evidence before a court, commission, court of inquiry, or board, or officer conducting an investigation, shall be compelled to incriminate himself or to answer any question that may tend to incriminate him or to answer any question not material to the issue that tends to degrade him.

ART. 30. DEPOSITIONS—WHEN ADMISSIBLE.—A duly authenticated deposition taken upon reasonable notice to the opposite party may be read in evidence for the Government before any special or summary court or before any military commission in any case not capital, or in any proceeding before a court of inquiry or a military board, if such deposition be taken when the witness resides, is found, or is about to go beyond the State, Territory, or district in which the court, commission, or board is ordered to sit, or beyond the distance of one hundred miles from the place of trial or hearing, or when it appears to the satisfaction of the court, commission, board, or appointing authority that the witness, by reason of age, sickness, bodily infirmity, imprisonment, or other reasonable cause, is unable to appear and testify in person at the place of trial or hearing, but testimony by deposition may be adduced for the defense before all military tribunals and in all cases.

ART. 31. RESIGNATION WITHOUT ACCEPTANCE DOES NOT RELEASE OFFICER.—Any officer who, having tendered his resignation and prior to due notice of the acceptance of the same, quits his post or proper duties without leave and with intent to absent himself permanently therefrom shall be deemed a deserter.

ART. 32. CLOSED SESSIONS.—Whenever a general or special court shall sit in closed session, the judge advocate, the prosecutor, and the assistant prosecutor, if any, shall withdraw; and when the legal advice or assistance of the judge advocate is required, it shall be obtained in open court.

ART. 33. ORDER OF VOTING.—Members of a general or special court in giving their votes shall begin with the junior in rank.

ART. 34. ACCUSED IMMEDIATELY TO BE INFORMED OF ACQUITTAL.—When an accused is acquitted of all charges and specifications the court shall not reconsider nor be directed to reconsider its findings, but the judge advocate of the court of the summary court shall immediately inform the accused and the officer by whose authority he may be in custody, of his acquittal, and such officer shall thereupon immediately release the accused from custody unless he is in custody for reasons other than the pendency of the charges of which he has been acquitted.

ART. 35. CONTEMPTS.—A court may punish as for contempt any person who uses any menacing words, signs, or gestures in his presence, or who disturbs its proceedings by any riot or disorder, and any person lawfully called before it as a witness who refuses to qualify, or to testify, or to answer any question lawfully put to him: but such punishment shall in no case exceed that which may be awarded by a summary court-martial, and such punishment of a witness shall be a bar to prosecution for the same misconduct under article 28.

ART. 36. RECORDS—GENERAL COURTS.—Each general court shall keep a separate record of its proceedings in the trial of each case brought before it, which record shall be authenticated by the signature of the president and the judge advocate; but in case the record can not be authenticated by the judge advocate, by reason of his death, disability, or absence, it shall be signed by the president and one other member of the court.

ART. 37. RECORDS, SPECIAL AND SUMMARY COURTS.—Each special court and each summary court shall keep a record of its proceedings, separate for each case, which record shall contain such matter and be authenticated in such manner as may be required by regulations which the President may from time to time prescribe.

ART. 38. DISPOSITION OF RECORDS—GENERAL COURTS.—The judge advocate of each general court shall, with such expedition as circumstances may permit, forward the original record of the proceedings of such court in the trial of each case to the appointing authority or to his successor in command, who shall without delay transmit the same to the Judge Advocate General of the Army.

ART. 39. DISPOSITION OF RECORDS—SPECIAL AND SUMMARY COURTS.—The record of a special court or the report of a summary court shall be transmitted without delay to the officer appointing the court or to his successor in command, who shall transmit such record or report to such general headquarters as the President may designate in regulations. The judge advocate at such headquarters shall, with powers of review similar to those prescribed in article 52, review and revise all such records and reports for errors of law prejudicial to the accused. When no longer of use, the reports of summary courts may be destroyed.

ART. 40. IRREGULARITIES—EFFECT OF.—The proceedings of a court shall not be held invalid, nor the findings or sentence disapproved, in any case on the ground of improper admission or rejection of evidence or for any error as to any matter of pleading or procedure or for any other error of law unless after an examination of the entire proceedings it shall appear that the error complained of has injuriously affected the substantial rights of an accused.

ART. 41. RULES OF EVIDENCE TO GOVERN—RULES OF PROCEDURE.—Courts shall, except in so far as Congress has prescribed or may hereafter prescribe different rules especially applicable to such tribunals, apply the rules of evidence which are generally recognized in the trial of criminal cases in the district courts of the United States.

The President may from time to time prescribe rules not inconsistent with these articles to govern the procedure of all military tribunals, except the court of military appeals, and such rules shall be laid before the Congress annually.

E. LIMITATIONS UPON PROSECUTIONS.

ART. 42. AS TO TIME.—Except for desertion committed in time of war, or for murder or mutiny, no person subject to military law shall be liable to be tried or punished by a court for any crime or offense committed more than two years before the arraignment of such person: Provided, That for desertion in time of peace or for any crime or offense punishable under articles 82 and 95 of this code the period of limitations upon trial and punishment shall be three years: Provided further, That the period of any absence of the accused from the jurisdiction of the United States, and also any period during which by reason of some manifest impediment the accused shall not have been amenable to military justice, shall be excluded in computing the aforesaid periods of limitation: And provided further, That this article shall not have the effect to authorize the trial or punishment for any crime or offense barred by the provisions of existing law.

ART. 43. AS TO NUMBER.—No person shall be prosecuted for an offense for which he has once been tried, and a person shall be held to have been once tried when the proceedings in his case have resulted in a lawful sentence or whenever the Government, without his consent entered upon the record, withdraws the charge or otherwise discontinues the prosecution after the arraignment.

F. PUNISHMENTS.

ART. 44. CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENTS PROHIBITED.—Cruel and unusual punishments of every kind, including flogging, branding, marking, or tattooing on the body, are prohibited.

ART. 45. PLACE OF CONFINEMENT—WHEN LAWFUL.—When the accused has been convicted and sentenced to confinement for more than one year a penitentiary may be designated as the place of confinement in the following cases only:

(a) When confinement in a penitentiary is prescribed in these articles.

(b) When conviction is for a civil offense denounced by some statute of the United States or of the District of Columbia, or by the common law as the same exists in the District of Columbia and made punishable thereunder with confinement in a penitentiary for more than one year.

(c) When a sentence of death has been commuted to confinement in a penitentiary.

When the accused has been convicted of two or more offenses, any one of which is punishable with confinement in a penitentiary, the entire sentence to confinement may be executed in a penitentiary. Confinement in a penitentiary hereby authorized may be served in any penitentiary directly or indirectly under the jurisdiction of the United States. Persons sentenced to dishonorable discharge and to confinement not in a penitentiary shall be confined in the United States Disciplinary Barracks or elsewhere, as the Secretary of War or the authority executing the sentence may direct, but not in a penitentiary. Any sentence of confinement at hard labor, except confinement served in a penitentiary, may, when so ordered by proper authority, be served in any military unit that may be organized for penal servitude or in the performance of any work necessary in or incident to the Military Establishment, under such restrictions as proper authority may impose and with or without imprisonment.

ART. 46. NUMBER TO CONVICT—DEATH SENTENCES.—Conviction of an offense by a general court shall require the concurrence of three-fourths of the members, but no death penalty shall be imposed except for an offense in these articles expressly made punishable by death and when the finding of guilty is concurred in by all the members of the court or when the death penalty is mandatory. Conviction of an offense by a special court shall require the concurrence of two-thirds of the members of the court.

ART. 47. AMOUNT OF PAY FORFEITABLE.—In any sentence which does not include confinement in a penitentiary or in the disciplinary barracks a court shall not adjudge forfeiture or detention of pay at a rate greater than two-thirds of the pay per month.

ART. 48. PUNISHMENTS AUTHORIZED.—Whenever confinement for a period longer than six months is authorized by these articles as a punishment for an offense, the court may impose in lieu thereof, with or in addition thereto, any one or more of the following punishments:

(a) In case of an officer—

Dismissal;

Loss of files;

Suspension from rank, command, or duty, with or without pay or part of pay, for a period not in excess of the maximum authorized period of confinement;

Forfeiture of pay for a period not in excess of said period;

Hard labor for a period not in excess of said period;

Restriction to limits for a period not in excess of said period; and Reprimand.

(b) In the case of a soldier—

Dishonorable discharge;

Reduction to the ranks;

Forfeiture or detention of pay not in excess of the maximum authorized period of confinement;

Restriction to limits for a period not in excess of said period;

Hard labor for a period not in excess of said period.

Whenever the maximum period of confinement authorized by these articles is six months or less, the court may impose in lieu thereof or in addition thereto any of the above-mentioned punishments except dismissal, loss of files, and dishonorable discharge.

G. PROCEDURE AFTER TRIAL.

ART. 49. APPROVAL AND EXECUTION OF SENTENCE.—No sentence of death shall be carried into execution until approved upon review as prescribed in article 52 and, in addition, confirmed and ordered executed by the President, and no sentence of dismissal or dishonorable discharge shall be executed until approved upon review as prescribed in said article, and any death sentence when thus approved, confirmed, and ordered executed, and any sentence of dismissal or dishonorable discharge when thus approved will upon notification to him to that effect, be carried into execution by the officer appointing the court or by the officer commanding for the time being, or by any specially designated military authority, and every other sentence will be carried into execution upon the receipt of the record or report of the proceeding by the officer appointing the court or by the officer commanding for the time being, or by any specially designated military authority; but nothing herein contained shall operate to deprive any officer of the power of mitigation, remission, and suspension of sentence conferred upon him by article 50.

ART. 50. MITIGATION, REMISSION AND SUSPENSION OF SENTENCE.—Any officer having authority to appoint a court may mitigate, remit or suspend, in whole or in part, any sentence not extending to death or dismissal or not confirmed or commuted by the President that is being served by any person under his command and that was imposed by a court of a kind not higher than such officer is empowered to appoint, and may vacate said order of suspension at any time: Provided, That when a sentence of dishonorable discharge has been suspended the order of suspension shall be vacated only by authority of the Secretary of War, and no sentence of any person serving in the disciplinary barracks or any branch thereof or in any military unit organized for the purpose of penal servitude shall be suspended; mitigated, or remitted or, if suspended, be ordered executed, except by the authority of the Secretary of War, and the period during which a sentence of confinement is suspended shall be deemed a part of the sentence served.

The power of remission and mitigation shall extend to all uncollected forfeitures adjudged by sentence of a court, and the death or honorable discharge of a person under suspended sentence shall operate as a complete remission of any unexecuted or unremitted part of such sentence.

ART. 51. JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL TO RECEIVE RECORDS; COURT RECORDS ARE PUBLIC.—The Judge Advocate General of the Army shall receive and file the record of the proceedings of all general courts, courts of inquiry, and military commissions and shall immediately transmit to the court of military appeals the record of all proceedings which carry sentences involving death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge or confinement for a period of more than six months. The records of and reports upon the proceedings of all courts and military commissions, wherever filed, shall be public records and subject as such to public examination.

ART. 52. REVISION BY COURT OF MILITARY APPEALS.—There is hereby created a court of military appeals which, for convenience of administration only, shall be located in the Office of the Judge Advocate General, and which shall consist of three judges appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, each of whom shall be learned in the law, shall hold office during good behavior, and shall have the pay and emoluments, including the privilege of resignation and retirement upon pay, of a circuit judge of the United States. Unless the accused when sentence is pronounced upon him shall make the statement in open court that he does not desire that his case be reviewed by the court of military appeals, which statement shall be made a matter of record by the judge advocate, or unless he shall thereafter notify said court of appeals in writing that he does not wish his case reviewed, said court shall review the record of the proceedings of every general court or military commission which carries a sentence involving death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge or confinement for a period of more than six months, for the correction of errors of law evidenced by the record and injuriously affecting the substantial rights of an accused without regard to whether such errors were made the subject of objection or exception at the trial; and such power of review shall include the power—

- (a) To disapprove a finding of guilty and approve only so much of a finding of guilty of a particular offense as involves a finding of guilty of a lesser included offense.
- (b) To disapprove the whole or any part of a sentence.
- (c) To advise the proper convening or confirming authority of the further proceedings that may and should be had, if any, upon the disapproval of the whole of a sentence; and in any case in which all the findings and the sentence are disapproved because of such error of law in the proceedings the appointing authority may lawfully order a new trial by another court.
- (d) To make a report to the Secretary of War for transmission to the President, recommending clemency in any case in which the sentence, though valid, shall appear to the court to be unjust or unduly severe.

Said judges may select the presiding judge of the court and may prescribe its rules and procedure. In case any judge shall become temporarily incapacitated for the performance of his duties, the President at the request of the court may assign to duty upon the court a judge advocate deemed qualified for such duty who upon assignment and taking the oath of office shall have the power and shall perform the duties of a judge of said court; and the Judge Advocate General shall assign to duty with the court such officers, enlisted men and civilian employees in the Judge Advocate General's department as the court may find necessary for the thorough and expeditious performance of its duties.

Each judge before entering upon the duties of his office shall take the oath prescribed for the judge advocate of a general court.

And said court of military appeals shall have like jurisdiction to review and revise any sentence of death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge approved for any offense committed and tried since the 6th day of April, 1917, and any sentence of death, dismissal, or discharge in the case of any person now serving confinement as a result of such sentence, upon application to that end made by the accused within six months after the passage of this act: Provided, That in no case in which the sentence has heretofore been approved shall be tried again: And provided further, That the revision or reversal of the sentence in any such case shall not be effective to retain in the military service any person who has been dismissed or discharged therefrom in execution of such sentence thus reviewed, or to entitle any person to any pay or allowances, but shall be limited in its effect to the final determination that the separation from the service was honorable instead of dishonorable.

III. PUNITIVE ARTICLES.

A. ENLISTMENT; MUSTER; FALSE STATEMENTS.

ART. 53. FRAUDULENT ENLISTMENT.—Any person who shall procure himself to be enlisted in the military service of the United States by means of willful misrepresentation or concealment as to his qualifications for enlistment and shall receive pay or allowances under such enlistment, and any soldier who without having first received a regular discharge from the organization in which he last served enlists himself in another organization shall be guilty of fraudulent enlistment and shall be punishable with confinement for not more than six months.

ART. 54. FALSE MUSTER AND OFFICIAL STATEMENTS.—Any officer who makes a false muster, return, certificate, or official statement, in due course of military administration, knowing the same to be false and with intent to deceive, shall be dismissed the service, and in case the offense be committed in time of war, shall in addition be punishable with confinement for not more than ten years.

B. DESERTION; ABSENCE WITHOUT LEAVE.

ART. 55. DESERTION.—Any person subject to military law who quits the military service with the deliberate and fixed intent not to return to it, or who quits his organization or place of duty with the intent to avoid hazardous duty, shall be guilty of desertion and shall, if the offense be committed in time of war, be punishable with death or confinement for life or for a fixed period, and if the offense be committed in time of peace, by confinement for not more than two years. And any person subject to military law who attempts to desert shall be punishable with the punishment authorized for desertion.

ART. 56. ADVISING OR AIDING ANOTHER TO DESERT.—Any person subject to military law who advises or persuades or knowingly assists another to desert the service of the United States shall be punishable with the punishment authorized for desertion.

ART. 57. ENTERTAINING A DESERTER.—Any officer who, after having discovered that a soldier in his command is a deserter from the military or naval service or from the Marine Corps, retains such deserter in his command without informing superior authority or the commander of the organization to which the deserter belongs, shall be punishable with the punishment authorized for desertion.

ART. 58. ABSENCE WITHOUT LEAVE.—Any person subject to military law who fails to repair at the fixed time to the properly appointed place of duty or goes from the same without proper leave, or absents himself from his command, guard, quarters, station, or camp without proper leave for a period of not more than sixty days, shall be punishable with confinement for not more than six months, and if the absence without leave is for a period of more than sixty days, with confinement for not more than one year.

C. DISRESPECT; INSUBORDINATION; MUTINY.

ART. 59. DISRESPECT TOWARD THE PRESIDENT, VICE PRESIDENT; CONGRESS, SECRETARY OF WAR, GOVERNORS, LEGISLATURE.—Any person subject to military law who uses contemptuous or disrespectful words against the President, Vice President, the Congress, the Secretary of War, or the governor or legislature of any State, Territory, or other possession of the United States in which he is quartered, shall be punishable with confinement for not more than one year.

ART. 60. DISRESPECT TOWARD SUPERIOR OFFICER.—Any person subject to military law who behaves himself with disrespect toward his superior officer shall be punishable with confinement for not more than six months.

ART. 61. ASSAULTING SUPERIOR OFFICER.—Any person subject to military law who knowingly assaults or strikes his superior officer, being in the execution of his office, shall be punishable with confinement for not more than one year, in addition to the punishment authorized elsewhere in these articles to be imposed for assaulting or striking.

ART. 62. WILLFUL DISOBEDIENCE OF LAWFUL COMMAND.—Any person subject to military law who willfully and with intent to defy lawful authority disobeys any lawful command given to him by his superior officer, being in the execution of his office, whether the same is given orally or in writing or otherwise, shall be punishable with death or confinement for life or for a fixed period.

ART. 63. ASSAULTING NONCOMMISSIONED OFFICER.—Any soldier who assaults or strikes a noncommissioned officer, in the execution of his office, shall be punishable with confinement for not more than six months, in addition to the punishment authorized elsewhere in these articles to be imposed for the assault or striking.

ART. 64. DISOBEDIENCE OF ORDERS OF NONCOMMISSIONED OFFICER.—Any soldier who disobeys any lawful order of a noncommissioned officer, in the execution of his office, shall be punishable with confinement for not more than six months.

ART. 65. MUTINY.—Any person subject to military law who, in concert with another or others, unlawfully opposes, resists, or defies superior military authority, with the deliberate and fixed intent to usurp or subvert the same, shall be guilty of mutiny and shall be punishable with death or confinement for life or for a fixed period; and any person subject to military law who attempts to create or who begins, excites, causes or joins in any mutiny, shall be punishable with the punishment authorized for mutiny.

ART. 66. FAILURE TO SUPPRESS MUTINY.—Any officer or soldier who, being present at any mutiny, does not use his utmost endeavor to suppress the same or, knowing or having reason to believe that a mutiny is to take place, does not without delay give information thereof to his commanding officer shall be punishable with death or confinement for life or for a fixed period.

ART. 67. QUARRELS, FRAYS, AND DISORDERS.—All officers and noncommissioned officers have power to part and quell all quarrels, frays, and disorders among persons subject to military law and to order officers who take part in the same into arrest, and other persons subject to military law who take part in the same into arrest or confinement, as circumstances may require, until their proper superior officer is acquainted therewith, and whosoever, being so ordered, refuses to obey such officer or noncommissioned officer, draws a weapon upon or otherwise threatens or does violence to him shall be punishable with confinement for not more than one year.

D. ARREST; CONFINEMENT.

ART. 68. ARREST OR CONFINEMENT OF ACCUSED PERSONS.—An officer charged with crime or with a serious offense under these articles shall be placed in arrest by the commanding officer, and in exceptional cases an officer so charged may be placed in confinement by the same authority. A soldier charged with crime or with a serious offense under these articles shall be placed in confinement, and when charged with a minor offense he may be placed in arrest. Any person subject to military law, except an officer or a soldier, charged with crime or with a serious offense under these articles shall be placed in confinement or in arrest, as circumstances may require; and when charged with a minor offense such person may be placed in arrest. Any person placed in arrest under the provisions of this article shall thereby be restricted to his barracks, quarters, or tent unless such limits shall be enlarged by proper authority; and any person subject to military law who escapes from confinement or who breaks his arrest before he is set at liberty by proper authority shall be punishable with confinement for not more than one year.

ART. 69. INVESTIGATION OF AND ACTION UPON CHARGES.—No person put in confinement shall be continued therein more than eight days or until such time as a court can be assembled. When any person is put in arrest for the purpose of trial, the officer by whose order he is arrested shall see that a copy of the charges on which he is to be tried is served upon him within eight days after his arrest, and that he is brought to trial within ten days thereafter, unless the necessities of the service prevent such trial; and then he shall be brought to trial within thirty days after the expiration of said ten days, unless postponement be had at the request or with the consent of the accused. If a copy of the charges be not served, or the arrested or confined person be not brought to trial as herein required, the arrest or confinement shall cease and the officer holding the accused in custody shall immediately release him, and any accused thus released from arrest or confinement shall not thereafter be tried for the crime or offense upon which he was placed in arrest or confinement: Provided, That in time of peace no person shall against his objection be brought to trial before a general court within a period of five days subsequent to the service of charges upon him. Any officer whose duty it is to make the release from arrest or confinement as herein required or any officer who fails or refuses to make the investigation or to perform the other duties required of him by articles 19 and 20 shall be punishable with confinement for not more than six months.

ART. 70. REFUSAL TO RECEIVE AND KEEP PRISONERS.—No provost marshal or commander of a guard shall refuse to receive or keep any prisoner committed to his charge by an officer belonging to the forces of the United States; provided the officer committing shall at the time deliver a specific account in writing, signed by himself, of the crime or offense charged against the prisoner. Any officer or soldier so refusing shall be punishable with confinement for not more than six months.

ART. 71. REPORTING PRISONERS RECEIVED.—Every commander of a guard to whose charge a prisoner is committed shall, within twenty-four hours after such confinement or as soon as he is released from his guard, report in writing to the commanding officer the name of such prisoner, the offense charged against him, and the name of the officer committing him; and if he fails to make such report, he shall be punishable with confinement for not more than six months.

ART. 72. RELEASING PRISONER WITHOUT PROPER AUTHORITY.—Any person subject to military law who, without proper authority, releases any prisoner duly committed to his charge or who through neglect or design suffers any prisoner so committed to escape shall be punishable with confinement for not more than one year.

ART. 73. DELIVERY OF OFFENDERS TO CIVIL AUTHORITIES.—When any person subject to military law, except one who is held by the military authorities to answer, or who is awaiting trial or result of trial, or who is undergoing sentence for a crime or offense punishable under these articles, is accused of a crime or offense committed within the geographical limits of States of the Union and the District of Columbia, and punishable by the laws of the land, the commanding officer is required, except in time of war, upon application duly made, to use his utmost endeavor to deliver over such accused person to the civil authorities, or to aid the officers of justice in apprehending and securing him, in order that he may be brought to trial. Any commanding officer who upon such application refuses or willfully neglects, except in time of war, to deliver over such accused person to the civil authorities or to aid the officers of justice in apprehending and securing him shall be dismissed from the service and in addition be punishable with confinement for not more than one year.

When, under the provisions of this article, delivery is made to the civil authorities of an offender undergoing sentence of a court-martial, such delivery, if followed by conviction, shall be held to interrupt the execution of the sentence of the court-martial, and the offender shall be returned to military custody, after having answered to the civil authorities for his offense, for the completion of the said court-martial sentence.

E. WAR OFFENSES.

ART. 74. MISBEHAVIOR BEFORE THE ENEMY.—Any officer or soldier who misbehaves himself before the enemy, runs away, or shamefully abandons or delivers up any fort, post, camp, guard, or other command which it is his duty to defend, or speaks words inducing others to do the like, or casts away his arms or ammunition, or quits his post or colors to plunder or pillage, or by any means whatsoever occasions false alarms in camp, garrison, or quarters shall be punishable with death or confinement for life or for a fixed period.

ART. 75. SUBORDINATES COMPELLING COMMANDER TO SURRENDER.—Any person subject to military law who compels or attempts to compel any commander of any garrison, fort, post, camp, guard, or other command to give it up to the enemy or to abandon it, shall be punishable with death or confinement for life or for a fixed period.

ART. 76. IMPROPER USE OF COUNTERSIGN.—Any person subject to military law who makes known the parole or countersign to any person not entitled to receive it according to the rules and discipline of war, or gives a parole or countersign different from that which he received, shall, if the offense be committed in time of war, be punishable with death or confinement for life or for a fixed period.

ART. 77. FORCING A SAFEGUARD.—Any person subject to military law who, in time of war, forces a safeguard, shall be punishable with death or confinement for life or for a fixed period.

ART. 78. CAPTURED PROPERTY TO BE SECURED FOR PUBLIC SERVICE.—All public property taken from the enemy is the property of the United States and shall be secured for the service of the United States, and any person subject to military law who neglects to secure such property or is guilty of wrongful appropriation thereof shall be punishable with confinement for not more than twenty years.

ART. 79. DEALING IN CAPTURED OR ABANDONED PROPERTY.—Any person subject to military law who buys, sells, trades, or in any way deals in or disposes of captured or abandoned property, whereby he shall receive or expect to receive any profit, benefit, or advantage to himself or to any other person directly or indirectly connected with himself, or who fails whenever such property comes into his possession or custody or within his control to give notice thereof to the proper authority and to turn over such property to the proper authority without delay, shall, on conviction thereof, be punishable with confinement for not more than twenty years.

ART. 80. RELIEVING, CORRESPONDING WITH, OR AIDING THE ENEMY.—Whosoever relieves or attempts to relieve the enemy with arms, ammunition, supplies, money, or other thing, or knowingly harbors or protects or holds correspondence with or gives intelligence to the enemy, either directly or indirectly, shall be punishable with death or confinement for life or for a fixed period.

ART. 81. SPIES.—Any person who in time of war shall be found lurking or acting as a spy in or about any of the fortifications, posts, quarters, or encampments of any of the armies of the United States or elsewhere shall be tried by a general court or by a military commission, and shall, on conviction thereof, suffer death.

F. MISCELLANEOUS CRIMES AND OFFENSES.

ART. 82. MILITARY PROPERTY—WILLFUL OR NEGLIGENT LOSS, DAMAGE, OR WRONGFUL DISPOSITION OF.—Any person subject to military law who, willfully, or through neglect, suffers to be lost, spoiled, damaged, or wrongfully disposes of any military property belonging to the United States shall make good the loss or damage and be punishable, if the property is more than $50 in value, with confinement for not more than two years and, if the property is less than $50 in value, with confinement for not more than six months.

ART. 83. WASTE OR UNLAWFUL DISPOSITION OF MILITARY PROPERTY ISSUED TO SOLDIERS.—Any soldier who sells or wrongfully disposes of or willfully or through neglect injures or loses his horse, arms, ammunition, accoutrements, equipment, clothing, or other property issued to him for use in the military service shall be punishable, if the property is more than $50 in value, with confinement for not more than two years, and if the property is less than $50 in value, with confinement for not more than six months.

ART. 84. DRUNK ON DUTY.—Any person subject to military law who is found drunk on duty shall, if the offense be committed in time of war and in the zone of combat, be punishable with death or with confinement for life or for a fixed period; and if the offense be committed at any other time or place, it shall be punishable with confinement for not more than one year.

ART. 85. MISBEHAVIOR OF SENTINEL.—Any sentinel who is found drunk or sleeping upon his post, or who leaves it before he is regularly relieved, shall, if the offense be committed in time of war and in the zone of combat, be punishable with death or confinement for life or for a fixed period; and if the offense be committed at any other time or place, it shall be punishable with confinement for not more than one year.

ART. 86. GOOD ORDER TO BE MAINTAINED AND WRONGS REDRESSED.—All persons subject to military law are to behave themselves orderly in quarters, garrison, camp, and on the march; and any person subject to military law who commits any waste or spoil, or willfully destroys any property whatsoever (unless by order of his commanding officer), or commits any kind of depredation or riot shall be punishable with confinement for not more than six months; and any commanding officer who, upon complaint made to him, refuses or omits to see reparation made to the party injured, in so far as the offender's pay shall go toward such reparation, shall be punishable with confinement for not more than one year.

ART. 78. DUELING.—Any person subject to military law who fights or promotes or is concerned in or connives at fighting a duel, or who having knowledge of a challenge sent or about to be sent fails to report the fact promptly to the proper authority, shall be punishable with confinement for not more than one year.

ART. 88. FRAUDS AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT.—Any person subject to military law who makes or causes to be made any claim against the United States or any officer thereof, knowing such claim to be false or fraudulent; or

Who presents or causes to be presented to any person in the civil or military service thereof, for approval or payment, any claim against the United States or any officer thereof, knowing such claim to be false or fraudulent; or

Who enters into any agreement of conspiracy to defraud the United States by obtaining, or aiding others to obtain, the allowance or payment of any false or fraudulent claim; or

Who, for the purpose of obtaining, or aiding others to obtain, the approval, allowance, or payment of any claim against the United States or against any officer thereof, makes or uses, or procures, or advises the making or use of, any writing or other paper, knowing the same to contain any false or fraudulent statement; or

Who, for the purpose of obtaining, or aiding others to obtain, the approval, allowance, or payment of any claim against the United States or any officer thereof, makes, or procures or advises the making of any oath to any fact or to any writing or other paper, knowing such oath to be false; or

Who, for the purpose of obtaining, or aiding others to obtain, the approval, allowance, or payment of any claim against the United States or any officer thereof, forges or counterfeits, or procures, or advises the forging or counterfeiting of any signature upon any writing or other paper, or uses, or procures, or advises the use of any such signature, knowing the same to be forged or counterfeited; or

Who, having charge, possession, custody, or control of any money or other property of the United States, furnished or intended for the military service thereof, knowingly delivers, or causes to be delivered, to any person having authority to receive the same, any amount thereof less than that for which he receives a certificate or receipt; or

Who, being authorized to make or deliver any paper certifying the receipt of any property of the United States, furnished or intended for the military service thereof, makes or delivers to any person such writing, without having full knowledge of the truth of the statements therein contained, and with intent to defraud the United States; or

Who steals, embezzles, knowingly and willfully misappropriates, applies to his own use or benefit, or wrongfully or knowingly sells or disposes of any ordnance, arms, equipments, ammunition, clothing, subsistence stores, money, or other property of the United States furnished or intended for the military service thereof; or

Who knowingly purchases or receives in pledge for any obligation or indebtedness from any soldier, officer, or other person who is a part of or employed in said forces or service any ordnance, arms, equipments, ammunition, clothing, subsistence stores, or other property of the United States, such soldier, officer, or other person not having lawful right to sell or pledge the same;

Shall, on conviction thereof, be punishable with a fine of not more than $5,000 or with confinement for not more than five years, or with both. And if any person, being guilty of any of the offenses aforesaid while in the military service of the United States, receives his discharge or is dismissed from the service, he shall continue to be liable to be arrested and held for trial and sentence by a court-martial in the same manner and to the same extent as if he had not received such discharge nor been dismissed.

ART. 89. RIOT.—Any person subject to military law who is guilty of riot or of participating in a riot, either by being present personally or by instigating, promoting, or aiding the same, is punishable with confinement for not more than two years.

ART. 90. OPENING LETTERS.—Any person subject to military law who willfully and without authority opens or reads or causes to be opened or read a sealed letter, telegram, or private paper shall be punishable with confinement for not more than six months.

ART. 91. SUPPRESSING EVIDENCE.—Any person subject to military law who practices any deceit or fraud or uses any threat, menace or violence with intent to prevent any party to a proceeding before any military tribunal from obtaining or producing therein any book, paper or other thing of evidential value in said proceedings, or from procuring the attendance or testimony of any witness therein, or with intent to prevent any person having in his possession any book, paper or other thing of evidential value in such proceedings, or to prevent any person knowing any fact material thereto from producing or disclosing the same shall be punishable with confinement for not more than one year.

ART. 92. SODOMY.—Any person subject to military law who carnally knows any male or female person by the anus or by or with the mouth, or who voluntarily submits to such carnal knowledge, or who carnally knows in any manner any animal or bird, is guilty of sodomy and shall be punishable with confinement in a penitentiary or other authorized place for not more than five years.

ART. 93. MURDER; RAPE.—Any person subject to military law who commits murder or rape shall be punishable with death or confinement for life, or for a fixed period, but no person shall be tried by court-martial for murder or rape committed within the geographical limits of the States of the Union and the District of Columbia in time of peace.

ART. 94. CONSPIRACY.—Any person subject to military law who conspires with another or others to commit any offense authorized to be punished by any of these articles with death, dismissal, or confinement for one year or more, and one or more of the persons conspiring to any act to effect the object of the conspiracy, shall be punishable with confinement for not more than one year.

ART. 95. VARIOUS CRIMES.—Any person subject to military law who in any place commits any crime or offense denounced by any statute of the United States or by any statute for the District of Columbia, and not specifically denounced by these articles, shall be punishable with confinement for a period not exceeding the maximum period of confinement prescribed by said statutes: Provided, That whenever a statute of the United States and a statute for the District of Columbia denounce the same offense, the former shall govern.

ART. 96. GENERAL ARTICLE.—Any person subject to military law who commits any act or is guilty of any omission which constitutes conduct to the prejudice of good order and military discipline or of a nature to bring discredit upon the military service, and which is not punishable by any other article herein, shall be punishable with confinement for not more than six months.

ART. 97. CONDUCT UNBECOMING AN OFFICER AND GENTLEMAN.—Any officer or cadet who is convicted of conduct unbecoming an officer and gentleman shall be dismissed from the service.

ART. 98. FAILURE TO ACQUAINT SOLDIERY WITH THESE ARTICLES.—It shall be the duty of any officer who enlists, musters, or inducts any soldier into the military service, at that time or within ten days thereafter, to read and explain to him these articles, and it shall be the duty of the commanding officer of every garrison, regiment, or company once every six months to read and explain these articles to the soldiers of his command; and every such officer failing or neglecting to perform such duty shall be punishable with confinement for not more than six months.

IV. COURTS OF INQUIRY.

ART. 99. WHEN AND BY WHOM ORDERED.—A court of inquiry to examine into the nature of any transaction of or accusation or imputation against any officer or soldier may be ordered by the President or by any commanding officer; but a court of inquiry shall not be ordered by any commanding officer except upon the request of the officer or soldier whose conduct is to be inquired into.

ART. 100. COMPOSITION.—A court of inquiry shall consist of three or more officers. For each court of inquiry the authority appointing the court shall appoint a recorder.

ART. 101. CHALLENGES.—Members of a court of inquiry may be challenged by the party whose conduct is to be inquired into, but only for cause stated to the court. The court shall determine the relevancy and validity of any challenge, and shall not receive a challenge to more than one member at a time. The party whose conduct is being inquired into shall have the right to be represented before the court by counsel of his own selection, if such counsel be reasonably available.

ART. 102. OATH OF MEMBERS AND RECORDERS.—The recorder of a court of inquiry shall administer to the members the following oath: "You, A. B., do swear (or affirm) that you will well and truly examine and inquire, according to the evidence, into the matter now before you, without partiality, favor, affection, prejudice, or hope of award. So help you God." After which the president of the court shall administer to the recorder the following oath: "You, A. B., do swear (or affirm) that you will, according to your best abilities, accurately and impartially record the proceedings of the court and the evidence to be given in the case in hearing. So help you God."

In cases of affirmation the closing sentence of adjuration will be omitted.

ART. 103. POWERS; PROCEDURE.—A court of inquiry and the recorder thereof shall have the same power to summon and examine witnesses as is given to courts and the judge advocate thereof. Such witnesses shall take the same oath or affirmation that is taken by witnesses before courts. A reporter or an interpreter for a court of inquiry shall, before entering upon his duties, take the oath or affirmation required of a reporter or an interpreter for a court-martial. The party whose conduct is being inquired into or his counsel, if any, shall be permitted to examine and cross-examine witnesses so as fully to investigate the circumstances in question.

ART. 104. OPINION ON MERITS OF CASE.—A court of inquiry shall not give an opinion on the merits of the case inquired into unless specially ordered to do so.

ART. 105. RECORD OF PROCEEDINGS—HOW AUTHENTICATED.—Each court of inquiry shall keep a record of its proceedings, which shall be authenticated by the signature of the president and the recorder thereof, and be forwarded to the convening authority. In case the record can not be authenticated by the recorder, by reason of his death, disability, or absence, it shall be signed by the president and by one other member of the court.

V. MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.

ART. 106. DISCIPLINARY POWERS OF COMMANDING OFFICERS.—Under such regulations as the President may prescribe, and which he may from time to time revoke, alter, or add to, the commanding officer of any detachment, company, or higher command may, for minor offenses not denied by the accused, impose disciplinary punishments upon persons of his command without the intervention of a court, unless the accused demands trial by a court.

The disciplinary punishments authorized by this article may include admonition, reprimand, withholding of privileges, extra fatigue, and restriction to certain specified limits, but shall not include forfeiture of pay or confinement under guard. A person punished under authority of this article, who deems his punishment unjust or disproportionate to the offense may, through the proper channel, appeal to the next superior authority, but may in the meantime be required to undergo the punishment adjudged. The commanding officer who imposes the punishment, his successor in command, and superior authority shall have power to mitigate or remit any unexecuted portion of the punishment. The imposition and enforcement of disciplinary punishment under authority of this article for any act or omission shall not be a bar to trial by a court for a crime or offense growing out of the same act or omission; but the fact that a disciplinary punishment has been enforced may be shown by the accused upon trial, and when so shown shall be considered in determining the measure of punishment to be adjudged in the event of a finding of guilty.

ART. 107. INJURIES TO PERSON OR PROPERTY, REDRESS OF.—Whenever complaint is made to any commanding officer that damage has been done to the property of any person or that his property has been wrongfully taken by persons subject to military law, such complaint shall be investigated by a board consisting of any number of officers from one to three, which board shall be convened by the commanding officer and shall have, for the purpose of such investigation, power to summon witnesses and to examine them upon oath or affirmation, to receive depositions or other documentary evidence, and to assess the damages sustained against the responsible parties. The assessment of damage made by such board shall be subject to the approval of the commanding officer, and in the amount approved by him shall be stopped against the pay of the offenders. And the order of such commanding officer directing stoppages herein authorized shall be conclusive on any disbursing officer for the payment by him to the injured parties of the stoppages so ordered.

Where the offenders can not be ascertained, but the organization or detachment to which they belong is known, stoppages to the amount of damages inflicted may be made and assessed in such proportion as may be deemed just upon the individual members thereof who are shown to have been present with such organization or detachment at the time the damages complained of were inflicted as determined by the approved findings of the board.

ART. 108. ARREST OF DESERTERS BY CIVIL OFFICIALS.—It shall be lawful for any civil officer having authority under the laws of the United States, or of any State, Territory, District, or possession of the United States, to arrest offenders, summarily to arrest a deserter from the military service of the United States and deliver him into the custody of the military authorities of the United States.

ART. 109. SOLDIERS TO MAKE GOOD TIME LOST.—Every soldier who in an existing or subsequent enlistment deserts the service of the United States, or without proper authority absents himself from his organization, station, or duty for more than one day, or who is confined for more than one day under sentence, or while awaiting trial and disposition of his case, if the trial results in conviction, or through the intemperate use of drugs or alcoholic liquor, or through disease or injury the result of his own misconduct, renders himself unable for more than one day to perform duty, shall be liable to serve, after his return to a full-duty status, for such period as shall, with the time he may have served prior to such desertion, unauthorized absence, confinement, or inability to perform duty, amount to the full term of that part of his enlistment period which he is required to serve with his organization before being furloughed to the Army reserve.

ART. 110. SOLDIERS; SEPARATION FROM THE SERVICE.—No enlisted man, lawfully inducted into the military service of the United States, shall be discharged from said service without a certificate of discharge, signed by a field officer of the regiment or other organization to which the enlisted man belongs or by the commanding officer when no such field officer is present; and no enlisted man shall be discharged from said service before his term of service has expired, except by order of the President, the Secretary of War, the commanding officer of a department, or by sentence of a general court.

ART. 111. OATH OF ENLISTMENT.—At the time of his enlistment every soldier shall take the following oath or affirmation: "I, _____, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the United States of America; that I will serve them honestly and faithfully against all their enemies whomsoever; and that I will obey the orders of the President of the United States and the orders of the officers appointed over me, according to the Rules and Army Articles." This oath or affirmation may be taken before any officer.

ART. 112. COPY OF RECORD OF TRIAL.—Every person tried by a general court shall, on demand therefor, made by himself or by any person in his behalf, be entitled to a copy of the record of the trial.

ART. 113. EFFECTS OF DECEASED PERSONS—DISPOSITION OF.—In case of the death of any person subject to military law, the commanding officer of the place of command will permit the legal representative or widow of the deceased, if present, to take possession of all his effects then in camp or quarters, and if no legal representative or widow be present, the commanding officer shall direct a summary court to secure all such effects: and said summary court shall have authority to collect and receive any debts due decedent's estate by local debtors; and as soon as practicable after the collection of such effects said summary court shall transmit such effects, and any money collected, through the Quartermaster Department, at Government expense, to the widow or legal representative of the deceased, if such be found by said court, or to his son, daughter, father, mother, brother, or sister, in the order named, if such be found by said court, or to the beneficiary named by the deceased, if such be found by said court, and such court shall thereupon make to the War Department a full report of its transactions: but if there be none of the persons hereinabove named, or such persons or their addresses are not known to, or readily ascertainable by, said court, and the court shall so find, said summary court shall have authority to convert into cash, by public or private sale, not earlier than thirty days after the death of the deceased, all effects of the deceased, except sabers, insignia, decorations, medals, watches, trinkets, manuscripts, and other articles valuable chiefly as keepsakes; and as soon as practicable after converting such effects into cash said summary court shall deposit with the proper officer, to be designated in regulations, any cash belonging to decedent's estate, and shall transmit a receipt for such deposits, any will or other papers of value belonging to the deceased, any sabers, insignia, decorations, medals, watches, trinkets, manuscripts, and other articles valuable chiefly as keepsakes, together with an inventory of the effects secured by said summary court, and a full account of its transactions to the War Department for transmission to the Auditor for the War Department for action as authorized by law in the settlement of the accounts of deceased officers and enlisted men of the Army.

The provisions of this article shall be applicable to inmates of the United States Soldiers' Home who die in any United States military hospital outside of the District of Columbia where sent from the home for treatment.

ART. 114. INQUESTS.—When at any post, fort, camp, or other place garrisoned by the military forces of the United States and under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, any person shall have been found dead under circumstances which appear to require investigation, the commanding officer will designate and direct a summary court to investigate the circumstances attending the death; and, for this purpose, such summary court shall have power to summon witnesses and examine them upon oath or affirmation. He shall promptly transmit to the post or other commander a report of his investigation and of his findings as to the cause of the death.

ART. 115. AUTHORITY TO ADMINISTER OATHS.—Any judge advocate or acting judge advocate, the president of a general or special court, any summary court, the judge advocate of a general or special court, the president or the recorder of a court of inquiry or of a military board, any officer designated to take a deposition, any officer detailed to conduct an investigation, and the adjutant of any command shall have power to administer oaths for the purposes of the administration of military justice and for other purposes of military administration; and in foreign places where the Army may be serving shall have the general powers of a notary public or of a consul of the United States in the administration of oaths, the execution and acknowledgment of legal instruments, the attestation of documents, and all other forms of notarial acts to be executed by persons subject to military law.

ART. 116. APPOINTMENT OF REPORTERS AND INTERPRETERS.—Under such regulations as the Secretary of War may from time to time prescribe, the president of a court or military commission or a court of inquiry shall have power to appoint a reporter, who shall record the proceedings of and testimony taken before such court or commission and may set down the same, in the first instance, in shorthand. Under like regulations the president of a court or military commission, or court of inquiry, or a summary court, may appoint an interpreter, who shall interpret for the court or commission.

ART. 117. REMOVAL OF CIVIL SUITS.—When any civil or criminal prosecution is commenced in any court of a State against any officer, soldier, or other person in the military service of the United States on account of any act done under color of his office or status, or in respect to which he claims any right, title, or authority under any law of the United States respecting the military forces thereof, or under the law of war, such suit or prosecution may at any time before the trial or final hearing thereof be removed for trial into the district court of the United States in the district where the same is pending in the manner prescribed in section 33 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, and the cause shall thereupon be entered on the docket of said district court and shall proceed therein as if the cause had been originally commenced in said district court and the same proceedings had been taken in such suit or prosecution in said district court as shall have been had therein in said State court prior to its removal, and said district court shall have full power to hear and determine said cause.

ART. 118. OFFICERS—SEPARATION FROM SERVICE.—No officer shall be discharged or dismissed from the service except by order of the President or by sentence of a general court; and in time of peace no officer shall be dismissed except in pursuance of the sentence of a court or in mitigation thereof; but the President may at any time drop from the rolls of the Army any officer who has been absent from duty three months without leave or who has been absent in confinement in a prison or penitentiary for three months after final conviction by a court of competent jurisdiction.

ART. 119. RANK AND PRECEDENCE AMONG REGULARS, MILITIA, AND VOLUNTEERS.—That in time of war or public danger, when two or more officers of the same grade are on duty in the same field, department, or command, or of organizations thereof, the President may assign the command of the forces of such field, department, or command, or of any organization thereof, without regard to seniority of rank in the same grade. In the absence of such assignment by the President, officers of the same grade shall rank and have precedence in the following order, without regard to date of rank or commission as between officers of different classes, namely: First, officers of the Regular Army and officers of the Marine Corps detached for service with the Army by order of the President; second, officers of forces drafted or called into the service of the United States; and, third, officers of the volunteer forces: Provided, That officers of the Regular Army holding commissions in forces drafted or called into the service of the United States or in the volunteer forces shall rank and have precedence under said commissions as if they were commissions in the Regular Army; the rank of officers of the Regular Army under commissions in the National Guard as such shall not, for the purposes of this article, be held to antedate the acceptance of such officers into the service of the United States under said commissions.

ART. 120. COMMAND WHEN DIFFERENT CORPS OR COMMANDS HAPPEN TO JOIN.—When different corps or commands of the military forces of the United States happen to join or do duty together the officer highest in rank of the line of the Regular Army, Marine Corps, forces drafted or called into the service of the United States, or Volunteers, there on duty, shall, subject to the provisions of the last preceding article, command the whole and give orders for what is needful in the service, unless otherwise directed by the President.

ART. 121. COMPLAINTS OF WRONGS.—Any officer or soldier who believes himself wronged by his commanding officer and, upon due application to such commander, is refused redress may complain to the general commanding in the locality where the officer against whom the complaint is made is stationed. The general shall examine into said complaint and take proper measures for redressing the wrong complained of; and he shall, as soon as possible, transmit to the Department of War a true statement of such complaint, with the proceedings had thereon.

SEC. 2. That section 1342 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended and all other acts and parts of acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

SEC. 3. That the provisions of this act shall take effect and be in force on and after the thirtieth day following the approval of this act, except that article 52 shall take effect immediately upon approval of this act.

SEC. 4. That all offenses committed and all penalties, forfeitures, fines, or liabilities incurred prior to the taking of effect of this act may be prosecuted, punished, and enforced in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been passed.

Senator WARREN. The committee will come to order. We have before us Maj. Runcie, and we shall proceed to hear him now.

You understand, Maj. Runcie, that we are considering the Articles of War, and that the bill which is before us seeks to, as you may say, reorganize the Articles of War entirely; and hence, in your testimony, when you allude to them, will you allude to the corresponding portions in the two, and state the differences from the present Articles of War that are necessary, in your opinion?

STATEMENT OF MAJ. J. E. RUNCIE, UNITED STATES ARMY

Maj. RUNCIE. I doubt that I would be prepared to discuss the detailed provisions of this proposed legislation, which I did not see until yesterday, but I think that the real underlying question which the bill raises is a question as to whether military discipline shall be enforced by law or by the exercise of arbitrary and often capricious authority by military commanders.

I would like to say that after long experience of both the military law and the civil law, I was long ago convinced, and have for many years maintained, that there is not and never has been anything in our military system that deserves to be called military law.

Senator LENROOT. Now, Major, might I ask you, preliminary to your statement, to state what your experience has been, and your occupation?

Maj. RUNCIE. I was graduated from the Military Academy in 1879. I served at the Military Academy as instructor of mathematics and as instructor of law from 1880 to 1884.

I served after that in a great variety of duties, among them as judge advocate of a military division and department. I have sat as a member of a great many courts-martial and have been judge advocate of many such courts—that is, I have acted as prosecutor. I have frequently acted also as counsel for accused persons—officers and enlisted men.

I was retired from active service, and having been admitted to the bar I practiced law for 24 or 25 years.

I retired from the practice of the law, voluntarily, about five years ago, since which time I have been the librarian at the Military Academy at West Point.

Senator LENROOT. Proceed.

Maj. RUNCIE. Now, to continue what I was saying, when I say that there is not any such thing as military law I mean, as the fundamental principle of law is that it shall be something established, a rule, something capable of being known or ascertained and determined, that there has been nothing of law in that sense in the military administration during all my acquaintance with it. In all that time every court-martial, together with the reviewing authority that convened it, has been absolutely independent of every other court or authority in the exercise of its jurisdiction. That means that the decisions of those courts on questions of law may be as conflicting as the imagination can conceive, and there is absolutely no means of reconciling them. It is possible, and I have known it in my own experience, for two military courts convened by the same authority, sitting within two or three miles of each other, to reach absolutely opposing decisions on a very important question of law, with no possible means of determining which of the two was correct, so that in those two cases it was a mere matter of chance how the court before which a defendant was arraigned would decide on the law. In one case the defendant was discharged, and in the other the defendant was convicted and given a sentence of a term of years at hard labor, the two cases being on all fours.

The same is true in respect to what constitutes a military offense. There is no authority which can determine a question of that nature. And so through the whole procedure of military courts. There is uncertainty because of the lack of any controlling legal authority which can speak decisively as to what the law is, and whose decisions courts shall be obliged to follow absolutely. Now, that is what I mean by saying that there is no such thing as military law.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You are familiar with the present Articles of War?

Maj. RUNCIE. In general, yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Under the present Articles of War, how are offenses defined?

Maj. RUNCIE. Offenses, as I remember it, are defined, except in special cases, in very general terms only; but a state of facts which contains no element of a military offense may be described as a military offense, and the accused be brought to trial, convicted, and punished.

Senator WARREN. Major, as I understand, I do not know that I ought to say it was the origin of, but largely the Civil War was responsible for, the present Articles of War as they read, and they are supposed to have grown out of experience in the field in time of war. Have you, with your views, considered just what might be done and what should be done in war, at the front, as, for instance, during the late war in France and Germany—speaking, of course, of law and legal procedure? You would, of course, proceed under these Articles of War?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes, sir.

Senator WARREN. In what way would you remedy the inadequacy which you describe?

Maj. RUNCIE. That could not be remedied in time of war; and I think you are in error in thinking that the present Articles of War are the outgrowth of conditions existing at the time of the Civil War. The character of the Articles of War dates very far back of the Civil War.

Senator WARREN. Do not understand me as saying that they originated there; but the shaping of them and the trying out of them was gauged largely afterwards, as I understand, by the application during the Civil War, of course. That is my understanding.

Maj. RUNCIE. I have not understood it that way.

Senator WARREN. I wanted to get your idea about it.

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes. The Articles of War from which ours came were not based on law; they were based on the authority of the Crown. The law-making power had nothing to do with them whatever.

We took over those Articles of War very hastily at the time of the formation of the armies of the War of Independence, and while the British system has fundamentally changed since that time, and the military law of the United Kingdom is now based on parliamentary enactments and is administered as law, our system has continued on the basis which the British abandoned long ago; the basis of military command, not of military law.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. We took over the British Articles of War of 1774?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And they were adopted in 1776, as I understand, without any discussion.

Maj. RUNCIE. Under the emergency which then existed.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; and I believe, from a statement that I have read somewhere, that it was a surprise to the fathers that they were taken over without public discussion.

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes, sir. I think you will find an account of that in the memoirs of John Adams, who sat on that committee.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Those Articles of War which were taken over in 1776 have been revised only two or three times since they were adopted?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes; and only in details, never in system.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The last change in the Articles of War I had a good deal to do with, and I know something about it. It was largely a change of phraseology to make the articles apply to the colonial possessions of the United States. If I do not state this correctly, you will correct me about it.

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The fundamental change made at that time was to give them some power for the exercise of parole, and return of young men to the colors, for good conduct. It extended the military powers.

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes.

Senator WARREN. My observation, also, is this: Maj. Runcie states that the Articles of War go back almost to the foundation of the Government. We were in the Civil War for a very long time, and of course we were also in the War with Mexico. In the real sense I take it that military justice was administered under these Articles of War very much as now; and I thought perhaps in your criticism of them you might point out how they worked then, wherein they failed, and if they failed what remedy was suggested or attempted to be supplied; in other words, how came we in the position in which we now are?

Maj. RUNCIE. I think you will find that they worked very badly, even then, and the evidence of that fact is to be found in the collected orders of that time and immediately following the Civil War, where the executive authority was called on in a great number of cases to correct failures of the military courts and their abuses of authority.

There is another historic case, that of Gen. Fitz-Johnsen Porter, which I think illustrates very well the deplorable consequences of a lack of competent review at the time. It was almost 20 years after the Civil War before Gen. Porter was able to get justice; and then he got it not by any procedure under the military code. An almost extra-legal tribunal had to be devised which could act merely in an advisory capacity, and the Congress and the Executive, after a long delay, were brought to concur in the findings of that board and to do justice to Gen. Porter.

After the Civil War a rather remarkable phenomenon occurred in our history, namely, the total collapse of all interest in military matters. I think you will find that after the Civil War there was no military interest, other than private and personal interests, that received the attention of the public or the Congress. The same conditions have followed after all of our wars.

Senator LENROOT. At what period would you say that began; how soon after the war?

Maj. RUNCIE. Within a very short time after the Civil War; within five years, I think, the Army was reduced, first to 30,000 and then to 25,000 men. In fact, I think it can safely be said that our country has never had an army except in time of war. That is why there has been no public interest in military affairs. We have had an organization which we called an army. It was nominally organized and administered as a military force. As a matter of fact it was a police force. We had a long frontier, in a very wild country, and swarms of savages, to be looked after. That was the only real duty of the Army for at least 25 years—perhaps 30 years—after the Civil War.

Those duties were important. They called for courage and endurance and self-sacrifice, and all that. But they were not the duties of an army.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That very lack of interest has been largely the cause of failure to revise in time of peace these very Articles of War?

Maj. RUNCIE. That was what I was about to call attention to.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you not find the same case now, largely?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Except in individual cases and where there have been actual hardships, there is a lack of interest on the part of the public?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes. Our public is never really interested in military affairs. The military establishment does not touch the people closely. If it did, if they were in daily contact with it all over the country as they are with the postoffice, and in many places with the customs service, the military service would receive that measure of public attention which it never has received except in time of war.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Getting down to a concrete proposition, a great many of these cases that have been tried by court-martial have come to my attention since the close of the war, and the impression I have received from them is that the fundamental trouble is that the commanding officer is given too much power. For instance, the commanding officer appoints the court and the judge advocate. The man who defends the prisoner is appointed by the same appointing power. There is nobody except the commanding officer who can revise the sentence of the court-martial. He sets aside the findings of the court-martial in cases where a defendant has been acquitted, and reconvenes the court, and orders the same man convicted; and beyond that there is no power of appeal, as I understand it. Now, is that a fair statement of the situation?

Maj. RUNCIE. So far as it goes; but I think that it is not the commanding officer alone who is chargeable with those consequences. Every officer participates in that responsibility to some extent, and that condition results from the condition under which the Army acted as a police force, without military duties, and without real military administration.

We no longer look upon the Army as a police force. The Army no longer has any police duties. But the customs and the practices of the period during which it was nothing but a police force have been sought to be carried over into the time when we have tried to make an army. For instance, it is perfectly possible for an officer to prefer an accusation against an enlisted man on a statement of facts which contains no element of a military offense, and the commanding officer, if the accuser himself does not happen to be the commanding officer, can refer the matter to a court-martial of his own appointment. The case is tried and it comes back to the commanding officer, who is the immediate superior of the members of the court, dwelling in the same command, in the same military bailiwick. There is not much assurance of justice in a case like that.

Senator WARREN. In a case like that, and in time of war, give us a suggestion of what you would propose.

Maj. RUNCIE. That is very difficult, because all of the conditions which have given rise to the controversies now pending, and which have aroused personal interest in military questions, are not conditions that were developed by the war, but are the outgrowth of those conditions which existed during time of peace and will continue to exist in time of peace.

Senator WARREN. Yes; but practically—because that is what we are to do in this bill—the question is how to make new provisions for the old ones that are defective.

Maj. RUNCIE. Practically, Senator, I do not know how it can be done. I do not see how provisions such as you propose to make will ever effect a cure of these evils. You are considering only the symptoms of the disease, not the causes.

Senator WARREN. What advice have you to give us as legislators along that line?

Maj. RUNCIE. Such legislation should be enacted for the Army as will assure a purely military organization and purely military administration for purely military purposes, with nothing in view but the public service. As it is now, the public service can be entirely ignored, and often is.

I mean that it will be, I think, perfectly useless to enact such legislation as is here proposed if the Army is to continue to be distributed in small posts which do not constitute military establishments, but which are military villages or colonies. If the Army is organized in commands of not less than brigades and preferably division commands and if in such establishments there shall be none but persons in or employed by the military service, you will then be able to have an organization that will administer military law. You can not provide an officer of the Judge Advocate General's Department for every petty post that now exists throughout the United States.

Senator WARREN. Excuse me. I asked the practical question, because I make no pretensions to technical knowledge of law and its operations, and I am thinking of it now along the line of your last remark. Just now, for instance, I understand they have distributed troops in company units along the Mexican frontier. The trouble we are having with Mexico is such that they can not hold brigades or divisions together where they may be under division command or brigade command, and the troops are scattered along the border. I do not want to interrupt or embarrass your remarks at all, but I want to have you keep in mind the practical side, and I want to ask you for your personal advice.

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes, sir. Now, that is a command in the field, and of course the conditions are quite different. But what I have had in mind in the statement so far as it has gone is the permanent establishment which I understand is contemplated for the training of troops, a really military establishment, from which at any time such divisions or brigades or greater commands could be put into the field, carrying with them the same military organization, and in particular the same organization for the administration of military justice, that they had in their garrison; just as they would carry with them their supply officers, medical officers, ordnance officers, and others of the staff.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you think that any system, any military code, is proper which vests such power in the commanding officer of a district or a department—we will say the commanding officer of the smaller unit first, and then of the next larger unit, and so on up to the largest unit. Do you think any system is proper which vests such power in the commanding officer?

Maj. RUNCIE. No, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Why?

Maj. RUNCIE. Because any such commanding officer is independent of every other commander in his view of the law, and every court that may be appointed by him is independent of every other court in its view of the law, unless there is provided, as this bill does provide, a competent revising authority, whose decision on every question of law shall be final.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is what I want to get at.

Maj. RUNCIE. And, so far as I have observed, there is lacking in this bill a provision, such as the rule of stare decisis, which shall make the decisions of the military court of appeals binding on the inferior courts.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In other words, under the present system the commanding officer is supreme?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes, sir, supreme in his interpretation and application of the law, except when a stubborn court refuses to be coerced.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And the judgments of courts-martial are lenient or severe according to his own humor; is not that true?

Maj. RUNCIE. That is true; but that is only a small part of it. The court may be wrong and the commanding officer may be right.

Senator WARREN. There are some systems of appeal under the law as to the officers who may call a court, and as to review by particular officers, I believe?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. None whatever. That is the trouble with the old Articles of War.

Maj. RUNCIE. There are none whatever.

Senator WARREN. I do not read the Articles of War that way.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is the interpretation that has been placed on that. Gen. Crowder has undertaken to say that under the power given to review and modify on the part of the Judge Advocate General, that power does not give power to reverse or modify, and that the only power of the Judge Advocate General is to ascertain if the court had jurisdiction of the proceedings and that the proceedings have been regular.

Senator WARREN. I spoke of it before it gets to that point. That is, some of those court findings are reviewed, we will say, in the field, if it happens to be there, as I understand it, and they go up to the President, and, you may say, to the Judge Advocate General's office.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What is the proceeding of the Judge Advocate General's office now?

Maj. RUNCIE. Nothing but advisory; it has no control over the actions of courts or of reviewing authorities.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. We will take a case that has been tried and in which judgment has been rendered by the court. In case the defendant wants to go higher, what is the process?

Maj. RUNCIE. He can not by any legal proceeding.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. There is no way in which he can get his case before a higher tribunal?

Maj. RUNCIE. There is no higher tribunal. There is no such thing as an appeal or a writ of error or certiorari; nothing of that nature.

Senator WARREN. Either in the law or regulations, do you mean?

Maj. RUNCIE. No, sir. By extra legal action—illegal and extra-legal—he can cause intercession to be made by his friends to the reviewing authority.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. To the reviewing authority. What is the power of the reviewing authority?

Maj. RUNCIE. To approve, to disapprove, or to modify.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is the next higher authority?

Maj. RUNCIE. That is the officer who convenes the court.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Is there any appeal from him?

Maj. RUNCIE. Not an appeal exactly. In grave cases affecting life or involving dismissal of an officer his action is not final. It must go to the President.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But only in those two cases?

Maj. RUNCIE. But that is not an appeal.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is true only in those two cases?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes, sir; that is all.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Where a court has convened and has found a defendant guilty and a severe sentence has been imposed, that goes from the court up to the commanding officer who convened the court, and he approves or disapproves?

Maj. RUNCIE. Really, to give the procedure in detail, it goes to his judge advocate, who reads the record and makes a recommendation to the convening authority. The convening authority may or may not regard that recommendation. He often disregards it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. If he approves it, then he approves the findings of the court?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes; and orders execution in all except those cases which are reserved for the action of higher authority.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. We will say that the commanding officer who convened the court has approved the findings of the court. Then what becomes of it?

Maj. RUNCIE. The record is transmitted to the office of the Judge Advocate General and filed.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. At the Capital?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And has he the power of setting aside?

Maj. RUNCIE. No, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He only has the power of advising?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes, sir.

Senator WARREN. What happens in case the reviewing officer refuses to accept and does not approve the finding of the court?

Maj. RUNCIE. He can then disapprove the proceedings in the entire case and practically set them aside.

Senator WARREN. Then I do not believe that you and I differ at all. Perhaps we do in terms. But it does not occur that one set of men passes judgment on a man and that is the end of it, as a matter of fact, in all cases, because of course they get this review—what you call a review. It may be incompetent, but I am speaking of it as a second step.

Maj. RUNCIE. It is not a review in the legal sense. I mean, it does not involve a re-examination of the legal questions which may have been raised; as, for instance, to the sufficiency of the evidence. And, again, it leaves it to the arbitrary judgment of the convening authority as to what he will do. I have had, in my experience, a case or two in which it was extremely difficult to keep the convening authority from doing grave injustice. It came so close to it once that the commanding general, who was my chief at the time, insisted on sending to prison a man as to whose very identity there was grave question, a man who denied that he had ever been in the military service, whose identity was not established by the evidence in the record, and to whom the court had denied sufficient time to produce evidence which he said, would show that at the time he was supposed to be in the military service he was working at his trade in a State 2,000 miles away. But the commanding general said he was morally convinced of the guilt of that man; and when he was assured that men could be punished not by moral assurance of their guilt but only by legal conviction, he said he would take a chance. And he said that civil courts anyway could have nothing to do with the case; and when he was advised that, far from that being the fact, the civil courts could, by writ of habeas corpus in a case of that kind, in which the question in issue was one of the jurisdiction of the court, interfere at once, he said, well, he relied on the judge advocate to protect him in that case; which his judge advocate said he would decline to do, whereupon the commanding general changed his mind, and the man was released.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Of course the difference between Gen. Ansell and Gen. Crowder, from the legal viewpoint, was and is this: I think Gen. Crowder's contention is that the Judge Advocate General has no power to reverse or to modify or to change the sentence of a court-martial, but that he can, if he thinks there is any insufficiency of evidence or any irregularity, simply advise the commanding officer, if you please, concerning the propriety of the sentence. Gen. Ansell, on the other hand, claims that under the power given by the Articles of War the Judge Advocate General has power to review and revise and modify the judgment of the court-martial.

There is the difference between those two gentlemen, both very distinguished officers of the Army.

Assuming, as the Secretary of War has assumed, that Gen. Crowder's contention is the correct contention, do you think there ought to be some power somewhere that would have the right to review, revise, and modify the sentence of a court-martial?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes, sir; I think that is the indispensable step to establishing government of law instead of government by caprice.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Have you examined the provisions in these revised Articles of War which cover that point?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you think they are sufficient to do it?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is really the main contention between these two distinguished men.

Maj. RUNCIE. That, of course, is purely a question of the interpretation of the statutes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Absolutely, that is all.

Maj. RUNCIE. On the whole, I do not think that any such revisory authority is vested in the Judge Advocate General.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You differ with Gen. Ansell on that?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is Gen. Crowder's view of it.

Maj. RUNCIE. But that is perhaps the principal of all the existing conditions that calls for a remedy, and the remedy is provided here; and as to the details of the exercise of the revisory jurisdiction, I think—well, I have not had time to look into it. As I say, I saw this proposed legislation for the first time yesterday.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. There is no analogy for the system we now have anywhere in the civil courts?

Maj. RUNCIE. No, nor in any other military establishment or system that I have any knowledge of.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. So that, in the last analysis, it leaves the enlisted man or the noncommissioned officer, who is summoned before a court-martial, entirely at the mercy of the commanding officer who acts in a revisory capacity after the finding?

Maj. RUNCIE. And of the court.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Maj. RUNCIE. The court is responsible in more cases, I think, than the commanding officer; because it is absurd, I think, to expect a court composed of men, mostly young men, inexperienced men, with no training whatever in the consideration of questions of law, to pass on questions which affect the liberty, the resources and the lives of enlisted men; or of their brother officers, for that matter. It is not only absurd, it is unjust to young officers, destitute of training or experience, to impose on them such grave duties and to require them to exercise such weighty powers without the guidance of officers trained and experienced in dealing with such questions. A lieutenant is not permitted to command a platoon until he has had ample instruction in the duties of a platoon commander, but as soon as he receives a commission and procures a uniform he is deemed qualified to take part in decisions of questions of law affecting the good name, the liberty, and even the life of a fellow soldier. It is unjust to the young officer, as well as to the soldier in whose case he sits in judgment.

Senator WARREN. You have noticed, of course, in the Chamberlain bill, the proposition that in courts-martial—you were speaking of this trouble—that there may be included, or shall be included, in fact, enlisted men, in the trial of enlisted men and noncommissioned officers?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes.

Senator WARREN. You were speaking of the inexperience and ignorance of officers, and of course that would apply below as well as above; and I agree with you that probably there is more trouble about that than about anything else.

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes.

Senator WARREN. Would you like to tell us what you think about that proposition?

Maj. RUNCIE. I think it is a very doubtful expedient, because, of course, as you very justly remarked, an enlisted man would be very much less competent, in general, to pass on those questions than an officer. And, again, in the Army as it now exists—I mean in time of peace—the enlisted man will probably be entirely subordinate to his officers who are on the court.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Why?

Maj. RUNCIE. Because the relation that exists between the officer and the enlisted man in our Army is not a military relation; it is a feudal relation; it is a social relation.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I wish you would explain that.

Maj. RUNCIE. It is a relation that exists between men of a superior cast and men of an inferior cast.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I would like you to enlarge on that and tell us just what you mean, because it is along that line that complaints have been made to me within recent months, by enlisted men and the friends of enlisted men, claiming—and I am only giving the claim, not that I have knowledge of it—that the enlisted man is looked upon as not the equal of the officer socially or mentally or otherwise, no matter what his standing may have been before he went into the service. That complaint is everywhere met. Now, you called it to my attention by making the statement you did as to the relation of the feudal system. How did it originate?

Maj. RUNCIE. If you will have patience enough to let me go back to a statement I made a while ago, I think it is owing to the same conditions that existed when the Army was a frontier police, when the enlisted men were recruited from, perhaps, the inferior strata of the community; when the officers were first allowed only to bring their families into these little police posts; whereupon the enlisted man began to be regarded as available for domestic wants of the officer, to take care of his domestic establishment. The enlisted men who were permitted to have their families at the post of course found their families depended upon, also, to supply the wants of officers' families. I think that if it were not for the presence of the families of officers in military posts, the relation between the officer and the man would become purely military. As it is, naturally, the soldier whose wife is a laundress and whose daughter is a waitress finds himself looked upon as one of the menial class rather than of a military class. That is, it has come to be regarded that the officer is one kind of man and the enlisted man is another kind of man; that the difference is one of class, not of position, as it ought to be and as it is in other armies.

Now, that goes to such lengths that it may be in point to exemplify it. Soon after we found ourselves engaged in war, when the Red Cross people sent around to different communities expert women instructors in the kind of work which the women of our country took up so enthusiastically, the preparation of bandages and surgical dressings and comforts for the relief of the wounded and sick, one of these instructors came to a very large post at which there were many officers and many officers' families and many enlisted men with their families. The course of instruction having begun, the wives and daughters of some of the enlisted men requested that they might be permitted to receive the instruction. They were as much interested in the accomplishment of the desired end as the officers' families were. The instructor was perfectly willing, but the officers' wives and daughters announced that that would not do; that if the enlisted men's women were permitted to come to the class in which the instruction was given, they would withdraw; that social distinctions must be preserved.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Was it enforced?

Maj. RUNCIE. It was, so far as I know.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Does that condition exist between the officer and the enlisted man at West Point?

Maj. RUNCIE. I think it exists practically everywhere in the Army. It has been my experience that it does; that the relation between the officer and the enlisted man, instead of being merely that of a military superior and a military subordinate, is primarily that of a social superior and that of a social inferior. That did not work any great harm so long as the Army was small and could be recruited from the class of the community which was willing to occupy that position; but, exactly as the troubles which have arisen in the administration of military justice in time of war have their roots in the conditions which exist unchallenged in time of peace, so this social relation of superiority and inferiority in time of peace is inevitably carried into the time of war, when the class of enlisted men is totally different from that which used to fill the ranks at the old frontier police posts. Why, you were asked here a short time ago to appropriate a large sum of money for the construction and maintenance of a hotel at West Point, to convert the military academy more than ever into an amusement resort. At the hotel that now exists there, there has stood, and for all I know still stands, a rule which excludes any enlisted man from the accommodations of the hotel. And after the war had begun for us, the question arose whether enlisted men, voluntarily enlisted or included in the selective draft, could visit the hotel to visit their friends there, or, if they came to West Point to visit their friends, could go to the hotel for accommodations.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. How was it determined?

Maj. RUNCIE. I think the rule was perhaps suspended in that case; but at any rate permission had to be asked. Now, I cite that only as an illustration of the conditions which in my opinion absolutely prevent a really military establishment.

Senator LENROOT. Is this hotel open to the public generally?

Maj. RUNCIE. Except to enlisted men.

Senator LENROOT. That is what I say, except as to enlisted men? Any one can have the accommodation except enlisted men, on paying for it?

Maj. RUNCIE. Exactly.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Is that a regulation of the Academy?

Maj. RUNCIE. I think not. I think it is simply a quiet rule.

Senator WARREN. Is that the old hotel that stands on the grounds?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes, sir.

Senator WARREN. It is an unwritten law that the enlisted men understand and that the officers understand?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes.

Senator WARREN. As a general rule you can not get in there—it is impossible for anybody?

Maj. RUNCIE. The attractions of the place come periodically, and of course the pressure on the hotel accommodations comes periodically. But why a hotel should be a part of that military establishment I have never been able to understand.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Does the cadet at West Point imbibe that class distinction from the time of his entry into the establishment?

Maj. RUNCIE. It is impossible for him to avoid it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He comes from the class, as a rule, from which the enlisted men of the Army come?

Maj. RUNCIE. I think a majority of them do.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Maj. RUNCIE. But the cadet stays there four years, as a rule, and he finds there enlisted men engaged not in military duties but in the care of a vast village. Many of them have no arms, have no other uniforms than those of working men—laborers and artisans. They do nothing but take care of that vast village. The inevitable result is that the cadet, after he has been exposed during the formative period of his character for four years to such surroundings, comes out not so much with the feeling that it is his duty to serve, as that it is his privilege to be served.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You think that he carries that into the service with him?

Maj. RUNCIE. I know that he does.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. With that feeling of class distinction, with the officer having that feeling of superiority, do you feel that under the present system it is possible for a man to deal as justly with the enlisted men as with those of his own class?

Maj. RUNCIE. I feel that it is utterly impossible.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you not feel that where an enlisted man is tried by court-martial for some trivial offense he may be given a much longer sentence than a commissioned officer who may be found guilty of a much more serious offense?

Maj. RUNCIE. That frequently happens; but it goes much further than that. The enlisted man may be tried and convicted for something which is not an offense at all.

Senator LENROOT. You mean an offense not defined by any law?

Maj. RUNCIE. For an act or omission that contains not a single element of a military offense. There was a case, which excited some unpleasant comment, of an enlisted man who was accused, arraigned, tried, and convicted before a military court for lack of respect or lack of obedience, or something of that kind, to an officer's wife.

Now, there is absolutely no military relation, and should be none, between any person in the military service and any woman, because she happens to be an officer's wife. This conviction was not for such conduct towards any woman as would have been reprehensible and would have subjected the man to proper punishment in the case of any woman; but the case rested on the conviction which has grown up in the military service, that there is a measure of military respect and obedience due from the enlisted man as such, not only to the officer but to all of the officer's family, and to all of that social class.

Senator LENROOT. Where was this case?

Maj. RUNCIE. At West Point.

Senator LENROOT. When did it occur?

Maj. RUNCIE. I think it was about two years ago.

Senator WARREN. Of course, the law, as I understand it, prior to some late additions, did not presume that officers in the Army had families, or provide for any families. That is, the matter of families did not enter into Army provisions at all. The woman does not appear anywhere in such provisions.

Maj. RUNCIE. That shows how things grow without regard to law.

Senator WARREN. There has been some legislation to change that lately. The proposition is illustrated very plainly at a post, where naturally an officer may have a wife and a number of children; and he may have spent a lot of money keeping his place up, but if his commission dates a day later than that of another officer who comes to that post, the man who has just come there may walk in and say, "Get out of here; I want this house." In fact, you will find that in early times officers in speaking to their men, in haranguing the crowd, advised against marriage. They said there was no provision made for families; that there was no provision for carrying baggage, and all that.

Maj. RUNCIE. I think, if you will look back to about 1835, around the time of Gen. Scott's regulations, you will find that it was not contemplated that officers' families should be admitted into garrisons at all, and I do not think there has ever been any declaration of that as a right at all. But in the old police force it was easy to set troops to work to chop down cottonwood trees and build a little addition to an officer's cabin for the accommodation of his family.

Senator WARREN. That has been changed by law since, so that the men can not be asked to do such service. I do not know whether that law is observed.

Maj. RUNCIE. I do not remember any provision of law that recognizes the right of an officer's family to live in a military establishment.

Senator WARREN. No; but I was speaking of using the men. An officer can not use men now in that kind of service.

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes; but it is done right along.

Senator WARREN. Yes; but when an officer does that he is violating the law and is subject to court-martial.

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes; but he gets away from that by saying that he himself does not employ the man; that his wife employs him.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It is a rule that does not work both ways.

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Now, let me call your attention to this. I think that class spirit exists not only at West Point, but at the Naval Academy.

Maj. RUNCIE. That is possibly true; I do not know. But it exists throughout the whole military service.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You will remember the instance where a cadet a few years ago took a nurse, a respectable lady, to a cadet dance, and he was practically ostracized by his fellows for having done so.

But, going back to this proposition, let me call your attention to one thing for which you will not find a parallel in the laws of this or any other country. Article 96 on page 53 of the existing law provides:

ART. 96. General article.—Though not mentioned in these articles, all disorders and neglects to the prejudice of good order and military discipline, all conduct of a nature to bring discredit upon the military service, and all crimes or offenses not capital, of which persons subject to military law may be guilty, shall be taken cognizance of by a general or special or summary court-martial, according to the nature and degree of the offense, and punished at the discretion of such court.

As I read that article there is not a thing under the sun that has anything to do with the military establishment that can not be denounced as a military offense and punishable by a commanding officer.

Maj. RUNCIE. By a court, and with the approval of the commanding officer.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In the last analysis it is the same thing.

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes, it is. That article will cover any statement of facts which the authority which convenes the court chooses to regard as a military offense, although legally there is not one element of a military offense in it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; and the grossest injustices have been perpetrated under it. For instance, take a man who is absent without leave, it may be for a day or two, and comes back again. There have been cases where men absent without leave for five days have been sentenced to 20 years in the penitentiary, and sometimes, on being absent for a less time, have received a lighter sentence. Can a man absent without leave be punished under that section for desertion?

Maj. RUNCIE. No; he would have to be charged with desertion, because that is provided for under a special article.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Absence without leave can be punished under that article, as though he had been charged with desertion, can it not?

Maj. RUNCIE. No; I think not.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Is there any other provision of the Articles of War which provides for punishment for absence without leave?

Maj. RUNCIE. I am not sufficiently familiar with the new articles to say.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I mean in the articles as they are now enforced.

Senator WARREN. I think there is unlimited latitude allowed for conviction because of the various grades. You might find him innocent or you might fine him a dollar. For instance, if he had left when an action was expected, to avoid battle, and had been caught away, of course that would be true desertion.

Maj. RUNCIE. That would be cowardice.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. There is no limit, then, to the punishment that may be fixed?

Maj. RUNCIE. That is true. That was formerly known as "the devil's article." It was the catch-all for everything that nobody had thought of putting specifically among the offenses triable by a court. It makes punishment possible, therefore, for any action which, though not involving any real offense, a commanding officer may choose to regard as prejudicial to good order and military discipline. If he can appoint a court that will accept his view of the matter or that he can coerce into agreeing with him, he can punish a man for almost anything.

This article serves another purpose also. It is available to defeat the ends of justice as well as to perpetrate injustice. If, for instance, an officer has been guilty of acts that would properly be described as "conduct unbecoming an officer and gentleman," the penalty for which is dismissal from the service—I mean that upon conviction under such a charge the sentence of dismissal is mandatory, the court having no discretion in the matter—and if for any reason the commanding officer does not desire to expose the accused officer to the risk of dismissal, he may cause the charge against him to be brought under this ninety-sixth article for "conduct to the prejudice." Then, in the event of a conviction, the court has a range of discretion as to the penalty to be imposed, and the commanding officer as reviewing authority can mitigate or remit the penalty imposed by the court. I give that just as an example.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Take the instance that you spoke of, disrespect to an officer's wife; that would come under it?

Maj. RUNCIE. If you chose so to regard it.

Senator WARREN. It would have to be disrespect "to a lady," rather than "to an officer's wife," specifically in the charges?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes; almost anything would do, as the practice now is.

Senator WARREN. They would hardly have the cheek to do it otherwise, I think.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I make no claim to the authorship of this bill. At the request of the committee last year, when I was chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, I asked Gen. Ansell to prepare revised Articles of War, and this bill is the result. In order to cure the section you speak of there, this rule has been suggested:

ART 96. General article.—Any person subject to military law who commits any act or is guilty of any omission which constitutes conduct to the prejudice of good order and military discipline or of a nature to bring discredit upon the military service, and which is not punishable by any other article herein, shall be punishable with confinement for not more than six months.

That limits the amount of punishment.

Maj. RUNCIE. That limits the amount of punishment, but does not limit the discretion——

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. No.

Maj. RUNCIE (continuing). As to what constitutes a military offense.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you not think it ought to limit the discretion, also?

Maj. RUNCIE. It is very much like cases of disorderly conduct coming before a police court or a municipal magistrate.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Maj. RUNCIE. But of course those minor civil courts are guided by a long course of experience and legal precedents; but the military courts have no such experience and they are under no obligation to be guided by precedents.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Now this, I presume, is under regulation rather than by law. Where it is suggested to a commanding officer that a complaint ought to be made, accusing an enlisted man, he has an inspector look into it, and the inspector is on the Government's side of the controversy, and the complaint is based on that. I understand that it is not the rule, and that it is rather forbidden, that the opposing view shall be inquired into by the inspector. Do you know about that?

Maj. RUNCIE. I do not know what the present practice is about that. The actions of inspectors are liable to be perfunctory.

Senator WARREN. It is on the ground that it is a sort of grand jury?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; but a grand jury hears both sides.

Senator WARREN. Yes; it does, if it does its duty.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In a criminal court where the defendant chooses not to disclose his case, then it is his own fault.

Maj. RUNCIE. In a court-martial the defendant's side is heard if he wants it to be heard.

But all this legislation, I think, will be ineffective unless measures of purely military administration can be introduced into the Army and maintained. There is, in my opinion, no more reason why an officer's family affairs, his domestic concerns, and his social relations, should be mingled with and even take precedence over his official duties than there is for having the post office filled with the families of all the employees, from the postmaster down to the letter carriers. The conditions which permitted that system to grow up, in the days when the Army was a police force, no longer exist.

Senator WARREN. They do not exist by any positive assurances of law, now.

Maj. RUNCIE. No. I mean the conditions of an officer's life and service in remote places, in small detachments which were not military forces but police forces, in which the presence of officers' families to a limited extent did not materially interfere with the discharge of police duties. Those conditions no longer exist. But because the officers' domestic establishments were allowed—were tolerated—at those old, little posts, one-company posts, two-company posts, it has come to be considered that an officer has an undoubted right to accommodations for his family and to a supply of almost everything that his family may want at the public expense.

It is impossible to maintain a military spirit and a military establishment in a democratic country with such conditions as those. I say this after having had considerable experience in the Military Establishment, and quite as much outside of the Military Establishment, and having no interest in the question in either way.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You have observed that very severe sentences have been passed upon enlisted men for very trivial offenses, have you not?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It may be claimed that that was necessary in order to maintain discipline. But in your opinion, from the experience you have had, do you not believe that most of these cases could have been tried by minor courts and the same discipline maintained?

Maj. RUNCIE. I would go further than that and say that such an abuse of military discretion is destructive of real discipline, the sole purpose of which is to secure good and efficient service.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It is destructive of morale?

Maj. RUNCIE. It substitutes servitude for honorable service.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Let me give you an illustration, and ask you if any such system as would warrant this can be sustained, in morals at least: There was a young lieutenant in France who was the keeper of the company funds, who lost the money—or lost his books, rather. His things were put with those of the others, into a dump heap, at the place where they landed. He lost his books, and, finding that they were lost, in his efforts to find them he was absent without leave for a while. The inspector reported that he ought to be prosecuted, and he was tried for absence without leave. He produced the money in court, what he did have, and produced evidence to show what he should have had, although he did not have his books. He was found guilty of embezzlement and of absence without leave, and he was dismissed from the Army. That was the beginning and the end of his punishment.

Then, when the matter was brought to the attention of his commanding officer, he ordered the court to be reconvened, because, as he said, an officer guilty of embezzlement and absence without leave should have been dishonorably discharged from the Army. The court was reconvened and found him guilty, as before, of embezzlement and of absence without leave, and sentenced him to be dishonorably discharged from the Army and to forfeit his pay, and sentenced him to imprisonment in Fort Leavenworth for a term. Is there anything in that case that would justify such a punishment as that?

Maj. RUNCIE. Nothing whatever in the statement you make; and a competent legal officer with the record of such a case before him, even though his power was nothing more than advisory, would recommend that the entire proceeding be set aside and the officer restored to duty.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That case came here, and I am glad to say that the clemency court recommended the remission of the extreme penalty. The young man did not go to Leavenworth, although he was on the way, all right; and yet the stigma of conviction of a felony clings to him. There is no way for him to get rid of it.

Maj. RUNCIE. There is absolutely no way of removing the record of his conviction.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. There are thousands of cases, not on all fours with that, but thousands of cases where the same hardship has been imposed. The best evidence of it, Major, is the fact that the clemency court have reduced the aggregate of 28,000 years of sentences to a little over 6,000 years. That ought to be pretty good evidence that the sentences imposed are extreme.

Maj. RUNCIE. You are considering the matter in the officers' direction. I have known many cases in which officers should have been prosecuted for delinquency in dealing with the public funds and with public property in which prosecution has been omitted on condition that the officer make restitution. Extreme leniency is just as destructive of discipline as extreme severity, and so long as it is left to the option—to the whim or caprice—of a man acting in a personal and not in a judicial capacity, to determine whether a man shall be let off or prosecuted to conviction, I can not see that there is a government of law.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It is distinctively a government of men, is it not?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Now, there is another question I want to ask. Do you not think a man's right to have counsel of his own selection ought to be safeguarded in whatever this committee undertakes to do?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes; I would have no great hope or great expectation of the protection of the rights of an inferior, of an ignorant man, by such counsel as would be available in most cases under the present organization and administration of the Army. The counsel selected is usually some young man of whom it is supposed that he has not too much to do. He himself is ignorant of the law; and sometimes those men make the most amusing mistakes.

I have heard recently of a case in which an enlisted man was prosecuted for making and uttering a forgery. His wife had run away from him, and he got hold of her allotment check, and not being disposed to have his runaway wife get the benefit of his pay, he endorsed the check with her name, and cashed it, which resulted in his being accused of making and uttering a forgery. The young officer assigned to defend him is reported to have declined to plead to such an unintelligible accusation, on the ground that a forgery is something written, and that "utterance" applies only to something spoken, and he could not intelligently plead to such a specification as that. The court was about to send the charge back to the convening authority to have the mistake corrected, when some thoughtful member said that the law had queer words, and the lawyers had queer ways of using words, and that they had better look this up; so somebody was detailed to make a trip to the nearest available dictionary and it was found that it was possible to "utter" a forgery; whereupon the trial proceeded. The defendant whose rights are intrusted to haphazard counsel like that and to a court like that, does not stand much show for justice.

Senator LENRCOT. To what extent are graduates of the Military Academy educated in military law?

Maj. RUNCIE. Very little. In fact, speaking as a graduate of the Academy and as a former instructor of law at the Military Academy, I will say that for the purpose of administering criminal law the course of instruction at West Point is of very trivial value. It is not really a study of the law; it is an exercise in mnemonics for most of them.

Senator LENROOT. Is there any reason why it should not be regarded as a part of the course?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes. As we depend on the medical schools of the country to furnish us with medical officers, I think we ought to depend on the law schools to furnish us with legal officers. I do not think there is room or time or opportunity at the Military Academy for sufficient instruction in law to qualify anybody to take part in the administration of law.

Senator WARREN. In that case, you would have a law department, which would, like the medical department, have its officers follow the troops to the front, wherever an army might be?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes, sir.

Senator WARREN. And which would be distributed wherever the men were located, at the hospitals, and elsewhere? You would have at the camps, where the men were to be tried, those who were particularly educated in law?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes.

Senator WARREN. By the way, apropos of what you say about detailing counsel, I understand that the accused always has the privilege of selecting his counsel, within certain lines.

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes; if the counsel he selects chooses to serve.

Senator WARREN. In case of the refusal of one not called upon by duty to serve, then, I presume, the court appoints some one as counsel, as the civil courts do?

Maj. RUNCIE. The commanding officer appoints counsel. The court has no authority to detail an officer to any duty.

Senator WARREN. Yes; that is right; the Articles of War do so provide.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Is it not true in that connection that nobody is appointed until the court convenes and they come to the trial, and then the accused generally names some young lieutenant who is in the room, who probably knows nothing about the facts, to serve as his counsel?

Senator WARREN. Or otherwise, that the commanding officer does it?

Maj. RUNCIE. No.

Senator WARREN. The court does it?

Maj. RUNCIE. No; it is done on the application of the accused, I should say.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I have in mind a case where a bystander was appointed, a lieutenant or some higher officer, and had no opportunity to talk to his client or to learn the facts.

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes; I became aware recently of a case in which there was a sentence of imprisonment for life, where the counsel said in open court that he knew nothing about the case and had not seen the accused until about an hour before the trial.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I think it frequently happens, judging from the records that have been submitted to me, that the most, or all, that the counsel does, is to advise the accused to plead guilty, in the hope that he will get a lighter sentence.

Maj. RUNCIE. That often happens.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I remember one case where a man was sentenced to be shot, over in France, and if I recollect the record correctly he pleaded guilty without making any statement as to his own case.

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes, sir.

Senator WARREN. Advising the accused to plead guilty is, I think, unfortunately becoming very common in our civil procedure.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes. It ought not to be done, but it is done sometimes.

Senator WARREN. In our western country it is done quite often.

I wanted to ask the major one more question. I asked about enlisted men on courts-martial. I wanted to ask, if they were to serve, the enlisted men working together as they do, with very strong likes and very strong dislikes among each other, would that probably affect their judgment and findings, or would they be judicial, and act without regard to their affiliations or feelings, with their fellow men?

Maj. RUNCIE. I would not expect to find judicial characteristics of a high order among enlisted men.

Senator WARREN. Perhaps I ought not to have put it that way, but I meant to ask whether their feelings, their likes and dislikes, would bear the test of cool judgment?

Maj. RUNCIE. I am afraid they would not.

Senator WARREN. Excuse me for interrupting, Senator.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is all right. I have asked the major about all the questions that I wanted to ask.

Maj. RUNCIE. In the absence of any experience of that kind with enlisted men, it is mere conjecture.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The differences between modern administration of law in the Army and the old-time administration of it are illustrated by the case of a very distinguished Senator who says that when as a private, during the Civil War, he was on duty as a sentinel and went to sleep at his post and his commanding officer came along while he was asleep and took his gun away from him and then waked him up; and he said his commanding officer just put his hand on his shoulder and told him that he had been guilty of an offense which under ordinary circumstances would have caused him to be shot, but, he said, he would not say anything about it, and he asked the soldier not to say anything about it: he excused him, and advised him as a father might advise a son. That man made a splendid soldier and he certainly has made a splendid Senator; but under the modern theory that man would have been shot.

Maj. RUNCIE. It would be a matter of accident whether he would be shot or not, because the latitude of these courts—well—it covers 180 degrees.

I sat on a court-martial, once, at the time of the War with Spain, which tried a sentinel for being asleep on post. Of course he was an ignorant and inexperienced volunteer; State troops, you know, mustered into the service of the United States. He had seen no occasion to spend an uncomfortable two hours as sentinel over a quartermaster's corral, so he pulled down a bale of hay and opened it out, and made himself comfortable and turned in and went to sleep. On his trial his counsel moved for a change of venue, a thing utterly unknown to the military procedure. That having been disposed of, the case proceeded, and the man was found guilty. By the rules under which courts-martial proceed, the mildest sentence proposed must be the first one voted upon, and the first one offered in this case was that he be fined $1 and costs. (Laughter.) Those officers could not conceive that it was different from a police court trial in their home towns for some trivial offense.

Senator WARREN. Now, returning to your idea of a legal division as compared with the medical division of the Army, that brings another thought to my mind. Of course, of the Army and Navy of the United States the President of the United States is Commander in Chief. Start and come down from there through the various ranks all the way down to the private without reference, as you might say, to civil life or civil procedure or civil courts. Of course the kind of happenings that are liable to take place in the Army, which are supposed to take place, especially if the troops are in the field, at war, are different, and very different from what they are in civil life, and of course the enormity of a transgression, the weight of it, or whether it is weak or strong, is oftentimes judged by the surrounding circumstances. For instance, a man in a camp down here in this country goes to town to have a little fun and he is gone a day and then gets back; that is one thing. If a man is in the trenches with his fellows and he gets out and is gone at the time when a battle with the enemy is expected, that is another thing. I do not understand that you would expect to have all of that matter considered in the home courts afterwards, that the papers may show, without reference to what the conditions may have been or the circumstances which made that offense black or only slightly colored. Am I right about it?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes; you are perfectly right. The record should show all those conditions.

Senator WARREN. Unfortunately, I think that it does not show enough.

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes; but it should show, and with a proper organization in the time of peace for the administration of military justice we would not have all these troubles in time of war. The sole purpose of maintaining an army for our country now is preparation for war. We should not permit ourselves to prepare in time of peace a military establishment which is to be destroyed in time of war in order to make something that will fit the conditions of war, and we should have, especially in the matter of administration of military justice, something which is determinate from the beginning to the end; something that will compare with the steps in the procedure in criminal cases in courts of law and the corresponding steps of procedure in civil courts, and will see that at every step in military procedure everything in the nature of personal, arbitrary, capricious interference is done away with.

In the matter of accusation, to begin, I would like to say here that I do not see any reason why in the pending bill provision should be made that only an officer or an enlisted man may prefer charges. I think that an affidavit by anybody which sets up a state of facts which involves a military offense should be accepted as a basis for charges, just as you have it in a civil court.

Then the military authority should not be at liberty, in a proper case, to say whether there shall or shall not be a prosecution.

Again referring to my own experience, I recall the case of an officer of rather high rank who was twice accused on grave charges. The court for his trial was called each time, the second time occurring some months or about a year after the first, as I remember, and everything was ready in each case to proceed when an arbitrary order was received from higher authority stopping the whole thing. Nothing was done. The officer could not be brought to trial.

In another case, many years ago, an officer followed for years a course of what in the case of any civilian would have been called plain swindling. Other officers for single acts of the same character were tried, dismissed, and even sent to penal servitude, but nothing could be done to bring to justice the officer who was repeatedly guilty of the identical offense. As I recall the case, he was never punished at all. When such things can and do occur, it is nonsense to talk about "military law" as law.

When the case goes to trial the action of the court is quite often determined not in absolute and deliberate violation of law, but in ignorance of law; much more so than in civil cases. I am not reproaching the officers. They can not be expected to know how to deal with these questions. They might just as well try to deal with the diagnosis of a medical or surgical case—a difficult case.

Then when the trial is over other openings are reached for the arbitrary interference of the reviewing authority; and finally, even when that has been successfully passed, I think you will find in the Judge Advocate General's Office here records of cases that have never been finally acted upon. Presumably an officer has been convicted, and it is inconvenient——

Senator WARREN. You mean the punishment has not been carried into effect?

Maj. RUNCIE. Nothing whatever has been done. It was inconvenient to proceed further, and the case died; exactly as if after a jury had returned its verdict and judgment had been entered, the court did not proceed to sentence and execution; or it did not proceed to judgment even.

Senator WARREN. Is that the fault of the law, or is it because of criminal neglect of duty on the part of officers, under the law? Because of course that is inexcusable and wicked.

Maj. RUNCIE. I recall one such case. There may be others. You can not at any stage insure the action of the legal machine, as you can in the criminal courts of the land.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It is almost impossible, sometimes, to get the records in these cases.

Maj. RUNCIE. They are not public records. They are not accessible, I think.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. They ought to be.

Maj. RUNCIE. I think so.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I do not see why a man who is convicted in a military court should not have the same right to have the light turned in on the proceedings as a man convicted in a civil case.

Maj. RUNCIE. The person tried by general court-martial always has the right to a complete copy of the proceedings.

Senator LENROOT. Not until after it is fully completed. I have a case now in my desk where an officer was tried 20 weeks ago, and he can get no information, and I can get no information.

Maj. RUNCIE. Until the record is complete, he has no right to it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Is it not true, Major, that many times the proceedings are held behind closed doors, where these trials are had?

Maj. RUNCIE. Only in that part of the proceedings in which the court reaches its findings and imposes the sentence, in case of a conviction. But, as a rule, all of the other proceedings of courts-martial are open.

Senator WARREN. Major, when nations can not agree they go to war, just as sometimes towns get into difficulties which are beyond the reach of town governments and county governments and they declare martial law. As I understand you, you appreciate the fact that the military establishment must have immediate action in law-making and trials, as towns declare martial law; but you desire, in the first place, that they shall be tried by those who are well educated and grounded in the law, when it comes to trial?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes.

Senator WARREN. And then you want their cases reviewed by a reviewing court, which is entirely outside of military lines?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes, sir; because the Army is supposed to be governed by law; not law prescribed by military authority, but by the Congress of the United States. That is the fundamental difference.

Senator WARREN. Now, if I understand you correctly, you want this last court of refuge to be absolutely outside of the Army; is that right?

Maj. RUNCIE. Outside of military control in the discharge of their function as a court, but within the Army, if you please—attached to it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I so understood him. You think they ought to wear a uniform?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes, though I think that unimportant.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And be a part of the Army?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But be outside of the jurisdiction of the commanding officer.

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes, sir; in the exercise of their judicial duties.

Senator WARREN. They should be of the Army and serving regularly?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes; but the Judge Advocate General, if he possessed, for instance, the revisory power which Gen. Ansell contends he does possess——

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In which you do not agree?

Maj. RUNCIE. I do not accept that; but in the exercise of that power, if he did possess it, he should be absolutely free from that control by the General Staff which the law now imposes on him.

Senator WARREN. He should be, in one sense, next to the President.

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Instead of being the adviser of the military authorities, he should be independent of them?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN (continuing). And determine whether the court had jurisdiction——

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN (continuing). Whether the proceedings had been regular——

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN (continuing). And whether, under all the circumstances, the case ought to be modified, reversed, or annulled?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes, sir.

Senator WARREN. Of course in the great multitude of these minor affairs that happen to-day and are punished to-morrow the sentence is completed in a week or two, and you could hardly expect such cases to reach that court?

Maj. RUNCIE. Oh, no.

Senator WARREN. You are speaking now of the really important matters?

Maj. RUNCIE. Important matters; yes, sir.

Senator LENROOT. I did not quite understand whether you were in favor of giving to the judge advocate's office, as such, powers of revision?

Maj. RUNCIE. Oh, no.

Senator LENROOT. Or for the creation of a court or both?

Maj. RUNCIE. Oh, no. I just made a hypothetical case, if the Judge Advocate General's office did possess those powers. I think it would be much better if they were vested in a court.

Senator LENROOT. You stated that you thought wherever a charge was made a court-martial should follow; that there should not be a discretion in the commanding officer to decline?

Maj. RUNCIE. Oh, no. When a charge is made, such proceedings should be had as that before a committing magistrate or before the grand jury in a criminal case; that is, it should be submitted to the law officer of the commanding officer.

Senator LENROOT. Is not that the practice now?

Maj. RUNCIE. Not always.

Senator LENROOT. It has been my limited experience that where charges are made the matter is referred to an investigator for a full report before a court-martial is ordered.

Maj. RUNCIE. I think that is true in the cases of officers, but in a great majority of the cases of enlisted men that come before the minor courts-martial, because of course I have been for a long time out of touch with it and am not familiar with details——

Senator WARREN. I think that is true, although matters of hurry and worry and lack of evidence may sometimes cause cases to be taken up that have not been investigated.

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes; but in any case, for instance, if a civilian feels himself aggrieved by the action of an officer, on submitting proper affidavits setting forth the facts, it should not be left entirely to the discretion of a commanding officer and the officer's legal advisor, who is, of course, his subordinate, whether the charges shall or shall not be tried. If the commanding officer to whom the charge is submitted disapproves or refuses to proceed, there should be an appeal, as from a committing magistrate to a grand jury.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What harm could result from the creation of an appellate tribunal in connection with the Military Establishment? What harm could happen to the Government or the Military Establishment after a man was tried for a crime and the commanding officer approved his sentence (it might be for 20 years' imprisonment) if an appeal could be taken by him from the commanding officer to the appellate tribunal? All of the time until the tribunal disposed of his case he would be in confinement, and what harm could result from that course of procedure?

Maj. RUNCIE. None at all; but benefit, as in the case I have referred to.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It would give any man the benefit of a trial before such a tribunal.

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes. If there had been such a tribunal at any time after the Civil War, I have no doubt that the gross injustice done to Gen. Fitz-John Porter would have been remedied by legal process.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Within a few months?

Maj. RUNCIE. Within a year, at most.

Senator WARREN. As it was, it was not done for a long time?

Maj. RUNCIE. It went for 20 years.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It got into political channels, finally.

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes. On that court-martial which convicted Gen. Porter there were some officers who for certain reasons objected to his rehabilitation, and I think that at the end of that inquiry there was no dissension, in military opinion, as to Gen. Porter's conduct at the second Manassas.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I have no other questions to ask unless the other Senators have. May I ask you one other thing? In a few words, what are the inherent vices of the present court-martial system?

Senator LENROOT. Before he answers that, I would like to ask a question or two.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly. Go ahead.

Senator LENROOT. I understood you to say in the beginning of your testimony that you did not think there was any cure for this condition unless the Army was consolidated into brigades and divisions.

Maj. RUNCIE. Not necessarily; but I mean, in more general terms, unless it be made a purely military organization; that it should have no civil functions; that the War Department should not be concerned with building bridges over navigable streams, and things like that. All of those excrescences on the Military Establishment are inheritances from conditions that no longer exist.

Senator LENROOT. That is a distinct division, is it not, that does that work?

Maj. RUNCIE. No; it is a part of the Military Establishment.

Senator LENROOT. It is a part of the Military Establishment, so far as it is concerned. That only relates to the board of engineers.

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes; but the Judge Advocate General, for instance, is counsel of the Secretary of War in all those matters that relate to navigable waters and riparian rights; and they have all sorts of things. Those things have no place in a military establishment. But 100 or 140 years ago, when our Government was young and the executive departments were only four in number, the only engineers in this country were the military engineers, a few that we had gotten from France and who were the fathers of all the engineering in our country. Just as the Treasury Department continued for many years to be a catch-all for all executive functions which did not specially belong to any other department, the War Department became the receptacle for what really amounts to a department of public works.

Senator LENROOT. Yes; but there is a very good reason for that with this matter of the engineers, and certainly you could not expect the Government to educate and maintain a large body of engineers with nothing to do, merely in preparation for their services to be utilized in time of war, when we have a war, nobody utilizing them in efficient public service. When the war came on, we took practically every one of those men and sent them to France, and they could render most efficient service.

Maj. RUNCIE. That really raises another question. The Corps of Military Engineers should be limited to the needs of the military service. The great bulk of the engineering work is not done by the Corps of Engineers. The engineers are administrators and disbursing officers.

Senator LENROOT. Who does the engineering work?

Maj. RUNCIE. The thousands of civil engineers whom they employ.

Senator LENROOT. I think you are mistaken.

Maj. RUNCIE. I have been acquainted with them for 40 years.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You go to any of these district engineer's offices and you will find two or three of them only are engineers, and all the rest of the force in the office are clerical force and draftsmen, and so on.

Senator LENROOT. Of the office force; but in every case that I have ever observed, and I am very familiar with that, the chief, the district engineer, is a competent qualified man. He does not get superior qualities from his assistants.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Probably not.

Maj. RUNCIE. There might be different opinions as to that; but the result is the introduction into the military establishment of an incompatible and nonmilitary element. The Engineer officer who has been sitting in an office and looking, however well, after river and harbor work, loses his military character.

Senator LENROOT. What would he do if he did not do that?

Maj. RUNCIE. If we had brigade and division posts, every one of them would have its complement of engineer officers, as well as of medical officers and ordnance officers, and they would devote themselves to the preparation of the military material which falls to the part of their corps, to the construction and maintenance of military works and the training of engineer troops. I think there is no question but that the engineering talent of our country developed by the engineering schools of our country is quite competent to take care of the civil engineering that our Government has to have done.

Senator LENROOT. It is quite competent to do it; but, having in mind the condition of the Treasury, it becomes somewhat of an element if we can utilize to do that work, without loss of efficiency in their own sphere, these men we have educated.

Maj. RUNCIE. The engineer who distinguishes himself in engineering work is educated at his own expense. If we want military engineers we should take educated engineers and give them the necessary training to equip them for military work, I think, instead of reversing the process.

Senator LENROOT. Then, you would not educate engineers as such at West Point at all?

Maj. RUNCIE. No, not any more than we educate medical officers. We do not educate engineers at West Point. We can not make an engineer with six months of engineering at that school.

Senator LENROOT. Is that all that he has?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes; that is practically all.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. They just appoint the first five in each class to the engineering class.

Maj. RUNCIE. That is it. We might as well just take the first six men in the class and send them to a medical school for six months' instruction in medicine, and then call them medical officers.

Senator WARREN. Nearly all the men go into the Infantry and Cavalry afterwards.

Maj. RUNCIE. That raises, of course, another question which I think should receive serious attention. It costs approximately $20,000 to put a cadet through the Military Academy.

Senator WARREN. It costs the Government that?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes.

Senator WARREN. And it costs the cadet something, too?

Maj. RUNCIE. Nothing.

Senator WARREN. It costs him in certain ways?

Maj. RUNCIE. Nothing.

Senator WARREN. In other words, he can not pay for his uniforms and living from the money taken from his salary. At least, they do not, most of them.

Maj. RUNCIE. The income of a cadet, what he actually receives in value while he is also receiving his education, is, or was until a short time ago, at least, greater than the income of the average wage-earning family in the United States.

Senator WARREN. It was intended to cover his expenses, I understand.

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes; but it is greater than that of the average wage-earning family of the United States. Less than two years ago the Secretary of the Interior, as chairman of the board that looked into the remuneration of railroad employees, found—I am quoting only from memory—that something over 50 per cent of the railroad employees of the country received not more than $75 per month, and that something like 80 per cent of them received not more than $100 a month. The pay and allowances of a cadet while receiving his education will be at least $100 a month, and in addition to that approximately three times as much will be spent on him as is given to him.

Senator LENROOT. To get back: If I understand you, in your mind there are two paramount evils to be remedied. One is the lack of all authoritative interpretation of law binding on courts-martial.

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes.

Senator LENROOT. And, second, is the arbitrary power of the commanding officer as to courts-martial?

Maj. RUNCIE. Yes.

Senator LENROOT. If we had a military court of appeals, with their decisions to be published and building up a body of military law, with the doctrine, as you said, of stare decisis binding on all courts-martial, would we not do a very great deal to remedy present conditions?

Maj. RUNCIE. I think you would overcome at least three-fourths of the injustice that results not only in positive wrong, but in failure to do justice, by omission, at present.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What remedy have you for the other one-fourth that it would not reach?

Maj. RUNCIE. I leave that quarter, as we say in the courts of law, with which we are all familiar——

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It is hard to find a remedy?

Maj. RUNCIE. It is hard to find a remedy. We charge that to the fallibility of human judgment and intelligence, even with the best of motives.

But even underlying all this is a much more serious question. All of this legislation treats only symptoms; it does not go to the cause of the disease; and until there is a military establishment, legislation will fail to cure the defects of our present organization.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is all I care to ask the major.

Senator WARREN. Have you anything further to submit?

Maj. RUNCIE. No, sir.

(Thereupon, at 3.20 o'clock p. m., the subcommittee adjourned to meet at 1 o'clock p. m. on Monday, August 18, 1919.)

ESTABLISHMENT OF MILITARY JUSTICE—PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF THE ARTICLES OF WAR.

MONDAY, AUGUST 25, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to the call of the chairman, in the room of the Committee on Appropriations in the Capitol, at 10 o'clock a. m., Senator Irvine L. Lenroot presiding.

Present: Senators Lenroot (acting chairman) and Chamberlain.

Senator LENROOT. Will you proceed now, Gen. Ansell, and make such statement as you desire?

STATEMENT OF MR. SAMUEL T. ANSELL, FORMERLY BRIGADIER GENERAL AND ACTING JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL, UNITED STATES ARMY.

Mr. ANSELL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the subject of military justice is one in which I think every Army officer ought to be specially interested, and the people themselves generally interested.

I, myself, have been specially interested in this subject since my cadet days. The system of military justice that is ours, it has always appeared to me, does not fit the kind of army with which we must fight the battles of this country; that is, an army that is not composed of professional soldiers entirely—a standing army—but an army that is created for the emergency out of our citizenship.

The old idea has been that a court-martial, which is the agency for executing the disciplinary law of the Army, is a rough and ready tribunal, and must necessarily be so; that it is not a court at all; that it is an agency of a military commander to investigate facts and recommend what disciplinary action ought to be taken; that it is a body responding purely to the exigencies of a military situation; not a normal thing, not governed by principles of law at all.

That was, as I shall show later on, the old continental idea, and it was the theory of the system, was indeed the system, which we ourselves adopted, rather witlessly, when we established this Government.

I think it is by reason of this that courts-martial, as we understand them, have really never had the confidence of our people. They, as a rule, have been sneered at by the legal profession, and it has been pointed out by great lawyers, beginning with Blackstone, that they were not to be regarded as courts at all; that the law governing them was not law at all, in any proper sense, and that they were not to be relied upon as legal tribunals.

Throughout my experience in the Army I have observed, too frequently, that courts-martial in our system——

Senator LENROOT. Might I suggest that at this point it might be well for you to state when you graduated from West Point, and what your experience has been.

Mr. ANSELL. I graduated from West Point in 1899, was immediately thereafter assigned to the Eleventh Infantry as a line officer, served first in Porto Rico and then went to the Philippines in 1900, and stayed there—serving part of the time with the civil government—until the insurrection was over. In 1902 I left the Philippines and went to West Point as an instructor in law, and remained there on such duty until 1904, when I applied again to rejoin my regiment, stationed at Fort Russell. I served with my regiment then until 1906, when I was again assigned to West Point as instructor in law.

I remained at West Point until 1909, when I was ordered to the Philippines, and while there was detached for duty with the civil government, at the same time, however, performing the duties of judge advocate of the Province of Mindanao, which was under the command of Gen. Pershing.

I returned from the Philippines in 1911 and was assistant judge advocate of the Department of the East until 1912—for a year—and was then ordered to duty in the office of the Judge Advocate General, in 1912, where I have been ever since.

My duties in the office of the Judge Advocate General were, until the beginning of this war, those of legal adviser to the civil jurisdiction of the War Department, including control of the rivers and harbors and reservations—such other civil matters as come under the War Department jurisdiction.

I was also, by special assignment, counsel for the governments of Porto Rico and of the Philippines before the courts of the United States.

My line service, then, includes a service with the Infantry of something less than five years, and something less than two years of that time was in active service in the field in the Philippine Islands. The rest of my service has been in the law department of the Army and on special assignment as counsel for the insular governments.

Senator LENROOT. When did you resign?

Mr. ANSELL. I resigned on the 21st of July last.

Shortly after the war broke out, by virtue of being the senior officer in the department, I became the head of the Judge Advocate General's Department during the absence of Gen. Crowder, when he was performing the duties of Provost Marshal General.

In October of 1917 I was appointed brigadier general and Judge Advocate, and retained as Acting Judge Advocate General while the Judge Advocate General himself was performing the duties of the Provost Marshal General.

During the greater part of the war I was Acting Judge Advocate General, in the sense that I was senior officer on duty in that department. That does not mean that I was responsible for the policies of the office, since a man succeeding by mere virtue of seniority can not be. In order to be responsible for the policies of the office a man must be assigned under section 1132 of the Revised Statutes as acting chief of bureau.

With no other purpose than that of responding to the chairman's question, I mention the fact that while in the latter days of 1917 an order was published, reciting that it was by direction of the President, appointing me Acting Judge Advocate General of the Army, that order was revoked. I was not in charge of the policies of the office. I made no appointments to the office during the war.

Senator LENROOT. You said, General, that order was revoked? Did I understand you correctly?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes, sir.

Senator LENROOT. How long after the order was published?

Mr. ANSELL. I think the order was never published in printed form. It was delivered to me in the usual typewritten form, properly authenticated, and I should say within a week after it was delivered to me it was revoked or suppressed or otherwise made ineffectual.

I think that we might as well understand right here—and I say this in no spirit of criticism, but as a fact—that my views with respect to the administration of military justice were not concurred in by those bureau chiefs of the War Department who have most to do with the government and regulation of the exercise of military command. My views were not concurred in, speaking more specifically, by the then Acting Chief of Staff, and by the Inspector General of the Army, and though at first they were, later they were not concurred in by the Judge Advocate General himself. I think it is in point to state right here that the first great difference of view between me and the War Department—by which term I mean those bureaus the chiefs of which I have just mentioned, with whom the Secretary of War himself finally concurred—came about shortly after I had assumed charge of the office.

There came to the office, which at that time consisted of myself and 14 civil lawyers and one retired officer of the Army, a case from the Department of Texas, which has become something of a cause celebre respecting military justice during the war. That case was a case of about a dozen noncommissioned officers of the Army who had been tried upon the charge of mutiny. It was perfectly obvious to all of us that the men ought not to have been tried at all, and that such trial as they had was illegal in many respects. The charge itself was imperfect as a matter of law; the defense made for them was not such defense as ought to have been made for them, and the counsel that they had did not give them that full assistance which ought to have been given them. Their rights were generally disregarded during the trial, and their right to make defense and to make the proper inquiry into the sufficiency of the charge and the proceeding. They had been court-martialed upon charges that had been preferred by a young West Point officer who was not an experienced man, who ought not to have preferred the charges at all, whose conduct itself was lawless and arbitrary and wrong, and who, in my judgment, ought to have been court-martialed himself for his part in this affair.

But this case went through the entire proceeding, from the bottom to the top of the military hierarchy—the top of the hierarchy being a major general in command of the department—without the discovery or detection of any of these errors; or if they were discovered they were ignored; with the result that this trial, which was wrong in its inception, and in which the legal rights of the accused were at no point protected, resulted in the dismissal of these old noncommissioned officers of the Army from the Army of the United States, in disgrace, and in their being sentenced to long terms of confinement in the penitentiary for this most heinous, perhaps, of all military offenses, mutiny.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. General, pardon me; I am not familiar with the case. of course; but you are making a record here. As a matter of fact, these men were tried for mutiny because they had refused to obey an order?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Will you just put in the record the facts out of which this charge of mutiny grew?

Mr. ANSELL. The origin, as I remember it—I must be fairly familiar with it, having gone over it so many times, but I am speaking from memory—was this:

These noncommissioned officers, and perhaps other men of the batteries, were engaged in some mild form of gambling in the company street—perhaps the shooting of craps or some such game. This, of course, is in violation of the standing orders of camps of the Army generally. It ought to be stated, however, that as a human fact it is one of those things which, when unaccompanied by disorder, a man used to the handling of men closes his eyes to or otherwise gets rid of without the application of harsh disciplinary measures. However, this young officer put these noncommissioned officers in arrest in quarters for their participation in this mild gambling. It is according to long-standing orders of the War Department that a noncommissioned officer when placed in arrest in quarters performs no duty. In that respect he is like an officer. He is deprived of all his official powers and functions during the period of that status.

This young officer, however, the next morning, observing that these noncommissioned officers were not present at the early drill formation, made inquiry, and they said to him that having been put in arrest they felt obliged respectfully to say to him—and they did respectfully say to him—that as long as they were in arrest they could not go to drill, for the obvious reason that in accordance with the orders of the War Department they could exercise none of their functions as noncommissioned officers. Notwithstanding this obvious truth, and notwithstanding the very proper and respectful demeanor of the men when they asserted their right under this standing order of the department, the young officer ordered them to drill; and again they said that if they should go to drill they ought to be released from arrest. There was no concerted action. It was a thing well understood, however by all noncommissioned officers and doubtless the voices of the few who spoke were the voices of them all.

After the young officer threatened them with charges of mutiny, told them that charges of mutiny would be preferred because of the fact that all were disobeying, as he called it, his orders, he marched them off to the guard house and put them in close confinement, charged with mutiny. Of course, mutiny must be a concerted action on the part of those under military authority, concerted lawless action, with an intent to subvert and assume military authority. That is what they were charged with, mutiny, and that is what they were tried and punished for.

Now, when that case got to the department, it was perfectly patent not only that this state of affairs—the facts—did not sustain the charge of mutiny at any point, but that the charge itself was improperly drafted in that it did not set out all the essential elements of the mutiny, and, furthermore, that during the progress of the trial the substantial rights of the men themselves at many points were not protected, so that everybody conceded that without applying meticulous tests to the legality of this proceeding, it ought not, if it could be tested by law, to stand.

Senator LENROOT. May I ask you there, was the verdict of the court-martial approved by the commanding officer?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes, sir.

Senator LENROOT. Did it go from there direct to your office?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes, sir.

Senator LENROOT. Did the record affirmatively show that at the time of the action complained of the noncommissioned officers were under arrest?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes, sir.

Senator LENROOT. That appeared on the face of the record?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes, sir; the facts I have given here.

Senator LENROOT. That appeared upon the record of the court-martial?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes, sir. This was at the beginning of the war, and we knew, of course—expected—that there would be many like cases; and that brought us face to face with the fact that under the practice of the War Department, as suggested at that time, although the proceedings might contain errors of law that at least measured up to reversible error if not annihilating error, it was the practice of the War Department to say, and to act accordingly, that notwithstanding such error it was not reviewable and was therefore incurable. In other words, the War Department at that time held that the proceedings, findings, and judgment of a court-martial are final beyond all remedial, curative power, when those proceedings and judgment are once approved by the commanding general who brought that court into being, regardless of whatever errors of law were committed in the proceedings; and that, conceding that the record was full of such errors, it could not be examined.

Senator LENROOT. That is to say, that the only power of higher authorities and officials would be in the exercise of clemency?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; that there was no way of modifying the judgment, whatever. It was beyond all review regardless of its conceded illegality.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do not leave that open in the record to misunderstanding. You do not mean that that power existed in the Judge Advocate General, when you speak of the power to exercise clemency?

Senator LENROOT. No; I meant if exercised by the President.

Mr. ANSELL. The Judge Advocate General's office has been in such cases limited to the power of exercising clemency in an advisory way.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. ANSELL. So, that the situation at the beginning of the war was—and it is still largely the situation—that a court-martial judgment can not be modified by any power on earth no matter what prejudicial errors of law were committed in the proceeding. It is around that proposition that the whole controversy—if we can refer to it as a controversy, and I presume we may—revolves. I contend, in short, that a court-martial is a court; that it is a court created by Congress under its power to make rules and regulations for the government of the Army; that it is just as much of a court, though not a part, evidently, of the Federal judiciary, as the courts of the District of Columbia are courts; that it is there to apply the law of Congress passed in this regard; that there is to be a trial, and that the law contemplates a fair trial, with all that that term means; that the court being a court, it is to be governed by law from beginning to end; and that if it commits errors of law there ought to be some method of correcting those errors if prejudicial, and modifying the judgment accordingly.

We sought, all of us, and independently, regarding it as a most important matter, at the beginning of this great war, because obviously all powers affecting courts-martial are powers conferred by Congress itself, to discover some statutory authority for modifying judgments of courts-martial in cases of this sort, where, if they could be tested by law, they were concededly illegal.

Several of the officers of the department came at once upon that section of the Revised Statutes of the United States, section 1199, which provides that all proceedings of courts-martial shall be received in the office of the Judge Advocate General, and by him be revised.

In the pursuit of that study, various memoranda were written by various officers, various conferences were held, and finally, without a single dissent, the officers on duty with that office agreed that within this statute was to be found the power to revise the judgments of courts-martial. At that time the Judge Advocate General was not on duty in the office, but he agreed with me that the power was advisable, that it ought to be located there; that it ought to exist; and he expressed his concurrence with my efforts to deduce it out of that statute. Later on, he changed his mind.

Senator LENROOT. Have you rendered a written opinion that he concurred in?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; that opinion is in the record of the hearings upon your bill—the Chamberlain bill—Senator Chamberlain, of the last session of the last Congress. Whether you wish it put in the record of these hearings or not, I do not know, Mr. Chairman.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What do you think about it, Senator Lenroot, that it ought to be printed or not?

Senator LENROOT. You are more familiar with how material that is going to be to your issue, and I will accept your suggestion, whatever it is, about that.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I think probably it ought to go in.

Senator LENROOT. Very well.

Mr. ANSELL. Then I ask permission to insert at this point the office opinion in the mutiny case above referred to—the office opinion in support of the action taken in that case; and I think, in fairness, the counter opinion of the Judge Advocate General and the ruling of the Secretary of War ought to be included at this point, also.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Very well.

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

(The documents referred to and the ruling of the Secretary of War are here printed in full as follows:)

ANSELL EXHIBIT A.

OFFICE OPINION OF BRIG. GEN. S. T. ANSELL, ACTING JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL: RE REVISORY POWER OVER COURTS-MARTIAL PROCEEDINGS AND SENTENCES.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., November 10, 1917.

Memorandum for the Secretary of War

Subject: Authority vested in the Judge Advocate General of the Army by section 1199, Revised Statutes, to "receive, revise, and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions, and perform such other duties as have been performed heretofore by the Judge Advocate General of the Army."

1. It is my duty to bring to your attention and present to you my views upon a long-existing situation which arose out of an ill-considered and erroneous change of attitude upon the part of this office that occurred within a score of years after the close of the Civil War—a situation which has endured ever since in the face of the law and in spite of attending difficulties but without reexamination, and which has profoundly affected the administration of military justice in our Army. I refer to the practice of this office, adopted it seems in the early eighties, to the effect that errors of law, appearing on the record, occurring in the procedure of courts-martial having jurisdiction however grave and prejudicial such errors may be, are absolutely beyond all power of review. This nonuser of power which Congress authorized and required this office to exercise, has, in numberless instances of court-martial of members of our Military Establishment, resulted in a denial of simple justice guaranteed them by law. Under the rule, concededly illegal and unjust court-martial sentences, when once approved and ordered executed by the authorities below, pass beyond all corrective power here and can never be remedied in the slightest degree or modified, except by an exercise of Executive clemency—an utterly inadequate remedy, in that it must proceed upon the predicate of legality, can operate only on unexecuted punishment, and, besides, has no restorative powers.

2. The last and most flagrant case of the many recent ones which have moved me to exercise an authority of this office which has long lain dormant, perhaps denied, in respect of which I address you this memorandum, was the recent case of the trial and conviction for mutiny of 12 or 15 noncommissioned officers of Battery A of the Eighteenth Field Artillery, resulting in sentencing them to dishonorable discharge and long terms of imprisonment. Those men did not commit mutiny. They were driven into the situation which served as the basis of the charge by the unwarranted and capricious conduct of a young officer commanding the battery who had been out of the Military Academy but two years. Notwithstanding the offense was not at all made out by the evidence of record, notwithstanding the oppressive and tyrannical conduct of the battery commander, notwithstanding the unfair and unjust attitude of the judge advocate, which also appeared on the record, these noncommissioned officers were expelled from the Army in dishonor and sentenced to terms of imprisonment ranging from seven to three years. The court had jurisdiction, and its judgment and sentence for that reason could not be pronounced null and void, but its conduct of the trial involved the commission of many errors of law which appeared upon the face of the record and justified, upon revision, a reversal of that judgment. That case showed the extreme and urgent necessity of a reexamination of my powers in such cases, and, after thorough consideration and with the concurrence of all my office associates, I took action in that case and concluded my review as follows:

"In the exercise of the power of revision conferred upon me by section 1199, Revised Statutes of the United States, I hereby set aside the judgment of conviction and the sentence in the case of each of these several defendants and recommend that the necessary orders be issued restoring each of them to duty."

Since this involves a departure from long-established peace-time administration of this office, I deem it my duty to acquaint you with the reasons therefor.

3. You, Mr. Secretary, and your immediate military advisers, can never appreciate, I think, the full extent of the injustice that has been done our men through the operation of this rule. Officers of our Army, howsoever sympathetic, can not approach a proper appreciation of the depth, extent, and generality of the injustice done, unless, through service in this office, they have seen the thing in the aggregate. A proper sense of the injustice can be felt only by those who exercise immediately the authority of this office. Indeed, those thus experienced can gather the full impression of the wrong done only by a complete mental inclusion of that vast number of cases where concededly corrective power ought to have been, but was not, exercised in each year of the past forty-odd years. My entire service, during all of which I have been keenly sensible and morally certain that the office practice was wrong, my six years' service in this office during which I have borne witness to hundreds of instances of conceded and uncorrected injustice—all of this has never served to impress me with the full sense of the wrong done to the individual and to the service so much as has the experience of my present brief incumbency of this office during this war. What is true in my case is true, so they advise me, of my associates. During the past three months, in scores, if not hundreds of cases carrying sentence of dishonorable expulsion from the Army with the usual imprisonment, this office has emphatically remarked the most prejudicial error of law in the proceedings leading to the judgment of conviction, but impelled by the long-established practice has been able to do no more than point out the error and recommend Executive clemency. All this, of course, has been utterly inadequate. It has not righted the wrong. It has not made amends to the injured man. It has not restored him, and could not restore him, to his honorable position in the service. It could do no more than grant pardon for any portion of the sentence not yet executed. Such a situation commands me to say, with all the emphasis in my power, that it must be changed and changed without delay. This office must go back to the law as it stands so clearly written, and, in the interest of right and justice, exercise that authority which the law of Congress has commanded it to exercise.

4. The Judge Advocate General of the Army is to revise all courts-martial proceedings for prejudicial error and correct the same. The law as it exists to-day is to be found in section 1199, Revised Statutes, wherein it is provided that—

"The Judge Advocate General shall receive, revise, and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions, and perform such other duties as have been performed heretofore by the Judge Advocate General of the Army."

The word "revise," whether used in its legal or ordinary sense, for both are the same, can have but one meaning. It signifies an examination of the record for errors of law upon the face of the record and the correction of such errors as may be found. "Revise," or its exact synonym "review," is a word so frequently found in the law and so familiar to all lawyers that its meaning can never be mistaken. When used in connection with judicial proceedings it can involve no ambiguity. I am justified in entering upon a construction of the word only by the fact that this office for so long a time has ignored its meaning.

The word "revise" by the Standard Dictionary is defined thus:

"To go or look or examine for correction or errors, or for the purpose of suggesting or making amendments, additions, or changes; reexamine; review. Hence, to change or correct anything as for the better or by authority; alter or reform."

And the word "review" given therein as a synonym for "revise," is defined as—

"To go over and examine again; to consider or examine again (as something done or adjudged by a lower court) with a view to passing upon its legality or correctness; reconsider with a view to correction; as, the court of appeals reviewed the judgment; the judge reviewed and retaxed the bill of costs; to see or look over again; a literal meaning now rare."

In 34 Cys., at page 1723, the word "revise" is defined as—

"To review or reexamine for corrections; to review, or alter or amend. See also 'revision.'"

And the word "revision" is therein defined as—

"The act of reexamination to correct, review, alter or amend."

And in Black's Law Dictionary, "revise" is defined as—

"To review, to reexamine for correction; to go over a thing for the purpose of amending, correcting, rearranging or otherwise improving it."

And "review" is therein defined as—

"A reconsideration; second view or examination; revision; consideration for purpose of correction. Used especially of the examination of a cause by an appellate court."

And the word "revision" is therein defined as—

"To reexamine and amend; as, to revise a judgment, a code, laws, statutes, reports, accounts. Compare 'review.'"

And the word "review" is defined in the same dictionary as—

"viewing again; a second consideration; revisement, reconsideration, reexamination to correct, if necessary, a previous examination."

And in the same dictionary a "court of review" is defined to mean—

"A court whose distinctive function is to pass upon (confirming or reversing) the final decisions of another or other courts."

And in "Words and Phrases" (vol. 7) the word "revise" is defined as follows:

"To revise is to review or reexamine for correction, and when applied to a statute contemplates the reexamination of the same subject-matter contained in a prior statute and the substitution of a new and what is believed to be a still more perfect rule." Citing Casey v. Harned, 5 Iowa (5 Clark) 1, 12.

"Revise as contained in the Constitution, Article XV, section 11, providing that 'three persons learned in the law shall be appointed to revise and rearrange the statute laws of the State,' means to review, alter, and amend, and does not signify an act of absolute origination. It relates to something already in existence." Citing Visart v. Knoppa, 27 Ark., 266-272.

"A law is revised when it is in whole or in part permitted to remain and something is added to or taken from it, or it is in some way changed or altered to make it more complete or perfect or to fit it better to accomplish the object or purpose for which it was made, or some other object or purpose." Citing Falconer v. Robinson, 46 Ala., 340, 348.

5. I find the word used in another Federal statute in quite an analogous way. Section 24 of the act of July 1, 1898, chapter 541, 30 Stat. 553 (bankruptcy law) provides in part as follows:

"The several circuit courts of appeal shall have jurisdiction in equity, either interlocutory or final, to superintend and revise in matters of law the proceedings of the several inferior courts of bankruptcy within that jurisdiction."

The word "revise" as used in the bankruptcy act is universally held to be something broader than the power to review by writ of error. In In re Cole, 163 Fed. 180, 181 (C. C. A., first circuit), a case typical of all, the court, after adverting to the usual limitations upon the power to review by way of writ of error, contrasted that method with the statutory power to revise, as conferred by that act, saying:

"On a petition to revise like that before us we are not restricted as we would be on a writ of error, our outlook is much broadened, and we are authorized to search the opinions filed in the district court, although not a part of the record in the strict sense of the word, for the purpose of ascertaining at large what were in fact the issues which that court considered."

And the court then said:

"We feel safe to adopt the broader view, and it is our present opinion that it is our right so to do—"

And concluded that, upon revision—

"We can revise any question of law as to which we may justly infer that the district court reached a conclusion, whether formally expressed or not and whether or not formally presented."

The language of that statute is the very language of this except that the revision there is expressly limited to matters of law. Inasmuch as in the statute before us there is no such express limitation, it could hardly be held that the revisory power of this office is less than the revisory power conferred by the bankruptcy act. The word "revise" as used in the bankruptcy statute has always been held to signify power to reexamine all matters of law imported by or into the proceedings of the case, and a very liberal view has been taken of what constitutes the record and proceedings in such matters. (See the many cases cited in Federal Reporter Digest. "Bankruptcy," vol. 5, from secs. 349 to 448.) The revisory power there conferred is something broader than that invoked by writ of error, though, of course, not so broad as to justify a reexamination of mere controversies or questions of fact. Doubtless, in any view of the case, the question whether the evidence sustains the verdict, that is, whether there is any substantial evidence at all upon which the verdict may rest, is a question of law which may be reviewed under this power, and such at least must be the power of this office.

6. The history of the legislation, the early execution given it, its historic place in the body of the law of which it is a part, all clearly show that this must be the meaning assigned to the word "revise" in the present instance. It is not necessary now to say whether such revisory power existed in the judge advocate in the early days of our Army, though, especially in view of the English military law, this seems to have been so; nor to advert to the fact that after the War of 1812, and also after the Mexican War, the duty of the Corps of Judge Advocates seems to have been primarily that of military prosecutors.

Nor is it necessary, except to indicate the proper setting, to say that military prosecution had ceased to be the primary function of the Corps of Judge Advocates at the beginning of the Civil War, if not before. Nor is it more than suggestive that the Judge Advocate General of the Army has always presided over both the Corps of Judge Advocates and the Bureau of Military Justice, and that this corps and this bureau were consolidated by the act of 1884 (23 Stats., 113) into what is now the Judge Advocate General's Department. It is important to note that Congress established the Bureau of Military Justice in the light of the necessities of the Civil War and expressly invested its head, the Judge Advocate General of the Army, with this revisory power; and it is important to note that Congress redeclared this power in 1864 (13 Stats., 145), and in 1866 (14 Stats., 334), and again in section 1199, Revised Statutes, of which the former acts were the antecedents. Now, taking up these antecedents: In the act of July 17, 1862 (12 Stats., 598), which was an act "calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, to suppress insurrection, etc.," it was provided—

"That the President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a Judge Advocate General, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of Cavalry, to whose office shall be returned, for revision, all records, and proceedings of all courts-martial and military commissions, and where a record shall be kept of all proceedings had thereupon."

This provision speaks very plainly. It not only directs the Judge Advocate General to revise the records and proceedings of courts-martial, but it further directs that officer to keep a record of "all proceedings had thereupon"; that is, upon the revision. It is clear that this intended something more than a perfunctory scrutiny of such records, and that it in fact vested this office with power to make any correction of errors of law found to be necessary in the administration of justice. The records of this office indicate that Judge Holt, the Judge Advocate General of the Army during the Civil War period, did revise proceedings in the sense here indicated.

The next legislative expression is found in the act of June 20, 1864 (13 Stats. 145), of which sections 5 and 6 are as follows:

"Sec. 5. There shall be attached to, and made a part of, the War Department, during the continuance of the present Rebellion, a bureau to be known as the Bureau of Military Justice, to which shall be returned for revision the records and proceedings of all the courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions of the Armies of the United States, and in which a record shall be kept of all proceedings had thereupon."

"Sec. 6. That the President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as the head of said bureau, a Judge Advocate General, with the rank, pay, and allowances of a brigadier general, and an Assistant Judge Advocate General, with the rank, pay, and allowances of a colonel of Cavalry. And the said Judge Advocate General and his assistant shall receive, revise, and have recorded all proceedings of courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions of the Armies of the United States, and perform such other duties as have heretofore been performed by the Judge Advocate General of the Armies of the United States."

Just as the title of the judge advocate is in itself significant in this connection, so is the title of the bureau thus created—the Bureau of Military Justice. It will be noticed that this act reserves all the requirements of the act of July 17, 1862, supra, concerning the duty of the Judge Advocate General in the matter of revising the records of general courts-martial, and keeping a record of “all proceedings had thereupon,” meaning, of course, proceedings upon such records in revision. And at the close of the war, in the legislation looking to the peace establishment, Congress enacted the act of July 28, 1866 (14 Stat. 334), the same being “An act to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States,” in section 12 whereof it was provided—

“That the Bureau of Military Justice shall hereafter consist of one Judge Advocate General, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general, and one Assistant Judge Advocate General, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of Cavalry; and the said Judge Advocate General shall receive, revise, and have recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions, and shall perform such other duties as have been heretofore performed by the Judge Advocate General of the Army * * *.” This act does not change the duties of the Judge Advocate General with reference to the revision of records of courts-martial. It omits the phrase found in the two acts immediately preceding to the effect that “a record shall be kept of all proceedings had thereupon,” but introduces for the first time the direction that in addition to revising and recording the proceedings of all courts-martial, the Judge Advocate shall “perform such other duties as have been performed heretofore by the Judge Advocate General of the Army.” It will be observed that this last cited expression, as carried into section 1199 of the Revised Statutes as quoted above, still remains the law on the subject. In referring to the duties “heretofore performed by the Judge Advocate General of the Army,” the statute included, inter alia, the duties prescribed by the statute, for the presumption is that the duties thus prescribed were in fact performed. It follows that included within this direction is the mandate that a record be kept of all proceedings had in the revision of courts-martial proceedings in the office of the Judge Advocate General, and the force of this mandate must be added to the ordinary meaning of the word “revise” in determining the scope of the duties of the Judge Advocate General as now defined by law.

7. The legislative history of all the antecedent acts, brought forward as 1199, R. S., shows that the word “revise” has the meaning here indicated. As to the act of 1862, see Congressional Globe, part 4, second session Seventeenth Congress, pages 3320, 3321. This was especially true of the debates upon the act of 1866, of which there was considerable owing to the objection taken to the legislative recognition contained in that bill of military commissions. An effort was made to strike out, and otherwise defeat, the entire provision for the Bureau of Military Justice during peace, and the strongest argument made in support of its retention was found in the fact that it had, and had freely and satisfactorily exercised this revisory power. The whole tenor of the debate clearly shows what Congress understood had been the revisory power of the Judge Advocate General of the Army since the act of 1862. It was said by one Senator (Mr. Lane of Indiana)—

“It is utterly impossible for the President in the multiplicity of his duties to look into all these cases; it is physically impossible for the Secretary of War to do so; and to facilitate the administration of criminal justice, it was found necessary to establish this bureau.”

And another Senator (Mr. Hendricks) said:

“I am not prepared to vote to abolish the court of military justice. If that court be properly constituted and discharges its duties legitimately within its jurisdiction as the court was organized under the act of two or three years ago, it will be a blessing, and I will not vote to abolish the court because of such wrong decisions that it may have made.”

And further on the same Senator referred to the case of one officer in whom he was interested in which there had been an erroneous conviction, and said in that connection—

“I went with him to see the Judge Advocate General. The case was called up before the Judge Advocate General and reviewed, and at once he decided that the testimony was not sufficient, and restored the young man to his position in the Army.”

Further on, referring to this power, the same Senator said:

“I think it is a protection to the military men of the country to have such a court. It will come to be, when the hour of passion, to which my colleague has referred, shall have passed away, a court deliberate in its proceedings and, I hope, and have no doubt, wise in its adjudication. Then it will be a blessing to the country and a protection to our military men. Necessarily, when our Army shall come to be 50,000 strong, there will be many military trials for military offenses of military men. There ought to be a court of appeal; and this is intended to be a court of appeal; a court in which the judge of the courts-martial may be reviewed, and, if improper, revised. Such a court seems to me ought to be in the Army."

It was these legislative antecedents that were brought forward, without substantial change of language, as the existing law (sec. 1199, Rev. Stats.) now under discussion.

8. This office, while ignoring its right and duty to revise for prejudicial other than jurisdictional error, has with strange inconsistency been quick to assert its power to declare a judgment and sentence null and void on the ground that the proceedings were, in its judgment, coram non iudice. After the large armies of the Civil War had been demobilized and their activities were no longer a matter of immediate concern to this department, and the Army had become, in point of size, but a small national police force, this office, for reasons unexpressed and unknown, restricted itself to the correction of such jurisdictional error alone. The practice seems to have been adopted without thoughtful consideration of the law or policy involved or the resulting injustice. The opinions of this office, beginning with the early eighties, assume, without argument or reason, that the office was so limited. It can not fairly be said that upon this specific question the office has ever fairly and thoughtfully expressed itself. Extracts from two of the opinions, typical of all, will be sufficient to show the general character and nature of these holdings.

In an opinion under date of August 10, 1885, approved by the Secretary of War, the Acting Judge Advocate Gen. Lieber held as follows:

"As the whole matter is understood to be recommitted to this office for examination, including the letter referred to, I beg to remark that in acting upon the sentence of a court-martial, the reviewing authority acts partly in a judicial and partly in a ministerial capacity. He 'decides' and 'orders' (Army Regs. par. 918). Without his decision the sentence is incomplete. His decision is an exercise of judicial functions, and is as much beyond the control of other constituted authority as the findings of the court are beyond his. He can not be ordered to revoke it, and, if it be adhered to, the sentence can be removed in no other way than by the President in the exercise of his pardoning power (or set aside by the President when void by reason of a want of jurisdiction)."

In the case of Lieut. J. N. Glass, tried by general court-martial, this office in a review under date of July 20, 1886, signed by Acting Judge Advocate Gen. Lieber, concluded as follows:

"The proceedings, findings, and sentence in this case having been approved by the reviewing officer in the exercise of his proper functions, they are beyond any power of revision on the part of higher authority, but the President by the virtue of his pardoning power may remit the unexecuted part of the sentence. The latter course is respectfully recommended by this office."

In the opinion first above cited, which is a fair sample of the many that have followed, the then Acting Judge Advocate General took the view that the proceedings of a general court-martial could be set aside for a want of jurisdiction. But whence came that power? In declaring it to be competent to declare the proceedings of a general court-martial void for want of jurisdiction he evidently overlooked the fact that in declaring a trial void for want of jurisdiction some functionary must sit in an appellate capacity for which there must be some statutory or common-law authority. As a matter of fact, no statutory or other authority can be found for the exercise of the power to declare a trial for want of jurisdiction unless it can be found in that provision of section 1199, which confers a general revisory power upon the Judge Advocate General. If the power to revise includes the power to declare proceedings void for want of jurisdiction it must also by any fair construction include the power to declare a judgment wrong as a matter of law and reverse it. If this office has the one power it necessarily has the other, and if it has not the latter power it has not the former. By the plain language of the statute this office has both.

9. Nor has the power here contended for ever been questioned by the civil courts or other civil authority. To be sure, there are many expressions in adjudicated cases to the effect that the duly approved sentence of a court-martial when the court has proceeded within its jurisdiction and the rules governing its procedure is as final and unassailable as a decision of a civil court of last resort. But it must be remembered, of course, that in each of these cases the court was speaking of collateral attack in the civil courts on the proceedings of a court-martial and did not have in view the power of the department itself to correct court-martial judgment by way of direct revision of it. I have also examined many expressions of opinion by the Attorney General and find that these expressions have had to do generally with cases in which the final approval has been by the President himself and go only to the question of whether such cases can be reopened by the President or his successor for the purpose of undoing what he has once legally done. I have not found that any authority has ever questioned the revisory power of this office to correct errors in law in court-martial procedure when they amount to a denial of justice. And I may be permitted to say that should I find such holdings by any authority other than the highest court of the land, I should not hesitate to question the soundness of the decision.

In this connection, I may say that it was suggested to me by the present Judge Advocate General himself that the finality attributed by the Articles of War to the power of the several reviewing authorities might be thought to militate against or negative the view I advance. This could hardly be true. The statutory power of the Judge Advocate General of the Army conferred by 1199 Revised Statutes stands unaffected by anything said in the law as to the power of appointing authorities. Indeed, the statutes are not in pari materia. They exist for entirely different purposes. They establish different functions, all of which have independent spheres. The general powers of correction conferred upon appointing authorities of the Articles of War existed prior to the enactment of the statutes now brought forward in 1199 Revised Statutes and also concurrently with them, without thought of conflict. There is, of course, a field of operation for each. The concept of finality referred to is the finality within the system, the finality with which all lawyers are familiar, and which must exist in order that there may be a review at all. A judgment of an inferior court must be a final judgment before it can be subjected to review in an appellate court. The action of the appointing or confirming authority directly giving effect to the judgment of the court itself gives finality to that judgment, that is, that completeness and integrity without which there could be nothing for this or any other authority to review. Such judgments are operative as final until and unless revised upon review. This concept of finality is so familiar to lawyers as to require no further discussion.

10. Such is the law, and there is a pressing necessity at this time that we go back to it, revive it, and act under it. Daily this office reviews records which show that in the trial some substantial rights of persons standing before courts-martial accused of crime have been flagrantly violated or that convictions have been secured on wholly insufficient evidence. Others show that charges and specifications are sometimes laid under the ninety-sixth (the general) article of war for acts that are not properly to be regarded as military offenses at all. And quite frequently cases are encountered in which men have been convicted of serious offenses where upon the evidence the offense committed was not the offense charged or for which they were tried. Officers of the Army, even of the Regular Army, are persons unlearned in the law, and, as fallible beings, may be expected from time to time to commit such errors in court-martial procedure as operate to deny the accused right and justice and result in his unlawful punishment. And such errors are even more to be expected now, as our Army is expanding and thousands of new officers are brought into the service who have had no military training and no familiarity with military law and the customs of the service. For this reason alone there should be the closest supervision.

But the situation may also be viewed from another aspect. As an American institution our Army must be maintained under law. Our Army can never be the most successful Army it is capable of becoming except it have the highest regard for the rights of the enlisted men, as those rights are established by law. Indeed, the higher the regard for those rights the greater will be the popular confidence in the Army. For the first time in the history of this country we have in fact a truly democratic and popular Army. It has come from the people. Tens of thousands of homes have been affected. In the welfare of the Army millions are concerned directly and the entire public interested generally.

Expediency, in the highest sense of the term, as well as law, requires that the Army itself be quick to see that justice is maintained within it. The men now drafted from all walks of life and placed, whether they will or not, in the military service of the country are wholly without previous military training and it is only natural to expect many transgressions against discipline, certainly in the early days of their service. They are entitled to justice as established by law, and those who are giving them up to the service of the country have the right to feel, to know, that they will not be lightly charged with military offenses, nor branded while in the service of their country as criminals, except after a fair and impartial trial and on proof which can meet the legal test.

11. There is a revisory power here, which must be exercised. It will, of course, be exercised with all due regard for the proceedings and strictly within the limitations of the war.

MAJ. GEN. E. H. CROWDER'S MEMORANDUM IN OPPOSITION TO THE REVISORY POWER, AND THE SECRETARY OF WAR'S DISPOSITION OF THE INSTANT CASE.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, November 27, 1917.

Memorandum for the Secretary of War.

On November 10, 1917, there was presented for your personal consideration by Gen. Ansell, Acting Judge Advocate General, a memorandum brief in support of his action on the trial and conviction for mutiny of 12 or 15 noncommissioned officers of Battery A of the Eighteenth Field Artillery. In the discussion of the record of the case itself, Gen. Ansell had come to the conclusion that the evidence did not warrant a conviction of the offense of mutiny, that many errors of law appeared on the face of the record, and that, while the court had jurisdiction and "its judgment and sentence for that reason could not be pronounced null and void," errors in law and the unfairness of the trial "justify, upon revision, a reversal of that judgment." Gen. Ansell, first inviting attention to section 1199, Revised Statutes, providing that—concludes his review of the case as follows:

"In the exercise of the power of revision conferred upon me by section 1199, Revised Statutes of the United States, I hereby set aside the judgment of conviction and the sentence in the case of each of these several defendants and recommend that the necessary orders be issued restoring each of them to duty."

I shall not address myself for the present to the merits of the case or to the proper administrative action that should be taken in respect of it, but rather to the statement of Gen. Ansell in his memorandum brief, that an ill-considered and erroneous change of attitude on the part of the Judge Advocate General's Office that occurred within a score of years after the close of the Civil War has profoundly and adversely affected the administration of military justice in our Army; that "errors of law, appearing on the record, occurring in the procedure of courts-martial having jurisdiction, however grave and prejudicial such errors may be, are absolutely beyond all power of review"; that you and your immediate military advisers can never appreciate the full extent of injustice that has resulted to our soldiers through the operation of this rule; that a proper sense of the injustice can be felt only by those who exercise immediately the authority of the Judge Advocate General's Office; and that even those thus experienced can gather a full impression of the wrong done only by complete mental inclusion of that vast number of cases where concededly corrective power ought to have been, but was not, exercised in each year of the past forty-odd years. Gen. Ansell adds:

"During the past three months, in scores, of not hundreds, of cases carrying sentence of dishonorable expulsion from the Army with the usual imprisonment, this office has emphatically remarked the most prejudicial error of law in the proceedings leading to the judgment of conviction, but impelled by the long-established practice has been able to do no more than point out the error and recommend Executive clemency."

In handing the memorandum brief to me for my study, you asked my attention to these statements and expressed your surprise that such a situation as is here depicted could have existed in the face of an express grant of power to the Judge Advocate General, which Gen. Ansell finds in section 1199, Revised Statutes, to modify or reverse the approved proceedings of courts-martial. You directed me to examine the brief and make a report thereon. I have had a limited time in which to do this, but the results of my study, which I think is complete enough to answer the main propositions, follows:

The logic of Gen. Ansell's brief converges to its conclusion in these distinct channels:

1. That the single word "revise," as used in section 1199, Revised Statutes, by ordinary construction so clear as to abate any precedent or accepted meaning confers upon the Judge Advocate General not only the power to examine, analyze, and review courts-martial proceedings, but also invests the Judge Advocate General with the power to modify or reverse the same.

2. That the history of the legislation discloses that the statute was originally intended to confer this power upon the Judge Advocate General.

3. That the administrative history of the department discloses that the power was actually utilized during the Civil War period and apparently until the early eighties.

4. That the power has never been questioned by the civil courts or other civil authority.

5. That the power is, and for a long time has been, vested in the judge advocate general of the British Army.

Since the brief concededly purports to overturn the established practice of over one-third of a century, and to advance a doctrine as to which there is little or no previous expression or any authority or opinion outside of the brief itself, it will be well to follow the outline of discussion upon which the brief is built, and to address ourselves first to the contention that the word "revise" in section 1199, Revised Statutes, confers upon the Judge Advocate General the power to review and then to modify or reverse the approved proceedings and sentences of courts-martial.

1. Meaning of the word "revise."—Practically the whole fabric of Gen. Ansell's argument is built upon an interpretation of the meaning of this single word "revise." In support of the broad meaning which he gives this word, his brief collates definitions of the word by lexicographers and jurists. On the authority of the Standard Dictionary, which defines the word "revise"—

"To go over or look over or examine for the correction of errors, or for the purpose of suggesting or making amendments, additions, or changes; reexamine; review. Hence, to change or correct anything as for the better or by authority; alter or reform"— he classifies the word "review" as a synonym of the word "revise" and upon this justification indiscriminate definitions of the words "revise" and "review" are quoted throughout the brief. I think the deductions he makes in this part of his brief are unauthorized.

In essential etymology the word "revise" means "to look over." It has acquired a special meaning going to the purpose of the "looking over," and imports a purpose of suggesting, or making amendments. Thus a proof reader revises copy and suggests changes. But he does not effect changes. Special committees of men learned in the law revise statutes and codes by special legislative commission, but their revisions do not give legal life to the result of their labors. The legislature must enact the revision as a law. In the same sense the "looking over," the "reexamination" of the proceedings of an inferior tribunal by an appellate court is not the reversal or the modification of the judgment, albeit the revision is for the purpose of making such a change. All this is most significant, since in the statutory grant of so wide a power as that contended for we should expect, by all the analogies of grants of appellate power, to find something more than authority "to look over" or "to examine." Such brief survey of the field of statutes conferring appellate power on the various tribunals of the several States and of the United States as I have been able to make in the limited time I have had to prepare this paper fails to disclose a single instance in which the power to modify or reverse the judgment of inferior courts is deducted from the words "review" or "revise" without the addition of apt words specifically conferring the power to reverse or modify.

Gen. Ansell's brief purports to find one such statute, which he describes as analogous with section 1199, Revised Statutes, granting the power to modify or reverse by the use of the single word "revise." Gen. Ansell says, in part:

"I find the word used in another Federal statute in quite an analogous way. Section 24 of the act of July 1, 1898 (cpa. 541, 30 Stat., 553, bankruptcy law), provides, in part, as follows:

"The several circuit courts of appeal shall have jurisdiction in equity, either interlocutory or final, to superintend and revise in matters of law the proceedings of the several inferior courts of bankruptcy within that jurisdiction."

Gen. Ansell's brief then proceeds to cite a case interpreting the bankruptcy statute (in re Cole, 163 Fed., 180, 181; C. C. A., first circuit), which he describes as "a case typical of all," in which the court says:

"On a petition to revise like that before us we are not restricted as we would be on a writ of error, our outlook is much broadened, and we are authorized to search the opinions filed in the district court, although not a part of the record in the strict sense of the word, for the purpose of ascertaining at large what were in fact the issues which that court considered."

And from this quotation it is inferred that the court was finding in the word "revise" a broader power to "modify or reverse" the procedure of the lower court. This legislative precedent, as judicially applied, would, if it were properly and accurately set forth in the brief, be most persuasive, and for this reason I have had recourse to the statute itself. I find that the quotation of the bankruptcy act of July 1, 1898, in the brief is incomplete, being a quotation of only a portion of the section conferring appellate jurisdiction on the Supreme Court and the circuit courts of appeal and the supreme courts of the Territories. The portion quoted is from the latter part of the section, the earlier part of the section having conferred general appellate jurisdiction; the words quoted by Gen. Ansell, "shall have jurisdiction in equity, either interlocutory or final, to superintend and revise in matters of law," following that part of the section which confers general appellate jurisdiction. In order that you may be fully advised in the premises, I quote the entire section:

"SEC. 24. Jurisdiction of appellate courts. a. The Supreme Court of the United States, the Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, and the supreme courts of the Territories, in vacation in chambers and during their respective terms, as now or as they may be hereafter held, are hereby invested with appellate jurisdiction of controversies arising in bankruptcy proceedings from the courts of bankruptcy from which they have appellate jurisdiction in other cases. The Supreme Court of the United States shall exercise a like jurisdiction from courts of bankruptcy not within any organized circuit of the United States and from the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

"b. The several circuit courts of appeal shall have jurisdiction in equity, either interlocutory or final, to superintend and revise in matter of law the proceedings of the several courts of bankruptcy within their jurisdiction. Such power shall be exercised on due notice and petition by any party aggrieved."

The concluding paragraph, marked "b," quoted by Gen. Ansell, follows the underscored language which invests the courts with appellate jurisdiction in express terms. There was no necessity for the court to deduce appellate power out of that part of the section designated above "b" for it had this appellate power by express grant. The discussion of the court in re Cole should, I think, be so understood.

I do not think this part of the reply would be complete without some reference to the manner in which appellate jurisdiction has generally been conferred by statute, exemplified in the following:

(a) The act of February 9, 1893, establishing the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia provides:

"SEC. 7. That any party aggrieved by any final order, judgment, or decree of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia * * * may appeal therefrom to the court of appeals * * * and * * * the court of appeals shall review such order, judgment, or decree, and affirm, reverse, or modify the same as shall be just."

(b) The Judicial Code of March 3, 1911, provides for the exercise of appellate jurisdiction in the following sections:

"SEC. 128. The circuit courts of appeals shall exercise appellate jurisdiction to review by appeal or writ of error, decisions in the district courts," etc.

"SEC. 130. The circuit courts of appeals shall have the appellate jurisdiction conferred upon them by the act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy,' " etc.

"SEC. 237. A final judgment or decree in any suit in the highest court of a State in which a decision could be had, where is drawn in question, etc., may be reexamined and reversed or affirmed in the supreme court upon a writ of error."

"SEC. 250. Any final judgment or decree of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia may be reexamined and affirmed, reversed, or modified by the Supreme Court of the United States, upon writ of error or appeal, in the following cases: * * *"

"SEC. 252. The Supreme Court of the United States is hereby invested with appellate jurisdiction of controversies arising in bankruptcy," etc.

In the light of what has been said, I think it will be perfectly apparent to you that the court, in re Cole, was in no sense discussing its power to give effect to its conclusions upon revision. It was discussing only the scope of the matters that could be inquired into upon the petition, and found the definition of that scope in the words "revise in matters of law the proceedings of the several inferior courts of bankruptcy." It becomes, therefore, quite impossible to follow the brief we are here reviewing in its assertion that—

"The language of that statute (bankruptcy act) is the very language of this (sec. 1199, R. S.) except that the revision there is expressly limited to matters of law."

There is not even a shadow of analogy between the words of the Federal bankruptcy act investing the circuit courts with specific appellate jurisdiction and the words of section 1199, Revised Statutes, relied upon to invest the Judge Advocate General with appellate jurisdiction.

But I can not conclude this part of the brief without inviting your attention to the definitions which are quoted from Words and Phrases, volume 7. It seems to me that not a single one of the definitions quoted in the brief was addressed to grants of appellate power to courts, but that all are addressed to grants of legislative power to revise statutes, or to the scope of the authority granted to special commissions to revise codes, where it goes without saying the power to revise confers no power whatever to give effect to the revision. There was, however, one definition of the word "revise" on that cited page of Words and Phrases that does go to the meaning of a grant of power carried to a court by the word "revise," but I do not find that this definition is in Gen. Ansell's brief. It is as follows:

"Revision, as used in a statute authorizing the entering of an appeal, after the expiration of the time limited for such appeal, when the court is satisfied that justice requires a revision of the decree appealed from, does not mean reversal or modification, but simply review, reexamination, or looking at again."

I may add, in closing this part of my memorandum, that a rather complete survey of statutes vesting appellate power in tribunals, administrative as well as judicial, fails to disclose a single case where the power to modify and reverse is left to be deduced from such an inapt and single word as the word "revise," without the addition of appellate power granted in specific and unequivocal terms.

2. History of the legislation.—Gen. Ansell's brief asserts that—

"The history of the legislation, the early execution given it, its historical place in the body of the law of which it is a part, all clearly show that this must be the meaning assigned to the word 'revise' in the present instance."

It is said that Congress established the Bureau of Military Justice in the light of the necessities of the Civil War, and expressly invested its head, the Judge Advocate General of the Army, with this revisory power. Gen. Ansell's reference here is to the original statute, the act of July 17, 1862 (12 Stats., 598), in which it was provided that:

"The President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a Judge Advocate General, with rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of cavalry, to whose office shall be returned for revision the records and proceedings of all courts-martial and military commissions, and where a record shall be kept of all proceedings had thereupon."

The same words were carried forward in the act of June 20, 1864, and no further grant of power is found in the latter statute. In the act of July 28, 1866 (14 Stats., 324), the granting word is still "revise," the only change being the omission of the words found in the earlier statutes, "a record shall be kept of all proceedings had thereupon"; and so the same words were carried forward in section 1199, Revised Statutes, where they remain to base the ground of this contention.

I find nothing in the legislative development that is even worthy of remark in this connection. The word "revise" (or "revision") is the only granting word now as it was in the beginning. There is precisely the same power, no greater and no less. If history is to be invoked, therefore, we must look to the administrative and not to the legislative history of the statute. And this brings us to—

3. Administrative history of the departmental practice.—This administrative history has been appealed to in Gen. Ansell's brief to the extent that it is asserted that—

"The records of this office indicate that Judge Holt, the Judge Advocate General of the Army during the Civil War period, did revise proceedings in the sense here indicated."

Judge Advocate General Holt was Secretary of War before he was Judge Advocate General. His position at the bar of the United States was an enviable one. If this statement of his construction of the law is accurate, it would be most persuasive upon me, as I think it would be upon you. Gen. Ansell, however, cites no instance from the records of the Judge Advocate General's office where Judge Holt has indicated such a view, and such examination of the records of Judge Holt's action upon courts-martial proceedings during the Civil War period as I have been able to make does not disclose a single instance of the kind mentioned. Candor compels me to state that in the limited time that I have had to prepare this memorandum no systematic search of the hundreds of records bearing the stamp of Judge Holt's action could be made, and therefore the positive assertion that there exists no single instance of this kind would not be warranted. However, there was revealed from these old and interesting books very significant circumstances most emphatically indicating that Judge Holt never contended for nor exercised the power that Gen. Ansell says was vested in him by the statute, exemplified in the following reference to Judge Holt's opinions:

(a) I find on page 269 of volume 11 of the Records of the Bureau of Military Justice (Dec. 16, 1864), over Judge Holt's own signature, a short review of the case of Pvt. Hiram Greenland, who was tried by a court-martial convened by Gen. Howe. The record failed to show the date of the trial or whether there was present a quorum of the court. If Judge Holt had been exercising an indigenous power, such as it is contended he could exercise, he would have taken the action attempted to be taken in the instant case that raises the present contention and would have reversed the judgment. Instead of doing so indorsement "To the President" reads:

"There are fatal irregularities invalidating the whole proceedings and rendering the sentence inoperative, and it is recommended that it be so declared by the President."

(b) Again I find Judge Holt writing to Col. W. N. Dunn, Assistant Judge Advocate General, under the caption "Bureau of Military Justice," and under date December 27, 1864, in reference to the case of James Scott, corporal, Ninth Michigan Cavalry, in which the record was fatally irregular in that the arraignment of the prisoner and the reception of his plea had been accomplished prior to the administration of the oath to the court. Instead of reversing the judgment, as he, of course, would have done had he deemed that the power was in him to do so, he writes as follows:

"In similar cases returned from this office, to the officer charged with the duty of revision or executing of the sentence, it has been found advisable to direct his attention to the fact that a proper course to pursue with irregularities of proceedings which can not be corrected, rendering the sentence noperative, is to revoke the order of execution, and if the parties are not liable to be subjected to another trial to release them."

(c) In the case of W. H. Shipman, in which the charge has been drawn under the general Article of War for an offense clearly recognizable under a specific article, Judge Holt expressed the opinion that such an irregularity rendered the sentence void, but instead of reversing the judgment or attempting to give inherent effect to his own opinion he addressed the Secretary of War, under date December 22, 1864, in part as follows:

"If this opinion is concurred in, the pleadings in the case must be held to be fatally defective and the sentence imperative."

In no single case of perhaps 100 consecutive cases examined by me has there been found an instance in which Judge Holt ever attempted to reverse the judgment of a court-martial. Other cases similar to those quoted from were found in abundance.

Gen. Ansell's brief asserts that the power contended for was utilized during the Civil War period and beyond the Civil War period until the early eighties, when it was abandoned without apparent cause, argument, or reason. A rather hasty examination of the records from 1864 to 1882 fails to disclose a single instance of the exercise of such power. I shall not prolong this brief by citing the cases that I have examined. They cover the administration of Judge Advocate General Dunn and Judge Advocate General Swain.

4. Rulings of civil courts.—This brings us to the culmination of the whole argument in a refutation of the statement in the brief that "Nor has the power here contended for been questioned by the civil courts or other civil authority." This statement evinces a failure to make a thorough search of the records and precedents. In his "Military Law and Precedents," the leading work on the subject, Winthrop, for many years in the office of the Judge Advocate General, and for a time Acting Judge Advocating General during the incumbency of Judge Holt, in the Civil War period, and hence familiar with any course of procedure followed by him, says:

"The accused always has an appeal from the conviction and sentence by court-martial to the President (or Secretary of War); but, in entertaining and determining such appeal, he is assisted and advised by the Judge Advocate General of the Army. Thus, as the tribunal is an executive agency, the appeal therefrom is to a superior executive authority."

And a footnote, on page 51, adds that—

"The Judge Advocate General, under the authority vested in him by section 1190, Revised Statutes, to receive, revise, etc., the proceedings of courts-martial has, of course, no power to reverse a finding and sentence, was held in Mason's case, United States Circuit Court, Northern District of New York, October, 1882."

Mason's case still stands as the undisturbed pronouncement of the Federal courts upon the precise point at issue. Mason, a sergeant, had been convicted by a general court-martial of discharging his musket with intent to kill Charles J. Guiteau, the assassin of President Garfield. The findings and sentence were approved by Maj. Gen. Hancock, the reviewing authority, and the Secretary of War designated as the place of confinement the Albany County Penitentiary. In his review of the case the Judge Advocate General came to the conclusion that the court was without jurisdiction and that the sentence was therefore void. It is important to note that in communicating this conclusion to the Secretary of War the Judge Advocate General did not (as it is here contended that he had the power to do) reverse the decision of the court, but he recommended that the Secretary of War should revoke the order for execution of the sentence.

In this case, however, the Secretary of War declined so to do, and apparently adhered to the opinion that the court was not without jurisdiction and the sentence was valid—an opinion that was substantiated by the decision of the United States Supreme Court on a writ of habeas corpus addressed to the jurisdiction of the court. The prisoner, it seems, was not at the end of his resources. After being delivered to the warden of the penitentiary he sued out a new writ of habeas corpus based on other grounds. His contention was precisely the contention made in Gen. Ansell's brief; that is, that the Judge Advocate General is vested with an appellate power and that his decision against the validity of the proceedings of a court-martial has the effect of reversing the judgment.

His petition alleged, among other things:

"5th. That the Judge Advocate General of the Army recently reviewed the evidence adduced on the trial before said court-martial and on or about August 28, 1882, transmitted to the Secretary of War his report on the said proceedings, in which he renders an opinion reversing the findings and sentence of said court on the grounds:

"1. No jurisdiction in a court-martial.

"2. Employment of the prisoner illegal.

"3. No evidence of guilt, but, on the contrary, proof of innocence.

"6. That under section 1190, Revised Statutes, it is the duty of the Judge Advocate General to 'receive, revise, and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial,' and that it was the intention of Congress thereby to invest in the Judge Advocate General an appellate judicial authority over courts-martial, and that the Judge Advocate General has the judicial power, under the law, to review, revise, or reverse or affirm the findings and sentences of all courts-martial, and that his decision is the ultimate judicial judgment in all such cases.

"That by the judgment and decision of the Judge Advocate General, rendered as aforesaid, reversing the findings of said court-martial the further imprisonment of the petitioner is unlawful and wrongful.

"Further, that his conviction and sentence, and the orders carrying the same into execution, are each and all, annulled and made to stand for naught by the said judicial judgment and decision of the Judge Advocate General reversing the findings and sentence of said courts-martial."

In addressing itself to the contention thus made, the opinion of the court proceeds as follows:

"The second ground of the application is not tenable, because the alleged reversal by the Judge Advocate General of the findings of the court-martial is not a reversal at all and does not purport to be. It is merely an advisory report to the Secretary of War, giving the opinion of the Judge Advocate General upon the merits of the trial and sentence. We might risk our decision here, but as it has been strenuously contended by the council for the petitioner that Congress has conferred authority upon the Judge Advocate General to reverse the proceedings of courts-martial, it is proper that we should express our dissent from such a conclusion. It is urged that because the statute makes it is the duty of that officer to 'receive, revise, and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial' that the power to reverse is to be implied. It is not reasonable to suppose that the exercise of such an important power would be conferred in vague and doubtful terms, or that it lurks behind the word 'revise.' Applying the rule 'noscitur a sociis,' the word 'revise' is to be read in connection with the words that precede and follow it, and thus read, 'the duty it imposes is analogous to the duty of receiving and recording the proceedings.' Had it been intended by the statute to introduce such a marked innovation into the preexisting functions of the officer, and to convert a staff officer of the head of a bureau into a judicial officer having the ultimate decision in all cases of military offenses, the power to affirm, reverse, or modify the proceedings of courts-martial would have been lodged in plain and explicit language. The language employed is more appropriate to indicate the discharge of clerical duties.

"It is not intended to intimate that it is not the province and the duty of the Judge Advocate General to revise the proceedings of courts-martial so far as may be necessary to rectify errors of form and to point out errors of substance which, in his judgment, should be corrected by the proper authorities, nor is it doubted that as to all such topics as are within the purview of his official scrutiny his opinion is entitled to that respectful consideration which is due to the dignity and importance of the position which he holds.

"The rule is discharged and the application for a writ of habeas corpus is denied."

I think this memorandum might well close here and with the statement that both civil and military opinion sustain the view that the appellate power in the Judge Advocate General contended for in Gen. Ansell's brief does not in fact exist. However, I have noted a further statement, which constitutes part 5 of this memorandum to wit:

5. The appellate power of the judge advocate general of the British Army.—The jurisdiction of the judge advocate general of the British Army in such matters is so obscurely stated in the books which I have examined that I am not entirely clear that I understand his precise relation to the administration of military justice. It appears to be true, from the authorities I have examined, that under the British system this official has the power to reverse and modify the proceedings of courts-martial, but that he does not find that power in any specific statute, but rather in his relations as a member of the ministry of the British Government. Such authority as he exercises in this regard seems to be not a grant of executive authority to an administrative official, but to arise out of an executive power of the sovereign himself, delegated in this instance to a member of the ministry.

You are aware, of course, of the power you have by statute law to grant upon proper application an honorable restoration to duty to each of the men convicted of mutiny, and I shall shortly prepare an order of this kind and place it before you. I shall continue my study of the general subject to see whether this power of appellate review can not be found in the President himself, as the constitutional Commander in Chief, so that, instead of issuing a simple order of restoration, you may, by direction of the President, modify or disapprove the findings and sentence. It will take some little time to do this. The essentials of the proposition one would have to maintain are that the court-martial jurisdiction is and always has been an attribute of command; that the President would have had this power in the absence of any statute law, and that such recognition as has been given to subordinate members of the military hierarchy in the matter of convening courts-martial and reviewing their proceedings has in no way divested him (the President) of the revisory power which is clearly his in the absence of statutory provision. Immediate relief, however, should not await the completion of a study of this kind or the concurrence of the Attorney General, which I think you would wish in view of the consideration his office has heretofore given the general subject.

E. H. CROWDER,
Judge Advocate General.

NOVEMBER 27, 1917.

As a convenient mode of doing justice exists in the instant cases, I shall be glad to act in reliance upon a usual power and leave this larger question for future consideration, informed by the further study which the Judge Advocate General is giving it. Ordinarily, however, the extraction of new and large grants of power by reinterpreting familiar statutes with settled practical construction is unwise. A frank appeal to the legislature for added power is wiser.

ANSELL EXHIBIT C.

BRIG. GEN. S. T. ANSELL'S BRIEF FILED IN SUPPORT OF HIS OFFICE OPINION, TOGETHER WITH NOTE OF TRANSMITTAL.

DECEMBER 11, 1917.

Memorandum for Gen. Crowder:

1. Here is my brief, which, with his verbal permission, I file with the Secretary of War, and which I hope you will place before him at your convenience.

2. It has been prepared under circumstances which militate against literal accuracy, but it, together with the opinion, substantially and with sufficient accuracy expresses my views.

3. The subject, as I conceive it, is one of tremendous importance. I am quite sure that if the department could change its view of the law and come to concur with me, a practical scheme for the exercise of such power could be established, to the great benefit of the administration of military justice.

4. I fear that this office under the prevailing practice, is exercising too little supervisory power over courts-martial. I cite in my brief, as I mentioned to you the other day, that in the Civil War an Assistant Judge Advocate General was established independently of military command, so that as a representative of the reviewing power of this office he could pass preliminarily on proceedings and thus prevent the execution of illegal sentences. I apprehend that something like this will have to be done again.

5. If you and the Secretary of War, upon thorough reconsideration, can not accept my view of the law, and if it should be thought advisable to seek legislation establishing this power in the department, I hope its exercise will not be subjected to General Staff supervision. Such supervision, it seems to me, would necessarily destroy the judicial character of the power.

S. T. ANSELL.

BRIEF FILED BY PERMISSION OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR IN SUPPORT OF MY RECENT OPINION CONCERNING THE REVISORY POWER OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL OF THE ARMY OVER JUDGMENTS OF MILITARY COURTS.

Statement.—From my earliest interest in military law and the administration of military justice, and especially during my service in the office of the Judge Advocate General, I have seen the evident embarrassment of the department and its consequent failure to do justice according to established legal principles, brought about by the limitations imposed by the view and practice of this office to the effect that if the court had jurisdiction, no matter how flagrant and prejudicial its errors, and no matter how bad its judgment and sentence when tested by established legal principles, no corrective power existed in this office or this department or elsewhere. From time to time the officers on duty in this office, faced by such a dilemma, have turned their minds to the power of revision conferred by section 1199 of the Revised Statutes, in the hope of finding there the necessary remedial authority. But, since the Army has heretofore been small and the cases calling for such revision therefore have been comparatively few, the exigent need for such a revisory power has not until recently been sufficiently manifested to make the question an all-impelling one; and so, in the end, we have all accepted the practice, dissatisfied with it but without sufficient impulse to go to its bottom and overturn it. I should expect the other officers who have been on duty in this office with me and interested in the subject to confirm me in the statement of this attitude.

During this war, for patent reasons, the revision of the proceedings of military courts in this office has taken on an importance which it did not heretofore have. If one essential branch of administration of this office can be transcendently more important than another, it is to be found—at least while this large Army is maintained—in the supervision over these proceedings; that is to say, in the close supervision of the administration of military justice throughout the Army. If the revision is worth the name, it should be a revision for gross and prejudicial errors of law that make a conviction bad, as well as for those that make the judgment void. It should be done with such thoroughness as to carry conviction to all concerned and to secure the respect of the Army and the confidence of the people. It should be so expeditiously done as to make the remedy timely and prevent any great measure of unlawful punishment.

For reasons so obvious as to merit no allusion, our new Army must be expected to administer military justice more crudely than did our small peacetime establishment of experienced Regulars. My experience in this office thus far has shown that this is and will be true. Many cases already have been passed upon and reported to me by Maj. Davis, in charge of the Military Justice Division, and his assistants which admitted of no doubt whatever but that, on indisputable principles of law and justice, the judgments and sentences therein were based on error and ought to be revised and set aside if the power to do so existed. So flagrantly and patently illegal were many of these that I presented them to the entire body of my associates in an endeavor to discover, with the help of their counsel, some means whereby, in consonance with law as well as with the practice of the office, the judgment might be modified and the innocent victims restored, unblemished by wrongful conviction, to their honorable places in the service. It was the passing upon such cases which marked the obvious necessity for the power of revision in this office. We were driven to take up, and we did take up, for consideration with a seriousness that seems unappreciated the question of the proper construction of the statute in question, with the result that I and my office associates concluded with the utmost confidence and conviction that that statute does adequately confer upon the Judge Advocate General of the Army this very just and necessary power.

The case that of many others served most to indicate the exigent need of such power and its exercise in the interest of law and justice was the so-called mutiny case. It was upon this case we expressed the views and conclusion which the department finds unacceptable. This was an alleged mutiny of the noncommissioned officers and others of a certain battery of Field Artillery. The errors of law and the consequent injustice, as revealed by the proceedings in this case, were so palpable and prejudicial that it is difficult for me to see how any fair-minded official, having the duty to pass upon the record, could have failed to perceive them and exert all his power to remedy the error and injustice. These men did not commit mutiny. A youthful and capricious officer was responsible for the entire situation. He himself was guilty of tyrannous and oppressive conduct. Notwithstanding this, charges were pre-erred, not against him for his tyranny, but against these men for mutiny. The charges were referred to the proper convening authority, an officer of high rank, who ordered the court for the trial of these men. A court tried and convicted them and sentenced them to long terms of imprisonment, and the reviewing officer approved the convictions and sentence. Where such chain of action as this can occur there is left no room for the surprise that I otherwise should have felt at the failure of the proper authorities to court-martial the young officer himself. I frankly confess my fear that such a failure of justice as this, under such circumstances, involving so many officers whose concern it was to see that justice was done, is symptomatic of more general inefficiencies that are the usual concomitants of that institutional formalism which in my judgment so hinders our military development.

It was to correct such errors that the entire force of this office, including able and distinguished lawyers recently coming to us from civil life, devoted itself to a thorough study and consideration, extending over a period of more than three weeks, and reached the conclusion that the statute clearly confers upon this office revisory power necessary to do justice in such cases. Accordingly, convinced of the legality of that course and apprehending that no objection could be taken thereto, I set aside the judgment of conviction in this and other pending cases and recommended that orders issue restoring these innocent men to their places in the Army.

Inasmuch, however, as this action was a reversal of an administrative practice in this office which had never before been thoroughly considered or examined so far as I knew, I sent to the Secretary of War for his personal consideration a copy of the opinion, scarcely doubting that the action taken by me would merit his entire approval as well as that of the Judge Advocate General, so necessary and expedient was the authority, so clear the law, and so humane and righteous its application.

The Secretary of War having sought his advice, the Judge Advocate General has disagreed with me, and finds no such power. Upon his advice, therefore, the judgment of conviction in this case is to stand, though it is proper to add, quite a number of other instances in which I likewise set aside erroneous judgments have been, due to administrative methods, approved by the department and action taken accordingly.

Believing that our people who are giving up their sons to the national cause could not be content with, if they were apprised of, a system of military justice that is admittedly without power to correct conceded wrong and injustice to the most sacred rights of man and soldier; conceiving that the question is fundamental and far-reaching in its import; convinced that existing law places us in no such humiliating position and that the action of the department was wrong beyond all question and can be shown convincingly and almost to the point of demonstration to be so; and mindful that undue deference to past peace-time views and administrative practices will defer the adoption of better methods and prove highly harmful to our new Army, in an earnest desire to be helpful to the extent of my ability and use whatever of strength I have to aid in the establishment of an adequate and efficient administration of military justice, I file, with the permission of the Secretary of War, this brief of my views:

First, as to the action taken in the mutiny case.

1. The action taken by the Secretary of War on the advice of the Judge Advocate General has been taken under very evident misapprehension. Such action is predicated upon the correctness of conviction, and the acceptance of such an act of grace by these innocent men necessarily implies a confession of guilt of a crime, which, upon well-established principles of law and justice, they never committed. Justice is a matter of law and not of executive favor.

The Judge Advocate General, advising the Secretary of War, said:

"You are aware, of course, of the power you have by statute law to grant, upon proper application, an honorable restoration to duty to each of the men convicted of mutiny, and I shall shortly prepare an order of this kind and place it before you."

And immediately thereupon the Secretary wrote, adopting the suggested action, as follows:

"As a convenient mode of doing justice exists in the instant cases, I shall be glad to act in reliance upon a usual power and leave this larger question for future consideration, informed by the further study which the Judge Advocate General is giving it."

This action can not be "a convenient means of doing justice." The Secretary, for the moment, has failed to distinguish between executive action in the nature of a partial pardon and judicial action, which goes to the erroneous judgment of conviction itself and modifies it, reverses it, or sets it aside. The statute under which the proposed action is to be taken is to be found in the statute relating to the military prison and the prisoners therein, and is as follows:

"SEC. 1352, R. S. The commandant [that is, of the military prison] shall take note and make record of the good conduct of the convicts and shall shorten the daily time of hard labor for those who, by their obedience, honesty, industry, or general good conduct earn such favors; and the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to remit, in part, the sentences of such convicts and to give them an honorable restoration to duty in case the same is merited."

And the modifying act of March 4, 1915 (38 Stat., 1074), as follows:

"Whenever he shall deem such action merited, the Secretary of War may remit the unexecuted portions of the sentences of offenders sent to the United States Disciplinary Barracks for confinement and detention therein, and in addition to such remission may grant those who have not been discharged from the Army an honorable restoration to duty and may authorize the reenlistment of those who have been discharged or upon their written application to that end order their restoration to the Army to complete their respective terms of enlistment, and such application and order of restoration shall be effective to revive the enlistment contract for a period equal to the one not served under said contract. (Par. 7, sec. 2.)

And—

"The authority now vested in the Secretary of War to give an honorable restoration to duty, in case the same is merited, to general prisoners confined in the United States Disciplinary Barracks and its branches, shall be extended so that such restoration may be given to general prisoners confined elsewhere; and the Secretary of War shall be, and he is hereby authorized to establish a system of parole for prisoners confined in said barracks and its branches, the terms and conditions of such parole to be such as the Secretary of War may prescribe."

The action thus authorized was never intended to apply in cases of an unlawful conviction, and this the terms of the statute clearly indicate. It expressly applies to convicts and general prisoners dishonorably discharged from the service. It was enacted by Congress under its power to make rules and regulations for the government of the Army and to prescribe the eligibility of those who enter or are in the Army and the conditions under which they serve. Looking at it from the executive viewpoint, it is but executive favor. As I pointed out in my former opinion, in cases of such restoration the conviction stands. The restoration itself is predicated upon a lawful conviction and a dishonorable expulsion from the Army in consequence of it. It can be taken only upon the application of him who has been thus expelled. An executive action partaking of the nature of the pardon is not the proper remedy in a case where a man, concededly, has been unlawfully convicted, if there be other means of doing justice. A pardon does not proceed upon the theory of justice, but of mercy. The man who seeks a pardon does so upon an express or implied admission of guilt. The pardon itself conclusively implies guilt. A pardon is no remedy for wrong done the innocent.

Speaking to the present case these noncommissioned officers, soldiers of excellent record, were, when judged by universally recognized legal principles, erroneously, unjustly condemned; they stand convicted of an offense than which none, in a soldier, can be more heinous. Restoration to the Army does not change the judgment of conviction. Restored to the Army they ought to be; not, however, as an act of grace and mercy, but as an act of right and justice. Such a restoration is but an attempt to forgive these men for an offense which none of them ever committed; and, notwithstanding such restoration, the record against them is made and there it stands. They have been expelled from the Army unless the judgment be reversed; they have been out of the Army since the day the sentence was executed. All rights and honors incident to their service they have lost, their records as soldiers largely ruined. In such a case the right thing to do is to set aside the conviction; to reverse the judgment of the court; to declare that these men had never been lawfully convicted; and that they have never been lawfully out of the service—a service which they had never dishonored. The power to do the right thing is to my mind unmistakably found in the section to be discussed. I hope and request that final action differing from that here prayed will not be taken until after this brief shall have been given the consideration which the subject of which it treats well merits.

The Secretary then continued to express the following general view with respect to the power to be deduced out of this statute—

“Ordinarily, however, the extraction of new and large grants of power by reinterpreting familiar statutes, with settled and practical construction, is unwise. A frank appeal to the legislature for added power is wiser.”

I think it will be shown by this brief that the well-established general principle here enunciated has no proper application to the action taken by me under this State. It can have no application where this statute never has been interpreted by the courts; where the practical construction is not settled, but palpably inconsistent and confused; where there is such overwhelming necessity for an exercise of the jurisdiction. That these things are so can be shown quite convincingly.

II. It is as regrettable as it is obvious that those who oppose my views do not vision in the administration of military justice what the new army of America will require, nor do they even see what the present is revealing. They are looking backward and taking counsel of a reactionary past whose guidance will prove harmful if not fatal.

(1) The views of the Assistant Chief of Staff and the Inspector General savor of professional absolutism.—The opposing arguments follow administrative practice blindly and, for the most part, are but mere professional absolutisms developed under the conditions obtaining in our country since the broadening activities of the Civil War period passed away. I poignantly regret the concurrence of the Judge Advocate General, who habitually and constitutionally entertains far more progressive views. The reasoning that comes from the office of the Chief of Staff and Inspector General is but the apprehension of those who are counseled by their fears and who mistrust all that disturbs an absolute order of things. Opposition of that kind has manifested itself against every suggestion of progress throughout the development of institutions. Such argument proceeding on narrow military principle is adduced to the support of power rather than to the human individual rights offended by an abuse of it. In its essentials it is this: The battery commander was a commissioned officer with the power of discipline over his battery; he exercises his power under an amenability to his superiors in the hierarchy, and they all, tacitly, at least, approved of what he did; military justice was appealed to to vindicate his power through a court composed of excellent officers of experience and rank, and the court did vindicate him; all these officials were wise, experienced, and just, and therefore their judgment must not be impeached. The whole structure of government recognizes the fallibility of human administration and endeavors to minimize its evil effect by placing upon it the check to be found in the thoughtful and well-considered review of those who have been trained to the detection of those fallacies.

It is only the mind of the extreme professionalist that fails to see that a man's judgment may be impeached without reflecting upon his integrity. In this case the gross misconduct of this commanding officer is conceded; and yet it is said that these men, subjects of his misconduct, must have their cases determined without reference to his oppressive and tyrannous action. The legal mind, trained to a consideration of the elements of every offense, and appreciating that mutiny must consist of an opposition to lawful authority with an intent to subvert it, could not have failed to perceive that this was not a case of opposition at all in the sense that makes mutiny, nor was there any evidence of the necessary intention to overcome and depose constituted authority. My own sense of right and justice and discipline would have impelled me to court-martial, not the men, but the officer himself, and I still think that that should be done. The human error that marked this case, judged according to established principles known to every lawyer, has marked and is daily marking others.

Army officers, acting on a mistaken sense of loyalty and zeal, are accustomed to say, somewhat invidiously, that “courts-martial are the fairest courts in the world.” The public has never shared that view. In any event, it is difficult to maintain that the judgment of this, the crudest of all courts, exercising such an extent of jurisdiction, is entitled to greater deference than those of the civil tribunals, the review of which, to insure correction, is fundamental in our law. So much as there is of summariness in courts-martial procedure is solely attributable to military necessities. But this Government should never take the life of any soldier or apply to him extreme penalties without the certainty of the correctness of judgment. If the judgment be sound and the punishment certain, nothing more should be demanded. This case in itself is of comparative little importance, but the questions raised and to be determined by it are fundamental in the administration of military justice.

(2) The opposing legal views are anachronistic; they are given a backward slant through undue deference to the theory of an illustrious text writer as to the nature of courts-martial, a theory which civil jurisprudence has never adopted but distinctly denied.—The Judge Advocate General deduces out of the power of revision which belongs to his office no substantial meaning whatever. Obviously he is led to this restrictive, indeed extinguishing, interpretation because of his fear of obtruding judicial functions within a field of authority that in his judgment properly belongs to the power of command. He would prefer to believe that such revisory power does not exist; otherwise this office must sit in revision upon the judgments of convening and reviewing authorities based upon their power to command on one hand, and in turn be controlled by the power of command of the Secretary of War and Chief of Staff upon the other. In my judgment, it is too clear for argument that courts-martial having once been brought into being their proceedings and judgments when properly completed and all that is incident thereto, are not based upon, but indeed are independent of, the power of command as such. Winthrop thought otherwise, and he has been followed blindly ever since by the War Department, though more recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States have exposed the fallacy of his views.

(a) Winthrop's theory was wrong in reason. Winthrop in a double-headed heading in his work on military law says that a court-martial is "not a part of the judiciary, but an agency of the executive department." This is the beginning and the cause of the difficulty. The only authority he quotes in connection with the assertion is a statement from Clode to the effect that in the British Army the power of courts-martial comes from the Crown, where, of course, differing from here, the King in theory is the fountain of justice. His text continues:

"Not belonging to the judicial branch of the Government, it follows that courts-martial must pertain to the executive department; and they are in fact simply instrumentalities of the Executive power provided by Congress for the President as Commander in Chief to aid him in properly commanding the Army and Navy and enforcing discipline therein, and utilized under his orders or those of his authorized military representatives."

The non sequitur here is absolute and obvious. "Not belonging to the judicial branch of the Government," he says, then courts-martial must necessarily belong to the executive department, are merely instrumentalities of Executive power and utilized under his orders. Since the days of Winthrop this has been the height of orthodoxy; and we have all been steeped in the teachings that follow upon that illogical and fallacious syllogism.

It is rather surprising that an unsupported text-book statement, sustained by so little logic, should have gone so long unexamined by those in military authority, even if judicial decisions had not exposed the fallacy. To be sure, courts-martial are no part of the judicial system referred to as such in the Constitution, but this does not place them under the Executive power. They are courts all the same, with their bases deep down in the Constitution. The courts of the several Territories have never been courts of the United States in the constitutional sense, nor have they ever had any other constitutional basis than the power of Congress to make rules for the government and disposition of the territory of the United States. But who would contend that they are under the Executive power? The courts, both Federal and local, of Porto Rico and Hawaii, and the courts of Alaska and the Philippines, indeed the courts of the District of Columbia, the United States Courts of Customs Appeals, and the Court of Claims, are not constitutional courts of the United States, in the strict sense, inasmuch as in them is deposited no part of the judicial power as defined in the Constitution; they constitute the courts, however, provided for by Congress under other grants of power. But no lawyer would contend, for that reason, that such courts are subject to Executive power.

(b) Winthrop's theory was wrong on principle and precedent. Courts-martial as a means of military adjudication long antedated the Constitution. They are recognized in the fifth amendment in the exception there made as to cases arising in the land and naval forces, and elsewhere in the Constitution. As they exist to-day in our land, and as they have ever existed here, they have been creatures of legislative enactment, under the power of Congress to make rules and regulations for the government of the Army and Navy. The king as a fountain of justice, military and otherwise, finds no counterpart here in our Chief Executive except to the extent that supreme powers are conferred upon him by the Constitution. Here the fountain of justice, indeed all prerogative of sovereignty, is in the people, except where conferred by them on their representatives. Except for the pardon power, Congress here is rather the fountain of military justice. Courts-martial are authorized by Congress. The powers that bring them into being are designated and authorized thereto by Congress. The offenses which they may try and the law which they apply are prescribed and enacted by Congress. Their procedure is regulated under the law of Congress. Their sentences and judgments must be in accordance with the law of Congress. All this has been said too frequently by the Supreme Court of the United States to be doubted. They are, then, tribunals created by Congress, administering the law of Congress, and responsible to that law alone. It is established by an unbroken line of decisions of the Supreme Court that a court-martial is the creature of Congress, and as a tribunal it must be convened and constituted in entire conformity with the provisions of the statutes, or else it is without jurisdiction. (Dynes v. Hoover, 20 How., 82; Keys v. U. S., 109 U. S., 340; McCloughry v. Deming, 186 U. S., 62.)

(3) The teachings which followed upon the premise that courts-martial are executive agencies have all been disproved by the Supreme Court of the United States, though this department still clings to them.—Those teachings were:

(a) That courts-martial were not courts at all in any proper sense of the term;

(b) That, therefore, they tried an act in its military aspects alone and not the full resultant crime recognized as such by general public law;

(c) That, therefore, judgments of courts-martial could not be pleaded by a soldier in bar of trial by a Federal court; and

(d) Being executive agencies, they are subject to the power of command.

Those teachings were all wrong, and the sooner we abandon them the better.

(a) Courts-martial are courts created by Congress, sanctioned by the Constitution, and their judgments are entitled to respect as such. (Runkle v. United States, 122 U. S., 543, 555; McCloughry v. Deming, 186 U. S., 49, 68; Ex parte Reed, 100 U. S., 13, 21; Swaim v. United States, 165 U. S., 558; Keyes v. United States, 109 U. S., 336, 340; Grafton v. United States, 206 U. S., 333, 348; Smith v. Whitney, 116 U. S., 167, 178.)

(b) Courts-martial do not try simply for the crime in its military aspects, but for the full and complete offense as recognized by the law of the land. (Ex parte Mason, 105 U. S., 696; Carter v. Roberts, 177 U. S., 496; Carter v. McCloughry, 163 U. S., 365; Grafton v. United States, 333, 348.)

(c) The judgment of a court-martial being a complete adjudication by a competent tribunal of the offense as known to the law of the land, is a bar against a second trial in any court of the United States. (Grafton v. United States, 206 U. S., 333, 348.)

These cases prove conclusively that a court-martial is a judicial tribunal of vast powers, whose jurisdiction extends to all who may belong to or are retained in our forces, affecting the life and liberty at the present time of millions; and that this jurisdiction extends to all conduct of such persons, without distinction between civil and military aspects. This office and the Army prior to the Grafton case had regarded it as settled law and justice, and sternly opposed the contrary view, that a soldier, though tried and punished by court-martial, could again be tried and punished by Federal civil courts without infringing his constitutional rights and his rights to justice.

(d) The functions of courts-martial are inherently and exclusively judicial and therefore are not subject to the power of command as such, but only to judicial supervision established by Congress.

It has been said that the President has the power to establish a system of courts-martial, and that in deference to that power, therefore, courts-martial are subject to his control. This I deny. I do not say that if the Constitution had not spoken, the power and necessity of the Commander in Chief to maintain discipline in the Army would have been sufficient to authorize some system of military adjudicature; and it may be that if Congress had not spoken under its power to make rules of government for the Army, the President could have filled the void. But when Congress does speak out of its power, the President may not speak within the same field. He may not array himself in opposition to the legislative rules governing the administration of military justice. Congress has designated what commanders subordinate to the President may convene courts-martial, and the President can not say otherwise. Congress has said what law they shall apply, and the President may not prescribe another.

Congress has regulated the punishment, and the President can not prescribe different penalties. The most that can be said is, inasmuch as Congress has not endeavored to deprive, even if it could deprive, the Commander in Chief of his power as a convening authority, the President may himself still convene a court-martial, and his name may, therefore, be added to that list of convening authorities designated by Congress. But that power is limited to him; he may convene courts-martial, but when convened they will be subject to all the law of Congress; he can not, by reason of that power, control courts-martial convened by others.

As was said in a report by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, quoted with approval by the Supreme Court in Swaim v. United States (165 U. S., 558), with respect to the acts of Congress authorizing the constitution of general courts-martial by officers subordinate to the President, such acts are not restrictive of the power of the Commander in Chief, but—

“ * * * merely provide for the constitution of general courts-martial by officers subordinate to the Commander in Chief, and who without such legislation would not possess that power, and that they do not in any manner control or restrain the Commander in Chief from exercising power which the committee think in the absence of legislation expressly prohibitive, resides in him from the very nature of his office, and which, as has been stated, has always been exercised.”

His power of control over the judgments of courts-martial not convened by him comes itself from Congress, and on principle he can add nothing to it.

It is a fallacious reasoning to say that Congress, under its power to make rules and regulations for the government of the Army, may not confer any authority upon a subordinate official without conferring it upon the President as Commander in Chief, especially when the power conferred is inherently judicial. Such an argument was advanced by the Court of Claims, but it is to be observed that the Supreme Court did not adopt that view. On the other hand, it quoted with approval the report of the Senate Judiciary Committee, which was to the effect (1) that the subordinate authorities would not have had such judicial power without the authority of Congress, and (2) that the President did have the power to convene a court in the absence of legislation to the contrary.

(e) Court-martial procedure being judicial from the beginning to the end (Runkle's case, 122 U. S., 588, and all subsequent cases cited), the power of revision, if it exists, is also judicial and therefore not subject to the power of command.

It is a maxim of the law that judicial power can not be restrained; which means to say, it can be controlled by no power except by superior judicial authority drawing its power from the same source. This course of the judicial power of courts-martial is Congress; and only by Congress alone, or by some authority appointed by Congress, can a court-martial be controlled. A supervisory judicial authority Congress conferred upon the Judge Advocate General by the section discussed. The fact that the Judge Advocate General is in a military hierarchy and in an executive department does not subject his judicial or quasi judicial functions to the power of command. It is established by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States that an officer of an executive department charged by Congress with judicial or quasi judicial duty is not subject in the performance of such duty to any executive authority. Thus, the decisions of the Commissioner of Patents stand as the final judgment of the executive departments beyond the control of the Secretary of the Interior (Butterworth v. United States, 112 U. S., 50.)

The supervision which a superior in an executive department may have over an officer in the same department who performs judicial or quasi judicial functions is on principle limited to administrative and executive functions, and does not relate to the quasi judicial. It may be that the legal relation between the head of the department and the officer performing judicial functions is such as to make the decisions of the latter subject to the former's judicial review.

but certainly not to the review of another and nonjudicial bureau of the same department.

The practice which obtains in the General Staff of passing upon the opinions of this office in such matters of pure law is, obviously, as hurtful to proper administration as it is inconsistent with legal principles. From the common-sense point of view alone, how futile it is to direct the attention of the General Staff, military experts presumably knowing nothing of technical law, to the control and supervision of the judicial functioning of the Judge Advocate General, who presumably is thoroughly skilled in matters of law and trained to judicial functions. I can conceive a large field in the realm of military conduct and policy—not of detailed administration—in which as I see it, the General Staff was created to function and in which good results will be achieved only when they are thus confined and devoted to larger tasks. I address myself to a situation and not to sporadic instances of such administrations. Considerable time of that great body and also of this office is consumed in conferences and discussions required by reason of such assumed power of supervision of the decisions of the office in matters of technical law and judicial duty. I can recall distinctly my inability to get a General Staff officer to grasp the usual technical significance and the propriety of applying the legal principles usually expressed in damnum absque injuria; res inter alios acta; generalia specialibus non derogant, and like technical concepts. I can recall a recent instance of a plain case of a lack of jurisdiction in which the Chief of Staff personally functioned for a considerable part of three days in an endeavor to make up his mind whether the error was jurisdictional, rendering the judgment null and void, or was error of law, simply requiring a reversal in my judgment. No war of any consequence can properly be conducted with such General Staff administration.

III. The whole argument on the other side is found in the contention that the word "revise" has no substantial meaning but has reference only to clerical corrections—One single fact exposes the utter fallacy of that contention, and had it been considered must have prevented an expression of that view—That fact is this: The word "revise" is an organic word, which solely creates and defines the duties of an entire bureau. Congress went to the great length of creating an independent bureau in the War Department for the sole and declared purpose of having it "revise" the proceedings of all military courts, and made that duty of revision the sole duty of that bureau.

It is true that the word "revise" as descriptive of the duty of the Judge Advocate General is found associated in the Revised Statutes with other words that are not of an organic nature. But in construing the Revised Statutes, if there be doubt enough to justify construction, as there is not in this case, the antecedent legislation may and should be examined; and when examined, it can be seen that there can be no application of the doctrine of noscitur a sociis here; indeed, because of the established meaning of the word "revise" there could have been no application of the doctrine under any circumstances.

The act of July 17, 1862 (12 Stat., 598), was an act establishing anew the office of the Judge Advocate General, and no functions were established for that office other than that enjoining that—

"To his office shall be returned for revision all records and proceedings of all courts-martial and military commissions, and where a record shall be kept of all proceedings had thereupon."

The declared purpose of having the records returned to this office was that the Judge Advocate General should revise them and make a record of his proceedings in revision.

Again, the act of 1864 (13 Stat., 145) created a separate bureau of the War Department for this special purpose in the following language:

"Sec. 5. There shall be attached to and made a part of the War Department during the continuance of the present rebellion a bureau, to be known as the Bureau of Military Justice, to which shall be returned for revision the records and proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions of the armies of the United States, and in which a record shall be kept of all proceedings had thereupon."

And in the following section, descriptive of the duties of the Judge Advocate General, the statute uses the words, "He shall receive, revise, and have recorded all proceedings of courts-martial," etc. These words describe his duties, but the extent of revision is, of course, to be found in the fact that it was the sole and single purpose of the creation of the bureau. The duties established for that bureau in its origin are still included within those of the office of the Judge Advocate General. Is it not opposed to common sense and reason to say that the Congress of the United States went to the great length of creating a separate bureau of this War Department for no purpose at all, or, at most, in order that some inconsequential clerical change might be made upon the record?

It is to be observed that the unreported decision in the Masons case, a case which I have been familiar with since 1902, and which for the moment, and perhaps because of its utter lack of authority, I had forgot, holds that upon the doctrine of noscitur a sociis the word "revise" imports but clerical duties. All that that judge said was said without evidence of any study of the statute and without reference to antecedent legislation; and, furthermore, it was the most patent dictum.

But there is another reason why the word "revise" can not be applied to any substantial clerical change in the record. The record is made by the court; it can not be changed except by the court. The record can not be made elsewhere. There is, then, no field for any clerical revision.

To be guided by this line of argument would be to hold that Congress created an entire bureau, whose sole duty should be to dot the "i's" that had not been dotted, and cross the "t's" that had not been crossed, and correct errors of spelling and perhaps of grammar, and to substitute one's personal view of correct punctuation for that which the court reporter had adopted. In other words, Congress went to ridiculous length of establishing a bureau of the War Department where sole objection was to correct the clerical inaccuracies of a court reporter.

But Winthrop accepted this dictum, without examination, and we are engaged to-day in nodding acquiescence to a proposition which, had it come less well sponsored, would have been greeted with impatience.

IV. "Revise," in its every sense—ordinary, legal, and technical military sense—means to correct, to alter, and amend.

The Judge Advocate General's brief, though concurring in the argument that the word "revise" represents purely clerical duties, does in a rather incidental and delicate way suggest that the word "revise" as here used may mean a review for the purpose of correction. If that were the acceptable view of the statute, then Congress must have contemplated that the power of correction existed somewhere. But he does not follow that definition up or rely upon it to locate the power of revision. The Judge Advocate General, so far as I can find, has no real authority for any such definition. His own illustrations fail completely. If a proof reader revises a copy, he himself changes it so as to make it conform to some standard. The committee who report a proposed revision of the law to Congress do not revise the law; Congress does it. The committee do not revise the law; the legislature does, making the desired corrections as revised. Those were the practical examples the Judge Advocate General chose to rely upon.

(a) The ordinary meaning of the word "revise" is not to review for the purpose of corrections, but to perform the act of correction. Look up the word in the ordinary dictionary; look around your library at the "revised editions"; look at the "Revised Statutes," or "Revised Codes," and no doubt whatever can be entertained of its meaning. It is an active, decisive power that results in a change in modifications of the proceedings revised. Ordinarily "revise" is a broader word than "review," especially so in the literary sense; and the two may be distinguished in that the former is active and decisive, the latter passive, informatory, and advisory. In a legal sense, "revise" while less commonly used in Anglo-American law than "review" as establishing supervising or appellate power, seems to be synonymous with it.

(b) In its legal sense the meaning of the word, as evidence by a multitude of examples of its use, is unmistakable; and if the single example heretofore given of its significance when used in statutes were "persuasive" at all, those to be given now should prove absolutely convincing.

The Judge Advocate General says that such examination as he has been able to make of legislative precedents "fails to disclose a single instance in which the power to modify or reverse the judgments of inferior courts is deduced from the word "revise" without the addition of apt words specifically conferring the power to reverse or modify." And then, after referring to the use of the word in the bankruptcy statute cited by me, he said:

"This legislative precedent as judicially applied would, if it were properly and accurately set forth in the brief, be most persuasive."

My reference and reliance upon the word "revise," as used in the bankruptcy statute, was quite justified as showing that the word "revise" as there used means exactly what is here contended for—changing the proceedings of the civil inferior courts of bankruptcy so that they shall conform to law. And the appellate power thereinbefore conferred in the statute was not what challenged the attention of the court as a measure of their power over inferior proceedings, but it was the word "revise."

But I submit the following, which ought to be conclusive:

(a) The word "revise" is the sole word used in the Constitution of Oregon to confer full appellate jurisdiction upon the supreme court of that State, and that court has given the word a fulsome meaning, even in the face of legislation evidently designed to limit it.

(b) The word "review" is used by the Constitution of North Carolina as the sole word for conferring full appellate power upon the supreme court of that State.

(c) The word "review" is used by the Constitution of New York to confer full appellate power upon the court of appeals of that State.

(d) Randolph's plan for the Supreme Court of the United States was contained in the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Executive and a convenient number of the national judiciary ought to compose a council of revision, with authority to examine every act of the National Legislature before it shall operate." Madison's Journal of Federal Convention, p. 62.)

(e) Section 24 of the Constitution of Illinois, 1818, provided "that the general assembly may authorize judgments of inferior courts to be removed for revision directly to the supreme court." This language is peculiarly similar to the language here discussed and none other was needed to confer appellate power upon the supreme court of that State.

(f) "Revise" has a meaning here contended for in Constitution of California, Article X, 1849, 1879; Constitution of Alabama, section 3, 1819, and Article IX, 1865; Constitution of Florida, Article XIV, 1838 and 1865.

(g) The Court of Customs Appeals has final appellate jurisdiction over decisions of the Board of General Appraisers, all of which is deducible out of the word "review." (Judicial Code, sec. 195.) The word as there used includes the usual appellate powers, including the reversal of the Board of General Appraisers when the court is satisfied that the finding is wholly without evidence or clearly contrary to the weight of evidence. (See U. S. v. Riebe, 1 Customs App., 19; Holbrook v. U. S., 1 Customs App., 263; Carson v. U. S., 2 Customs App., 105; In re Gerdau, 54 Fed., 143.)

(h) The decisions of the Comptroller of the Treasury over settlements of accounts by the decisions of auditors is described by the statute (act of July 31, 1894, 28 Stat., 207), as "a revision" and his decisions are referred to as "decisions upon such revision."

(i) Section 271, Revised Statutes, defining the power of the first comptroller, provides as follows:

"The first comptroller, in every case where, in his opinion, further delays would be injurious to the United States, shall direct the first and fifth auditors of the Treasury forthwith to audit and settle any particular account which such officers may be authorized to audit and to report such settlement for revision and final decision by the first comptroller."

(j) Section 482, Revised Statutes, defined the powers and duties of examiners in chief in the Patent Office and provided as follows:

"The examiners in chief shall be persons of competent legal knowledge and scientific ability, whose duty it shall be, on the written petition of the appellant, to revise and determine upon the validity of the adverse decisions of examiners upon applications for patents and for reissues of patents and in interference cases; and, when required by the commissioner, they shall hear and report upon claims for extensions and perform such other like duties as he may assign them."

(k) Section 4914, Revised Statutes, defining the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, provides:

"The court, on petition, shall hear and determine such appeal and revise the decision appealed from in a summary way on the evidence produced before the commissioner at such early and convenient time as the court may appoint; and the revision shall be confined to the points set forth in the reasons of appeal. * * *

(l) "Review" is the sole appellate word used in section 330 of the Code of Arizona establishing jurisdiction upon the supreme court of that State.

(m) "Review" is used also to confer appellate jurisdiction upon the supreme court in section 4824, Code of Idaho.

(p) In State v. Towery, 39 So. 309 (Ala.), the question was as to the meaning of the word "revision" as used in a clause of the constitution requiring the legislature periodically to make provision for the revision of the statutes. The court there construes the word in the usual sense of review, alter or amend, and said with reference to the meaning of the word—"Such changes as are admissible are within the purview of the section."

(q) In State v. King County, 37 Pac. 489, 491 (Wash.), the court deduced its authority to review by way of certiorari an inferior court's decision out of the revisory." Even the dissenting justice in that case admitted that the word "revision" included the power here contended for, but held that in this case it had reference only to those judgments which were already within the jurisdiction of the court by virtue of some other appellate power.

(r) The word is, apparently, habitually used as defining the power of courts over municipal corporations, taxation boards, and insolvency proceedings (34 Cyc. 1723); and the word is used in that publication as indicating a revisory power over criminal sentences (12 Cyc. 783.)

The Supreme Court frequently alludes to its power "to revise the judgments" of inferior courts. (See E. G., the Dred Scott decision, 19 How., 453, etc.)

Of course the fact that appellate power is frequently conferred with great particularity in such terms as "revise, reverse, remand, alter, amend, and set aside" places no logical or legal restriction upon the word "revise," certainly not when it is used alone.

Eleven of the State constitutions confer full appellate power in one or two words, using none of those enumerated.

The term "revise" and "revision of proceedings," having this general significance, has been known to military law and procedure from time immemorial.

It was known to the early mutiny acts prescribing that no proceedings should be returned to be revised by the court more than twice.

In Tytler's Military Law (1806), page 173, it is said with reference to British military law that the King has no power of revision, but that that function belongs to the courts of justice. He further says—

"All, therefore, that is competent for His Majesty to do, if the sentence of a court-martial shall not meet with his approbation, is to order the court to review their proceedings, and even this power, as above stated, is limited; for the mutiny act declares 'that no sentence given by any court-martial and signed by the president thereof shall be liable to be revised more than once.'"

It is to be observed that even at English law the power of revision of court-martial proceedings and sentences is clearly distinguished from the Crown's power of pardon.

"Revision of proceedings" and "proceedings in revision" are terms well known to Anglo-American military law with reference to the power of courts to reconsider and correct their own proceedings, judgments, and sentences.

In 6 Op. Atty. Gen., 203, Attorney General Cushing discussed this power of revision with great thoroughness, saying in that connection:

"It is laid down as a thing not open to controversy in all the books of military law that the superior authority may order a court-martial to reassemble to revise its proceedings and its sentence," citing for that authority Hough on Courts-Martial, page 29; McArthur on Courts-Martial, page 136; Griffith's Notes, page 90; Kennedy on Courts-Martial, pages 229, 290; Anon., Observations on Courts-Martial, pages 38-65; Tytler's Military Law, pages 170-338; James's Collection, page 556; Simmons's Practice, 389; De Hart on Courts-Martial, page 203; O'Brien's Military Law, chapter 23.

This procedure with the word "revise" as descriptive of it, is an established part of our own military procedure, which occurs in daily practice, is treated of in all texts and is recognized by that name by all our courts.

See Macomb (1809) Duane's Mil. Dic., 1810; Scott's Mil. Dic., '864; Benet's Military Law under "Revision"; also all military texts.

V. The word "revised," as a matter of fact, is in no sense ambiguous, and there is no room for construing it. It would have made no difference, therefore, what the administrative practice was or is. The quality of law is not impaired by nonuse. As a matter of fact, Judge Holt did, in form at least, pronounce sentences invalid, and did not content himself simply with recommending that pronouncement was by superior authority. His views as to the validity of proceedings were expressed in terms that savor of judicial pronouncement, and the orders of the War Department so far as examined seem to respect that quality by conformance.

The meaning of the word is not fairly questionable. Furthermore, Senators in debate referred to the power conferred as that of a court of review. Congress seems to have had no doubt about it. In such a case practice can not govern.

In writing the opinion I went through the record books of a part of 1863, and my notes of that search reveal that Judge Holt's reviews very frequently terminated with a declaration which, by its form and tenor, indicated, so far as his office was concerned, judicial finality. It was common to conclude with the statements: "Therefore the sentence is inoperative," "therefore this fatal defect must prevent a confirmation of the record," "the sentence is fatally defective," "for error of law committed by the reviewing authority the sentence is inoperative, notwithstanding the confirmation of Maj. Gen. Hooker," "the sentence as it stands is inoperative," "the sentence is invalid and should not be enforced," "the sentence rested upon such a record should not be carried into execution," and such like expressions.

"Sentence is therefore inoperative" occurs eight times; record is fatally defective, and sentence should not, or can not, or must not, be enforced, or carried into execution, or confirmed, sixteen times. The record shows that, in the administration of those days, the Judge Advocate General was regarded both by the President and the Secretary of War as the law adviser upon matters of military administration and justice, and at least no power of command stood between him and those supreme authorities. It also shows that the Judge Advocate General very frequently, indeed one might say, habitually, returned the record direct to the reviewing authorities with instructions as to errors of law and pointing out the necessity for correction where correction could be made in order that the sentence be held operative. That the examination, if not revision, of the records might be the more expeditiously made an Assistant Judge Advocate General, representing preliminary the Judge Advocate General and his power, and not connected with any commander's staff, was stationed in a central situation with duty, as to proceedings, "to call for such as are not forwarded in due season, to examine them, to return for correction such as are incomplete, and to give immediate notice of fatal defects to the proper commanders, that sentence may not be illegally executed." (G. O. 230, A. G. O., Aug. 16, 1864.)

VI. The Judge Advocate General of England certainly did have this power of revision. (I am not advised of his present authority.)

Clode (1869), vol. 2, pp. 359, 364, 360. While his letters patent do not clearly define his duties, it was prescribed therein—

"He exercises the powers of a supreme court of review, as regards the proceedings of all district, garrison, and general courts-martial whatsoever and whensoever."

The following is quoted from Jones's Military Law (1882), p. 94:

"The J. A. G. and his deputy are always civilian lawyers, while the deputy judge advocates, who in England attend at B. C. M., are always military men.

"The J. A. G.'s Department forms a final court of appeals and has the power of upsetting or 'quashing,' as it is called, all proceedings of C. M. and it therefore takes no part in the actual preparation, conduct, or management of prosecutions.

"The J. A. G. is a member of the Privy Council. He is generally chosen from among barristers who are members of Parliament, and they stand or fall with the Government to which they are attached.

"All the proceedings of G. C. M., which at home must be confirmed by the Sovereign, are sent to the J. A. G., and the Sovereign confirms on his responsibility as a Minister of the Crown, and acts on his recommendation.

"The J. A. G. is responsible to Parliament, hence a prisoner, if wronged, can appeal at law against him, for 'the Sovereign can do no wrong.'"

"The duties of the J. A. G. are confined to the examination of the proceedings as to their legality, whether the sentences are within statute laws, etc. The expediency of carrying out the sentence, or as to remission, etc., is not his province; the C. in C. advises the Crown on these points." (Pp. 94-95.)

It must be remembered, too, that the civil courts of England exercise a far larger power over the judgments of courts-martial than do our own.

VII. Whence comes the established power to declare proceedings null and void for jurisdictional error? And why should not the larger power include the lesser radical one of correction of legal error?

Nobody essays an answer. Doubtless a reviewing authority, by statute, may "disapprove" a sentence because it is null and void or because it is bad for prejudicial error of law, and I think that frequently it is said in our texts and in our practice that a sentence is "invalid," though not for jurisdictional error. The larger power, in practice, is exercised here in the department. It is extremely difficult for me to comprehend any reason that concedes to this department the larger power but denies to it the lesser one.

VIII. The necessity, in the name of justice, of locating this power in this department, and preferably in this office, where logically, and I think legally, it belongs, must be apparent to all who are familiar with the administration of military justice.

In the first half of November, while I was in charge of the office, I set aside the judgments and sentences in the cases of 19 enlisted men because of prejudicial other than jurisdictional error invalidating the judgment. The number in which on established principles such reviewing power should be invoked should be expected largely to increase.

Courts-martial are courts dealing with the right of life and liberty of all who are subject to their jurisdiction, a number already beyond a million, doubtless soon to pass into many millions, of our citizens. They are courts of law administering the law of this land, in accordance with the law of the land, for a great national purpose. Their judgments are judgments of law. Can it be said that their judgments are beyond all legal inquiry; that though they may be arrived at in contravention of all law, if the court, according to the usual narrow jurisdictional tests had jurisdiction, the judgment, though concededly wrong for error of law, is beyond all correction?

There is to-day, as never before, an urgent, impelling necessity for such revisory power; if not here, then elsewhere. It will not do to say that such errors of law affecting the proceedings to the great prejudice of the accused and rendering the judgment bad because thereof, are rare and for that reason may be ignored. That doubtless was the reason why the power was permitted to remain not fully used or to drop into desuetude. But this day finds the Army increased tenfold. A few more months hence it will have been increased twentyfold, and obviously a year hence the Army of the United States must necessarily, if we are to take the part in this war that this Nation purposes to take, consist of three millions of men. The officers of that Army must necessarily be largely untrained officers, conscious, of course, of their great power, required necessarily to exercise it, and exercising it necessarily without the most enlightened judgment or consideration. It will consist of men just come from the shops, the factories, and the farms, unused to Army life, with its peculiar customs and its rigorous duties, willing but uninformed. With such elements, errors upon the part of the officer on the one hand exercising disciplinary authority and on the part of the enlisted man on the other subjected to such authority, must be exceeding numerous and resort to the disciplinary actions through the agencies of the court-martial frequent. The triers of the case will be officers of the same class, and so frequently will be the reviewing and approving authorities. Opportunity for resort to court-martial and opportunity for error in the courts-martial proceedings themselves will be largely multiplied over those that obtain in normal peace conditions. There is chance for grave error in the most enlightened legal system, but still greater chance in a legal system which necessarily must be administered by men uninformed in the law, and an immeasurably greater chance in the case of such an Army as ours must necessarily be. I must assume that no man with the interest of the Army and the country at heart and with the ordinary conception of the necessity of maintaining justice in our institutions could doubt the advisability and the necessity of establishing here or elsewhere such revisory power.

I have no shame in confessing that I feel strongly about this, and not in any contentious way. I am not impelled to file this brief because the Judge Advocate General of the Army disagrees with me, nor the Chief of Staff, nor other authority. I am entirely out of the field of contention. I feel strongly about it as a matter between a man and his fellow men, between an officer and the men whom he should protect, between a man and the Army in which he serves, between a soldier and his Nation. What happened to these men can happen to me. A soldier has nothing but his service. He is honored by his professional reputation or dishonored by the lack of it. Society has established certain rules, which are its law and by which human conduct is tested. All lawyers, at least, understand the methods of applying those tests. If the test be not applied in accordance with the law, there has been no test. It is not sufficient to say that a system of administration of criminal justice may not be a fair and just system, though it provide for no appeal, though the fact remains that no enlightened system has ever permitted a judgment to remain as final when reached in contravention of the rules of law. The question here is whether or not, when, according to the well-understood principles of law and justice, a judgment is concededly and palpably wrong, it must remain and persist as the law of the land in condemnation of an individual while it is concededly wrong. It seems to me that a soldier, before suffering the extreme penalty of death or other serious punishment, should, on principle, be entitled to have the proceedings of his trial examined, not solely by the commander convening the court in the field, but by a separate and independent authority, who, skilled in the law, properly circumstanced, can with the necessary deliberation and considerateness pronounce the trial free from prejudicial error. Even in the absence of statute it would be the duty of the department to endeavor to discover or provide a means whereby such a wrong could be righted. In the case that it could invoke a doubtful statute, it would be the duty of the department on all principle to resolve the doubt in favor of its jurisdiction to apply such a remedy. Surely there can be no excuse for the department's not taking the remedial action which the statute clearly authorizes, indeed, I think, requires it to take.

CONCLUSION.

This revisory power should exist; and I doubt not that when exercised with judicial wisdom and discretion, as it must be if it is a judicial power at all, under proper rules and regulations, it will prove a great help, and never a hindrance, to safe and sound administration, and place military justice upon a plane that will cause it to merit and receive, more than it ever has heretofore received, the approval of the American people. I earnestly ask that this matter may be conceived to be, as doubtless it is, one of prime and fundamental importance to our Army. It is a matter affecting the relations of the Nation to its soldiery; it is a matter at the very base of military justice as an institution; it is a matter affecting justice under the law to the individual soldier. Justice under law is as necessary to the American Army as it is to any other American institution.

ANSELL EXHIBIT D.

COL. WAMBAUGH'S PROPOSED DRAFT OF REGULATIONS TO GOVERN THE COURT OF REVISION.

NOVEMBER 10, 1917.

Memorandum for Gen. Ansell.

Subject: Draft of an executive regulation establishing a national military court of revision.

1. Under the authority of section 1190 of the Revised Statutes of the United States there is established hereby in the office of the Judge Advocate General of the Army a national military court of revision with authority to revise the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions.

2. The national military court will consist of three officers from time to time designated by the Judge Advocate General.

3. The national military court will take into consideration for purposes of revision such general court-martial cases as may be brought to its attention by any party in interest, or by any member of the court, or by the trial judge advocate, or by the officer having power to approve or disapprove the sentence, or by any judge advocate, whether identified with the case or not.

4. The national military court will take into consideration for purposes of revision such special or summary court-martial cases as seem to be of peculiar importance.

5. The power of revision belonging to the national military court shall not include the power to deal with a case before the officer appointing the tribunal has finally dealt with it and shall not include the power to admit new evidence; but it shall include (a) the power to approve or disapprove a finding and to approve only so much of a finding of guilty of a particular offense as involves a finding of guilty of a lesser included offense which in its opinion the evidence of record requires a finding of only the lesser degree of guilt, (b) the power to approve or disapprove the whole or any part of any sentence, and (c) such other powers as may be assigned to the court hereafter.

6. The national military court will disregard such irregularities as are not clearly shown to have injuriously affected substantial rights.

7. The Judge Advocate General will appoint from time to time officers to serve as counsel on each side of the cases considered by the national military court, and parties in interest shall also be entitled to counsel chosen by themselves.

8. The national military court will announce from time to time rules for its own procedure, not in conflict with regulations prescribed by the President, and not in conflict with the Constitution, statutes, and treaties of the United States.

9. The mere considering of a case by the national military court will not serve to suspend the execution of the sentence.

10. A decision of the national military court will not have validity until approved by the Judge Advocate General.

11. If so ordered by the Judge Advocate General a decision of the national military court will be made public and will be accompanied with an opinion stating the case and giving the reasons for the decision.

ANSELL EXHIBIT E.

COL. WAMBAUGH'S SPECIAL BRIEF IN SUPPORT OF THE REVISORY POWER.

1. Section 1199 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, taking its language from acts of 1866 (14 Stat., ch. 299, sec. 12, p. 334), and of 1874 (18 Stat., ch. 458, sec. 2, p. 244), that:

"The Judge Advocate General shall receive, revise, and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions, and perform such other duties as have been heretofore performed by the Judge Advocate General of the Army."

2. What is included within the power and duty of the Judge Advocate General to revise the proceedings of courts-martial?

3. The answer must depend upon the language of that section; and if the language be ambiguous or scanty, the meaning attached to it must be affected by the attitude of mind in which the language is approached. The language certainly is not verbose, though, as will be pointed out later, the chief word used is significant and enlightening, and there may be reason for discussing in a preliminary way, whether the power of the Judge Advocate General over the proceedings of courts-martial would be intended by Congress to be narrow or to be wide.

4. In favor of a narrow consideration there are at least two things to be said. In the first place, the testimony upon which the results of a court-martial are based can not receive from the Judge Advocate General the exact weight to which it is entitled, for stenography can not communicate the appearance of witnesses, their hesitation or eagerness, and the impression by them fairly made upon the members of the court—in short, the atmosphere of the court room. In the second place, to interfere with the findings of the court-martial and of the appointing and reviewing authority may not unreasonably be deemed as endangering of the prestige of the officers thus overruled, and hence a procedure to the detriment of good order and military discipline.

5. Those considerations in favor of a strict construction of the Judge Advocate General's power and duty have been mentioned in order that they may be seen not to have been forgotten.

6. The considerations on the other side are much more weighty. To begin with, this is a remedial statute, and hence it is to be construed liberally in the light of the perceived evil or danger and in the light of the intended result. Notice the danger. It is, briefly, that skillful justice may not be received by persons peculiarly appealing to the desire of Congress that justice be done and be perceived to be done. The persons in question are, most of them, private soldiers, very young men, far from home, and from ordinary advice and influence, on the average not highly educated, not rich, performing, whether by reason of volunteering or by reason of drafting, a service which is of the highest importance to the Government. Whether language tends to achieve careful justice for such persons must be perceived to be intended by Congress to be construed liberally. Again, courts-martial, though their members are unquestionably conscientious, are composed of men not skillful in law or in the weighing of evidence, and these men sit amid surroundings not well adapted to the achieving of accurate results in such matters as these—surroundings not of books and of leisure, but of military cares, physical discomfort, and haste. In our Army the difficulties surrounding a court-martial have always been perceived; and, in consequence, the proceedings of a court-martial are, by our system of military law, inefficacious unless and until there is an approval by the authority appointing the court. Indeed, the court-martial itself—that is to say, the persons who are designated by the appointing authority, but who are commonly deemed the only members of the court—may not unreasonably be said to be treated by the law as no court at all, but as the equivalent of a commission making examinations and reporting recommendations. As the Articles of War of 1806 said (A. W. 65):

"No sentence of a court-martial shall be carried into execution until after the whole proceedings shall have been laid before the officer ordering the same or the officer commanding the troops for the time being."

The articles of war in the Revised Statutes (A. W. 104) are to the same effect, viz:

"No sentence of a court-martial shall be carried into execution until the whole proceedings shall have been approved by the officer ordering the court, or by the officer commanding for the time being."

The words in the present article of war are substantially the same (Art. 46):

"No sentence of a court-martial shall be carried into execution until the same shall have been approved by the officer appointing the court or by the officer commanding for the time being."

7. To refine, one might say that the war court is composed of both the court-martial and the appointing authority or, conceivably, that it is composed of the appointing authority alone. To go into refinements is unnecessary. What is important is to notice that though the court-martial and the appointing authority undoubtedly constitute a tribunal as regular as any other known to the law and a tribunal both argumentatively and expressly recognized in the Constitution of the United States, nevertheless, the tribunal, in each of its parts, needs supplementing.

8. It has already been pointed out that the proceedings of the members who participate in the hearing need and receive investigation by the appointing authority. It must now be pointed out that the appointing authority, though certainly deserving high respect, can not be said to be ideal for the present purpose. The appointing authority is a busy military officer whose specialty is not the ascertaining of law and the weighing of evidence. Although he has the assistance of a department or division judge advocate, the surrounding circumstances are not perfect; and, hence, it is easy to believe that Congress contemplated as desirable a substantial power of revision to the end that the soldier may find himself dealt with as carefully and skillfully as is a civilian offender. Further, even though the appointing authority be expert and full of leisure, there is a substantial danger that the appointing authorities throughout the Army will not bring to pass equivalent sentences for equivalent offenses, and that thus, taking a wide view of the whole Army, there may be such lack of uniformity as may amount to grave injustice.

9. Further, it must not be forgotten that military tribunals are administrative in their nature, and that when customs officers and other administrative officers rule upon rights—though merely rights of property—it is not uncommon to hear that due process of law requires an appeal—whether an appeal to the courts or merely an appeal to a superior officer.

10. These are reasons enough for expecting Congress to establish for military tribunals some sort of appellate procedure, bringing the whole matter ultimately before an expert.

11. Such considerations furnish the atmosphere surrounding the statute, and they show that one should receive with cordiality the provision that the Judge Advocate General shall "revise" the proceedings of all courts-martial.

12. Yet, is not the word "revise" clear? Does it not mean some active procedure by the Judge Advocate General, and some procedure regarding matters of consequence? Can the word mean that the Judge Advocate General is merely to correct spelling, punctuation, and grammar; and if he is to do something more than that, who shall say that he is to stop before he has done the whole of the task which the foregoing discussion has shown to be desirable?

13. The word "revise" is not a technical word of Anglo-American law. It is used now and then in statutes. The construction which has been given to it in statutes not dealing with military matters shows that as regards procedure the word "revise" or the word "revision" has a wide meaning. It is enough for the present purpose to notice what is the meaning given in military law to the word "revise" and to its related word "review." It will be found that the word "review" has a wide meaning in military law, and that the word "revise" has a still wider meaning. The power of the appointing authority, called in military books the reviewing authority, is thus described in the present article of war 47:

"The power to approve the sentence of a court-martial shall be held to include:

"(a) The power to approve or disapprove a finding and to approve only so much of a finding of guilty of a particular offense as involves a finding of guilty of a lesser included offense when, in the opinion of the authority having power to approve, the evidence of record requires a finding of only the lesser degree of guilt; and

"(b) The power to approve or disapprove the whole or any part of the sentence."

14. Wide as is the power of the reviewing authority, the power of revision is still wider. When the reviewing authority refers the case to the court-martial for revision—though, to be sure, that procedure is not mentioned in the Articles of War, and now rests wholly on military custom—the power of revision is understood to include a change in the finding and in the sentence. This wide meaning of the word "revision" is described in all books on military law. It is enough to cite the books from the beginning of the nineteenth century to the year of the adoption of the statute in question. The citations are as follows: Tytler's Military Law, 1806 edition, pages 169 and 338; McCombs' Martial Law, 1809 edition, page 32; Duane's Military Dictionary, 1810 edition, page 600, under the word "revise"; Scott's Military Dictionary, 1864 edition, under the word "revision"; Benet's Military Law, 1868 edition, page 169.

15. In the light, then, of the circumstances and of military custom, the Judge Advocate General's power regarding the proceedings of courts-martial, as now given by the Revised Statutes through the word "revise," goes beyond the mere examining and filing which was the power before this statute was passed. It is not surprising to find that the statute used a word which enlarged the Judge Advocate General's power, for the statute itself recognizes that it enlarges the Judge Advocate General's duties, since it expressly says:

"The Judge Advocate General shall receive, revise, and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions, and perform such other duties as have been heretofore performed by the Judge Advocate General of the Army."

ANSELL EXHIBIT F.

GENERAL CROWDER'S SECOND BRIEF IN OPPOSITION TO THE REVISORY POWER.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, December 17, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Herewith is Gen. Ansell's reply brief on the question of whether or not appellate power to revise, modify, and affirm findings and sentences of courts-martial is, by the terms of section 1199, Revised Statutes, vested in the Judge Advocate General of the Army.

You will recall that on November 10 Gen. Ansell submitted, for your personal consideration, a brief which purported to find in said section this appellate power in the Judge Advocate General. His conclusion was reached on five main points of argument:

(1) That the legislative history of the statute shows that the intent of Congress was to vest the Judge Advocate General with his power;

(2) That the administrative history of the statute disclosed that the power had been actually exercised by Judge Advocates General of the Army during the Civil War and until about 1882;

(3) That the word "revise" (which was the only word that could be considered as such a grant), as used in other statutes, specifically in the Federal bankruptcy statute, had been discussed by a United States court as having sufficient amplitude to convey appellate power;

(4) That the courts of the United States had never passed upon the power; and

(5) That the Judge Advocate General of the British Army is vested with an analogous power.

You passed Gen. Ansell's brief to me and asked me to submit to you my views.

I replied to each one of the foregoing propositions, in substance as follows:

(1) That the legislative history of the statute was without significant incident;

(2) That the records of the Judge Advocate General's Office showed no exercise of this power by Judge Advocates General; but, on the contrary, disclosed many instances where such power, if it existed, would have inevitably been exercised had it been contended for, but which was not exercised.

(3) That Mr. John Tweedale, chief clerk of the War Department, in 1882, had made an affidavit for use in the case of In re Mason, to the effect that he, as chief clerk, knew of no instance where the Judge Advocate General of the Army had in any official communication or report relative to the proceedings of general courts-martial, proceeded to act as an appellate judicial authority; but that his action was only to revise; in other words, to examine and make recommendations, either to the general of the Army, when that officer had appointed the court, or otherwise to the Secretary of War.

(4) That the word "revise" was not relied upon in the Federal bankruptcy act to confer appellate power, which power was granted in express terms elsewhere in the same section cited in Gen. Ansell's brief, and that in its commonly accepted definition the word "revise" did not import such a grant.

(5) That the United States Circuit Court for the Northern District of New York had considered the question almost in the precise terms in which it was presented for your consideration, and had explicitly denied that section 1199, Revised Statutes, granted any such power to the Judge Advocate General.

(6) Finally, that a study of the organization of the British Army disclosed that the judge advocate general of His Majesty's forces had not exercised such powers.

Gen. Ansell now submits to you, through me, a second brief, still contending for the same proposition. He first addressed himself to the evils he would remedy. He shows that a great number of officers, not familiar with court-martial procedure, have lately been included in the Army, and that there is danger of grave error in court-martial proceedings, even when reviewed by judge advocates and approved by duly constituted reviewing authorities. He shows that the exercise of the pardoning power is often not sufficient to restore an officer or a soldier, who has been wrongfully convicted, to his full rights. He argues very strongly from these premises that it is both expedient and necessary that some corrective power should exist which shall have the effect of nullifying even approved findings and sentences of courts-martial, and that we should not be remitted solely to the pardoning power to correct fatal errors of courts-martial and reviewing authorities. He cites again the mutiny case, to which your attention has heretofore been called, as an example, and says, I think justly, that there are other cases, happening particularly since the outbreak of war, which demand the exercise of such corrective power; and down to this point I follow him with substantial concurrence without, however, being able to concur with him that this power has been granted to the Judge Advocate General by section 1199, Revised Statutes.

Gen. Ansell's argument presents, about as strongly as it could be presented, the necessity for an appellate power. But this question is not a new one. Whether such a power should be created and whether the service would gain or lose by such provision has been discussed in service literature since 1885; but never, so far as I can inform myself, has it been suggested in this prior discussion that this appellate power could be deduced from section 1199, Revised Statutes.

The lawyer's mind is not particularly shocked by the fact that there exists in military jurisprudence no court of appeal. The Supreme Court of the United States has held too often, and too clearly to require citation of authorities that it is no objection to a grant of jurisdiction that the grant is original and also final; also that there is no constitutional or necessary right of appeal. There is, therefore, no fundamental reason why court-martial jurisdiction, as at present constituted, should be disturbed. The argument which has heretofore prevailed is that there are substantial reasons of expediency and good administration why it should not be disturbed. War is an emergency condition requiring a far more arbitrary control than peace. The fittest field of application for our penal code is the camp. Court-martial procedure, if it attain its primary end, discipline, must be simple, informal, and prompt. If, for example, all the findings and sentences of courts-martial in France must await finality until the records be sent to Washington, we shall create a situation very embarrassing to the success of our Armies. Such a proposition should hardly be seriously advanced, and it would be very difficult to defend on principle legislation providing appeal in some cases and denying it in others. Yet if we legislate at all on this subject we shall be given to the necessity of doing that very thing.

You have recently issued orders which will be corrective of some of the embarrassments referred to by Gen. Ansell, and I shall shortly submit for your consideration further orders which will, I think, carry corrective action still further and perhaps afford the measure of relief called for.

E. H. CROWDER,
Judge Advocate General.

THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

ANSELL EXHIBIT G.

THE SECRETARY OF WAR'S RULING.

DECEMBER 28, 1917.

Memorandum for Maj. Gen. ENOCH H. CROWDER:

I have read with interest and close attention the vigorous brief of Gen. Ansell on the question as to whether or not appellate power to revise, modify, and affirm findings and sentences of court-martial is conferred upon the Judge Advocate General of the Army by section 1199 of the Revised Statutes.

It is impossible not to admire the earnestness and eloquence with which Gen. Ansell presents his view. For the most part, however, the argument runs to the necessity of the power rather than to its existence. It may very well be that this power should exist, either in the Judge Advocate General or in the Secretary of War, advised by the Judge Advocate General, but if I were asking Congress at this time to give that power, I should feel the necessity of so limiting the language of the donation as not to paralyze the disciplinary power of the commander in chief of the Expeditionary Forces who, it seems to me, is in a situation where grave consequences might be entailed by inconclusive action on his part.

Generally, the administration of justice is a compromise between speed and certainty. The close cases and majority-of-one decisions of our supreme courts would justify the belief that, if there were other courts more supreme in many of these cases different results might finally be obtained; and yet somewhere there has to be an end to litigation, and to that end, therefore, finality is always a question of judgment, resting in legislative discretion. There is nothing intrinsically abhorrent in the idea of finality in judgments of courts-martial approved by the reviewing authority. Whether or not, however, injustices are likely to arise from such a course which would outweigh in gravity the delays necessary to perfect a complete review on appeal is a question about which differences of opinion may well exist.

These considerations have little to do with the immediate question, which is whether or not the use of the word "revise" is legally a donation of appellate jurisdiction. Gen. Ansell cites the act of July 17, 1862 (12 Stat., 598, p. 20 Ansell brief), as directing the return of records of courts-martial to the office of the Judge Advocate General for purposes of revision—on page 21 of his brief, he cites the act of 1864 (13 Stat., 145) generally to the same effect. It would be interesting to know whether summary execution of judgments of courts-martial was at that time also contained in the laws of war. Obviously, if such summary executions were authorized, the subsequent return of the record for revision could not be held to be for appellate review, since it would be a vain thing to review the record after the execution of judgment.

If the word "revise" is to be held to confer appellate jurisdiction, as distinguished from jurisdiction in error, what provision has been made for a retrial or trial de novo, for the summoning of witnesses, and for doing what justice may require in the case. For instance, a report may come to the Judge Advocate General's office which contains radical errors of law. Has the Judge Advocate General the right to set aside the proceedings and direct a new trial to be had before the same or a different court, or may he summon the parties before him with the necessary witnesses and become himself a court-martial, or is he remitted to a quashing of the whole proceedings and restoration of the defendants to their original status, protected from subsequent prosecution by the bar of former jeopardy? In other words, just what procedure is contemplated in the cases which Gen. Ansell has in mind?

I have not the facts in the mutiny cases in mind, but as I recall it, Gen. Ansell ordered the discharge of those convicted of this mutiny, and I assume he felt himself without power to direct the trial of the officer whose misconduct caused the offense. I presume he felt equally without power to examine into such minor derelictions as may have attended the conduct of the men tried for the mutiny, who, even though they may have been guiltless of mutiny, may yet have been derelict in other ways with regard to that incident, which a complete administration of justice could be in a position to take notice of.

I would be glad to have your views upon the two questions suggested here: (1) With regard to the coexistence of the power of summary execution with the power of revision in 1862 and 1864, and (2) The sort of appellate procedure involved in the power to revise, according to the view accepted by Gen. Ansell and his associates.

I am not undertaking to decide this question at this time, but I would be glad to have the further orders to which your memorandum of December 17 refers brought to my attention as early as possible, with your own recommendations as to how far we should go in this matter by executive order, and to what extent legislating redress should be sought.

I am sure that you and I both sympathize with Gen. Ansell's main purpose, which is to establish such processes as will throw around every man in the Army, whether private or officer, the surest safeguards and protections which can be devised against either error of law or passion or mistake of judgment at the hands of those who try him for offenses involving either his property, his honor, or his life.

Cordially, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

ANSELL EXHIBIT H.

GEN. ANSELL'S MEMORANDUM RECOMMENDING THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A REVIEWING OFFICE IN FRANCE.

OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, December 22, 1917.

Memorandum for the Judge Advocate General.

Subject: Certain administrative measures affecting justice and discipline in the Army.

1. It is my judgment that you should give immediate consideration to the following matters:

(a) Regardless of your views or mine upon the question of the revisory power of this office, orderly administration as well as justice requires that sentences of death and sentences resulting, if executed, in immediate expulsion from the Army, should not be executed until the proceedings may be reviewed for prejudicial error by an officer of and representing this bureau, and not of the administrative staff and representing the officer ordering the court and his power. In order that there might be no delay in such review of proceedings, reviewing authorities should be instructed to forward to the reviewing officer of this bureau all proceedings without a moment of delay.

(b) The above consideration would require the establishment in France of such a reviewing officer, with duties as indicated. This administrative method would involve nothing of inhibited delegation of power. Assuming, as I have held, that the revisory power is in the Judge Advocate General of the Army, it is not necessary as a matter of law, as indeed it is not practicable as a matter of fact, that that officer function personally in each case. The function is a function of office; the statute originally establishing the Bureau of Military Justice clearly so indicated, provided for assistants and empowered them, in effect, to perform the duty, under the general supervision, of course, of the head of the office.

S. T. ANSELL.

ANSELL EXHIBIT I.

MEMORANDUM IN SUPPORT OF AN EXTENSION OF THE PROPOSED ADMINISTRATIVE REMEDY AND THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A REVISORY AUTHORITY IN FRANCE.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, January 9, 1917.

Memorandum for Gen. CROWDER.

Subject: Revision of court-martial proceedings.

1. I have just been advised of the step taken by the Secretary of War to prevent the execution of possible illegal death sentences in the United States by requiring that the record be transmitted to the department and reviewed here, that its legal correctness may be assured before execution. While a step in the right direction, I deem it my duty to say that in my judgment it falls short of the requisite degree of remediality in that it is not applicable generally nor to all those sentences which, unless stayed, mean separation of a man from the Army and placing him, in a practical sense, beyond the reach of remedial power subsequently exerted.

2. I see no reason why the same measure of relief should not be extended to dismissal and dishonorable discharge; nor do I see any reason why it should not be made applicable to our forces in France, as well as elsewhere; all of which could, with the establishment of a proper and practical system of revision, be done without evil administrative result and to the advantage of law and justice.

3. This would require the establishment in France of an office representing the functions of the Judge Advocate General, the duties of which would be practically those defined in G. O. 230, July 10, 1864, establishing such reviewing office in Louisville. For your information, I quote that order.

"I, Col. William M. Dunn, Assistant Judge Advocate General, will take post at Louisville, Ky., at which place the office of Assistant Judge Advocate General is hereby established.

"All records of court martial and military commissions which are required by Regulations to be forwarded to the Judge Advocate General, will be sent by officers ordering such courts or commissions within the military departments of the Ohio, the Tennessee, the Cumberland, and Missouri, Arkansas, and Kansas to the Assistant Judge Advocate General, at Louisville.

"With reference to records of courts and commissions it will be the duty of the Assistant Judge Advocate General to call for such as are not forwarded in due season, to examine them, to return for correction such as are incomplete, and to give immediate notice of fatal defects to the proper commander, that sentences may not be illegally executed. He will forward all complete records to the Judge Advocate General, but will not be expected to prepare reports on them unless specially instructed to that effect by the Judge Advocate General.

"II. The Assistant Judge Advocate General will be allowed the number of rooms as office, and fuel therefor, assigned to an Assistant Quartermaster General in paragraph 1068 General Regulations.

"By order of the Secretary of War:

"E. D. TOWNSEND,
"Assistant Adjutant General."

Such an office located conveniently to our general headquarters, could give that thorough, disinterested, and judicial review of such sentences necessary to assure their correctness without considerable or injurious delay.

4. The review of all cases including those which carry sentences separating a man entirely from the service, should be expeditious—not so much that punishment shall be swift as that injustice be not suffered. The power of revision should not be limited to approval or disapproval, but should include all powers possessed by reviewing authorities. When I wrote the original opinion upon the subject I had several of the assistants suggest regulation to govern the exercise of such power and it was then generally agreed that—

"1. The power of revision shall not include the power to deal with the case before the officer appointing the tribunal has finally dealt with it, nor the power to admit new evidence or otherwise retry the facts.

"2. It shall be confined to a review of errors of law injuriously affecting the substantial rights of the accused, and as thus confined and for the limited purpose of corrections such errors of law it shall include—

"(a) The power to declare a proceeding, finding, or sentence void for want of jurisdiction.

"(b) To disapprove a finding and to approve only so much of a finding of guilty of a particular offense as involves a finding of guilty of a lesser included offense when the evidence of record requires a finding of only the lesser degree of guilt.

"(c) To disapprove the whole or any part of any sentence.

"(d) Such other revisory power not exceeding the general scope and purpose herein prescribed as may be found necessary for the correction of such errors.

"3. In a case in which such power is inadequate for the correction of such errors the power shall include the right to return the record to the proper authority that the tribunal may make the necessary revision, or to transmit it to the Secretary of War with a recommendation for a proper exercise of the pardoning power."

5. I think no doubt need be entertained but that such a system of revision would be workable, nor is it of more than academic interest to determine whether the power finds its source in the inherent relation of the President to the Army, or in the statutory donation of Article 38, or in the revisory functions of the Judge Advocate General established by section 1199, Revised Statutes, though, of course, I think it is clearly established in the latter section and not otherwise.

ANSELL EXHIBIT J.

GEN. ANSELL'S MEMORANDUM COMMENTING UPON THE PROPOSED ADMINISTRATIVE REMEDY.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, January 12, 1918.

Memorandum for Gen. CROWDER:

1. You want my views upon Maj. Davis's proposed rule of procedure.

(a) It is, if legally correct, a step—though a weak and uncertain step—in the right direction, in that it gives large partial recognition to the existence of a power somewhere which will prove helpful and salutary.

(b) It is faulty as a definition of revisory power, in that it regards that power as having application only to that very limited number of cases in which sentences should be stayed.

(c) Above all, however, it is, I regret to say, fundamentally wrong as a matter of law. The theory is for the reviewing authority to approve the judgment but suspend its execution until he can be advised of the correctness of the judgment itself; and if advised of its incorrectness, then to revise it himself. Having once approved the judgment, it passes beyond his power to amend, and such power of amendment, if it exists, must be found elsewhere. On the other hand, if the stay of execution affects the judgment itself and makes it conditional, or holds it in gremio legis, as it were, awaiting further action by the reviewing authority, then it is not final and can not be revised here at all. If the reviewing authority does not take final action, there is nothing for this department to revise. If he does take final action, then the judgment passes beyond his power to revise. Take those sentences revised in this office in due course and without stay, which will constitute the great majority of cases. In such cases the action of the reviewing authority is unquestionably final; and if there is to be revision of the judgment at all, it concededly must be done by some authority other than the reviewing authority. In such cases surely the department would have to exercise the power. Viewed from whatever angle, it is perfectly apparent that the source of the authority is in this department and must be exercised by this department, if exercised at all. No system can be devised whereby the convening authority revises his own judgment at the mere suggestion of this department.

(d) The rule, even if it were unquestioned as a matter of law, is contrary to all administrative principle. The corrections to be made are corrections of errors of law discovered upon review here. What reason can there be to require this office to review for errors of law and then be denied the power of correction? In any system of law jurisdictions must be defined. Powers must be located, and they must be powers, not requests. If left undefined, or resting upon mere comity, the system is not likely to stand. The test would come sooner or later, after perhaps a multitude of disagreements. It adds to the administrative burden and the time required to finalize a judgment.

2. I wish I could give concurrence to something which, though less than the full power, would be satisfactory to you and to the Secretary of War, and would serve, at the same time, as a partial remedy. I can not. I may be permitted to say, however, that the limitations which the rule seeks to place upon the exercise of revisory power doubtless have their origin in a fear of the consequence of a full exercise of that power. Not sharing that fear, I can not sympathize with the limitation. Even if I could agree, as I can not, that such limitation has a basis in law, the power, if it exists at all, should be exercised in full. Otherwise, it should be entirely denied. Safety lies in taking one course or the other, and not in a compromise.

3. I have given this question of revisory power the best that is in me. I see no reason whatever to hesitate at the adoption of that definition of revisory jurisdiction which is found in my recent memorandum and which was adopted after most thorough consideration upon the part of many of the assistants of this office as what the law requires. I do not believe, as much as I should like to believe, that what Maj. Davis proposed is sound in law or will prove safe in practice. I regret, therefore that I can not advise you to adopt it.

S. T. ANSELL.

Mr. ANSELL. The War Department disagreed with my view, they adhering to the opposite theory, that these courts are such agencies, have such a relation to the military commander, that when he once puts his stamp of approval on what they do, it passes beyond all corrective power.

There occurred, however, a rather tragic case, contemporaneously with the pendency of these two views in the department, and that case occurred in the very department that the mutiny case had occurred in, and will show you what I consider the chief defect among many great defects of the existing system. There had been a terrible crime committed on our border in Texas by negro soldiers, and those men had been tried for that crime, and, I say, while this difference of view was pending for solution before the department, we were acquainted by the press one morning with the fact that these soldiers had been executed, before we had heard of it or had received the record, notwithstanding the law provides that the proceedings must be sent to the office of the Judge Advocate General for revision.

My understanding of that case is that the portion of the official record completed daily was passed by the judge advocate of the court to the convening authority—the major general commanding that department—who looked over it daily as he received it, and when he had received the last day's record, why, he considered that he had reviewed the case. It met with his approval, and within a short time thereafter, either the next morning or the next day after the last day of the trial, these soldiers, numbering a dozen or more, were executed, leaving the Judge Advocate General of the Army to perform whatever functions he had under section 1199 of the Revised Statutes some four months after these soldiers had been buried.

That occurred to me as a useless and futile proceeding, certainly doing the condemned men little good on this earth.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. These men in this case had been executed before the Judge Advocate General acted?

Mr. ANSELL. They had been executed before the records had been dispatched from the office of the department commander. The records were not received in the office of the Judge Advocate General until some three or four months after the soldiers had been hanged.

Now, I am not saying but that the record justified the execution of those soldiers; that is not my point. I have never examined the record myself. But the time to determine whether the record justified the execution, was before the men were executed. But, above all, whether the execution was later found to have been justified or not, if the authorities here had any statutory duty to perform in the premises, how could they effectively perform that duty?

To show you that we did move forward, in spite of the rather crystallized static views of the War Department during the war, afterwards there arose what might be called a companion case to these cases to which I have just referred. I refer to the Rockford cases of rape.

Senator LENROOT. Where was this?

Mr. ANSELL. At Rockford, Illinois. The military authorities there apparently were desirous of taking the same expeditious course in the cases of those soldiers, and besought the office of the Judge Advocate General under General Order No. 7 to make a very expeditious review of those cases in order that there might be another very expeditious expiation of the offense. I said that there would not be that kind of an examination. If there was any duty imposed on our office under the law—it would be performed in a legal, and as far as possible thoroughgoing, way. Without going into that record it is sufficient to say that under the ruling made by me we did set aside that entire proceeding, and we did order a new trial—that is, the President did, upon my advice—and the men have been retried, with what result I do not know. I will prophesy that some of them will be acquitted on a fair trial. But that case is, to my mind, illustrative of what can happen under this system, under the theory that a court-martial is an emergent, exigent court or agency.

Senator LENROOT. Do I understand that the department has reversed its view in regard to courts-martial?

Mr. ANSELL. The department has at times modified its views. It modified its views, Mr. Chairman, when, as a result of my insistence that executions such as those that occurred in Texas ought to be suspended, at least until somebody up here could review that record, they assumed power, notwithstanding their proposition that the commanding general's power was absolute and not subject to any superior's demands or commands, to issue what is known as General Order No. 7, which was a general order published by the War Department to the effect that, notwithstanding this supreme power of a commanding general to execute these sentences of which he was the final arbiter, nevertheless in all sentences of death, the execution of which placed the victim beyond curative action, the commanding general would suspend his authority until after he had been advised by the War Department.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is only in cases of death sentences?

Mr. ANSELL. Of death sentences; later amended, at my insistence, to include sentences of dishonorable discharge and dismissal from the Army. See Exhibit I.

Senator LENROOT. In the Rockford case, in which I think you said the President ordered a new trial, was that in the form of a formal order or in the form of advice to the commanding general?

Mr. ANSELL. That was in a formal order with respect to certain cases that had to come to him for confirmation anyway. In certain few cases sentences have to be confirmed by him; and my recollection is that in the other cases, not of sentences of death but of long terms of imprisonment, in the same case, as to codefendants, he directed—I think the language would justify that term—the commanding general there to have a new trial.

It ought to be said here that the War Department, quite inconsistently, I think, had assumed the power from somewhere to set aside judgments of courts-martial where the department could say that the court was entirely without jurisdiction, and the judgment was entirely void—not voidable because of error, but void; not reversible, but absolutely void—and said that in those few cases they would undertake to set aside the judgment; denying themselves, at the same time, however, the power to review the judgments of courts-martial for errors of law that rendered the judgment illegal.

Senator LENROOT. Do you think that is an inconsistent position?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes, I think it is very inconsistent.

Senator LENROOT. In one case there would be no court-martial at all; it would be entirely without the law.

Mr. ANSELL. But who can say that a thing is entirely coram non judice? Can one at will dispute the judgment of a court on the ground that it has not jurisdiction? It requires judicial determination. Of course, if the court has not jurisdiction, its proceedings can be attacked collaterally; but judicially, all the same. It is an exercise of a revisory power, to declare a judgment null and void.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Where did they claim to get that authority?

Mr. ANSELL. Nobody has ever known.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It must be from section 1199 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. ANSELL. It ought to be. I do not know. I have asked that. Certainly I would not have allowed that question to pass unexpressed.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It gives a power to revise; that is, a power to set aside.

Mr. ANSELL. I think my brief, if the gentlemen of the committee are interested in it, will set forth clearly and fully my views, and I assume that the briefs on the other side will set forth clearly and fully the opposite views. I only call your attention to the fact that the War Department would stay its hand in a case where they could say that the court was without jurisdiction. In other words, they necessarily would exercise some supervisory jurisdiction over courts-martial.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But they did not exercise that same power where there was no evidence to sustain a judgment?

Mr. ANSELL. No, sir. I have tried to do justice by calling much error jurisdictional error. For instance, I have held in some flagrant cases—and I think I would be backed by authority in doing so—that notwithstanding the fact that the accused nominally had counsel, if that counsel were so incompetent that by reason of that the man did not get a fair trial, that his defense was not presented, he was denied the substantial right of counsel. If in such cases the commanding officer details a man whom he designates as counsel, but the man performs none of the duties, and whatever he does perform is injurious to the case of his client, I would say in that case that the accused had been denied the substantial right to the assistance of counsel. Now, if a man is denied, by administration of the court, this great right, in my judgment it is tenable to say that that court becomes deprived of jurisdiction from that moment on. It may be disputable, but I would hold so; certainly in our situation, where no other means could be employed for correction of that judgment.

Let us take, for instance, the case that I have called the companion case to the cases in Texas. You saw that the soldiers in Texas were hanged before the War Department even knew, officially, of the trial; that is, before the records were received at the department. But we exercised the supervisory power to stay the hand of the commanding general by law until we could look at the record in these Rockford cases, in my judgment a partial exercise of this very power that I contended for. If an appellate court should undertake to order an inferior court to stay its judgment, or issue a supersedeas to that court, it would surely be exercising a revisory, supervisory, or appellate power by so doing.

I mention these cases because they are analogous; they are companion cases. One of them marked the beginning of the war, and the other nearly the ending of the war.

In the one case a great number of soldiers were hanged before their cases had been reviewed. In the other case the military authorities wished to hang a great number of soldiers upon a very expeditious review of their cases, which review would not have taken place at all except for this partial exercise of this appellate or revisory power. In that case some twenty-odd men were to be tried jointly for the single alleged offense of rape. Counsel was notified by the commanding officer on Saturday afternoon at 3 o'clock, over the telephone, that he was to perform the duties of counsel for all these men; on Sunday at noon the court convened and proceeded with the trial of these cases; and at the convention of the court, as I understand it, for the first time counsel was advised of the charge and furnished copies of the charges; they were proceeding to a summary trial of twenty-odd men jointly charged with a capital offense. Counsel moved, naturally, properly, for a continuance, that he might prepare his defense. "Not granted"; on the ground that the division was needed in France, that it soon had to go, and it would be very embarrassing, administratively, to have any delay in this case; and the commanding general had communicated his desire to the court that it should proceed forthwith to a trial and conclusion of the case; therefore the motion for the continuance was denied.

The first session of the court lasted until well after midnight on Sunday night, so that counsel had no time whatever to prepare. And then, as might have been expected in these cases, there were variant defenses, of course, and conflicting defenses, and we had the situation of a single counsel undertaking to represent these codefendants who were presenting conflicting defenses. We had there the spectacle of a counsel cross-examining his own client, for instance, as must be the case where such conflicting defenses are presented by single counsel.

Every error in the calendar of errors was unquestionably committed in that trial; and yet, without this power to review that proceeding, the result must, of course, have been in accordance with the sentence—death for these men.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Were they convicted?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And it was approved by the commanding officer?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And then it reached the Judge Advocate General?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; and it was set aside. And nobody could have done otherwise—no lawyer.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It was not for lack of jurisdiction?

Mr. ANSELL. In order that I might be on the safe side, I held that the error was annihilating as well as simply reversible. I said that when men were railroaded—using, of course, language that was more judicial than that—as these were; when men had no counsel, as these had not—referring, of course, not to the competency of the counsel, but the situation in which he found himself—that the court was ousted of its jurisdiction from that point on, and its proceeding was not a trial at all. I said that these and other numerous errors were so fundamental as to annihilate the judgment, presenting a case for the civil judiciary to take a hand in, if it chose, by way of habeas corpus.

But I said even if it should be held that this error was not annihilating error, it was clearly such as to require a reversal of that judgment, and in such a case the power to reverse ought to be exercised, and surely the power to reverse included the power to order a new trial. I put it up on both points.

Senator LENROOT. Have you any precedent where a court having once acquired jurisdiction it was held that it should be ousted from its jurisdiction because of conduct during the trial?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; I have had occasion to brief that question. Without referring to the authorities now, because I am not sufficiently familiar with them, I will say they exist. If a mob, for instance, should take charge of the court room, I presume that nobody would doubt that that court ceased to be a court from that moment. I should say that, notwithstanding an arraignment, and not disputing the attachment of jurisdiction originally, and not disputing the general jurisdiction of the court to try the case, if the court should deliberately say, "You shall not have counsel," there a fundamental right of that man is denied. If the court should proceed after that—I am not referring merely to the failure to grant a continuance, which lies within the jurisdiction of the court, but to the flagrant denial of the right to have counsel, or the flagrant denial of a man's right to witness under the law and the Constitution—it would thereafter proceed without jurisdiction. I think we have many cases of that kind.

My understanding is that if during the progress of the trial what may be defined to be a fundamental or constitutional right of the man on trial, be denied him by the court, that error may become annihilating error to which habeas corpus might lie. Naturally the court would not lean to declaring it to be such a denial of justice as to work an ouster of jurisdiction except in the most flagrant instances of violation of constitutional provisions designed to protect the rights of a man throughout the trial. If, for instance, he were excluded from the court room during the trial of a felony—excluded by the power of the court, and unlawfully so—I presume that that would work an ouster of jurisdiction.

There are, I assure you, many cases where it has been held that a criminal court may so conduct itself as to deprive a man of a constitutional right of protection during the progress of the trial, resulting in annihilating error; not mere error or law, but an error in regard to a fundamental right, rendering the judgment void.

Senator LENROOT. Yes; I understand that; but I was not aware of the fact that it would go to the extent of an ouster of jurisdiction. But that is neither here nor there.

Mr. ANSELL. Of course that question, as I recollect, was brought up in the Frank case. It would have been conceded there, I suppose, that if mob rule had dominated the proceedings, the proceedings would have been proceedings beyond the proper jurisdiction of the court.

Senator LENROOT. I think the court would have ceased to exist, in that case.

Mr. ANSELL. Of course I do not mean physical displacement of the court. I do not think that would be required.

Well, in any event, the situation when this war began was this: No matter how illegal the judgment, it could not be reviewed. I myself believe if we could have established any revisory power, the exercise of that power, and the incidental power to issue rules and orders requiring the courts to keep within reasonable legal limits, would have gone far to prevent and correct what I call the gross injustice due to court-martial procedure during this war. Whether all will agree with me that there has been such gross injustice, I know not. It seems to me to be now a fact well established. I am satisfied of it. But if we could have established this power there would have been much less of it, because these courts would have been controlled by principles of law instead of by the arbitrary power of military command.

You gentlemen have a bill before you the origin of which is, briefly, this: These gross injustices could not be kept inarticulate even during the war. Complaints were made to Congressmen, to me, and to others. Finally those complaints found congressional expression through the then chairman of this Committee on Military Affairs, and a bill was introduced by him the chief purpose of which, as I recall it, was to establish beyond any dispute this revisory power, and otherwise to subject the power of military command, in its relation to court-martial procedure, to government by legal principles. When that Congress was about to expire and the bill had not been passed, I was asked by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to draft a bill expressive of my views, and what seemed in a large way to be his; and I was subsequently asked by the Secretary of War, in an era of good feeling, to do the same thing.

On April 2, having been invited by the Secretary of War to express my views suggesting remedies for the existing court-martial system, I communicated with the Secretary of War as follows, indicating what I believe to be the defects of the existing system, and enunciating the principles upon which the bill before you is based. [Reading:]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL'S OFFICE,
April 2, 1919.

TO THE ADJUTANT GENERAL

(Through military channels; for consideration by the Secretary of War):

I. Availing myself of the authority of the above memorandum, I will state here briefly my observations, as they may be found in various memoranda and statements of mine within the department, concerning the deficiencies of the existing system of military justice:

(a) First, speaking generally, and of vices which in my judgment destroy every assurance of justice:

(1) The laws of Congress of an organic character should accord with and proceed in furtherance of the fundamental theory that courts-martial are inherently courts, their functions inherently judicial, and their powers must be judicially exercised; and such laws should, under penalty if need be, forbid the department and the Army to disregard the sacred character of these judicial duties and functions.

(2) Organic statute should require that the system be law-controlled, and not controlled as it now is by men, and military men at that, whose training is rather away from judicial appreciations.

(3) Organic law should require that the fundamental rights of an accused, declared in our bill of rights, be recognized and protected throughout the proceeding.

(4) Organic law should abolish the do-as-you-please character of this penal code. Please look at the 42 punitive articles and you will observe that they neither define the offense nor the penalty. In every article the offense is to be punished "as the court-martial may direct" or "with death or as the court-martial may direct" or "with death." Congress tells the courts to do as they please. Such delegations of penal power are intolerable.

(5) Such legislative delegations and legislative indefiniteness are invitations to military authorities, from the President down, to take unrestrained action in specific cases and to resort to mere administrative palliatives to meet a general situation. Administrative expedients which, whether good or bad, may be undone as easily and by the same authority as they were done, should not be accepted as remedies for fixed perversions of military justice; for these can never be corrected within the department within which they arise and by which they are warmly supported.

(6) Such lack of legal control, with the corresponding subjection of judicial functions to the will of military authority, has led to an Army attitude of mind which is intolerant of those methods and processes which are necessary to justice.

(7) Organic law should restrain commanding officers in their altogether too frequent resort to court-martial in general and their too frequent reference to a general court of trivial charges which ought not to be tried at all, or tried by an inferior court, and not referred to a general court with its unlimited power of punishment, and the statutes should compel, by applying penalties if need be, a recognition of the substantial rights of an accused at every stage of the proceeding.

(b) The statute should require that no charge be referred to any inferior court-martial until the commanding officer convening the court shall have made a thorough investigation of the charge and make minutes of the evidence, or shall have had an especially qualified officer to do the same for him, nor until he shall have certified that, in his judgment, the case can not be properly disposed of without trial by court-martial.

(c) The statute should require that no charge shall be referred to a general court-martial for trial until after the judge advocate on the staff of the convening authority shall have certified on the charge that the papers show that a thorough investigation has been made and that, in his opinion, the charge sufficiently alleges an offense triable by court-martial, and that the evidence is prima facie sufficient to sustain the charge.

(d) The statute should abolish the present position of judge advocate as a prosecutor, and should require the assignment of a specially qualified officer to prosecute in the name of the United States.

(e) The statute should make it mandatory that an accused should have military counsel before special and general courts-martial, and authorize him to have civil counsel; and the officer convening the court should be required to assign as military counsel the officer selected by the accused, and in case the accused makes no choice should be required to certify for the benefit of the record that he has assigned to that duty that officer within his command whom, by reason of legal qualification, experience, and rank, he deems best qualified therefor.

(f) The statute should require that an officer of the Judge Advocate General's Department should be assigned to sit with every general court-martial, and should empower him to rule upon all questions of law raised during the proceeding, to sum up the evidence for the court, and to perform generally those functions which are usually performed by a judge sitting with a jury in the trial of a criminal case; and the statute should also require that wherever practicable a specially qualified officer be detailed to sit as a law-member of a special court-martial.

(g) The statute should require that the court and the judge advocate shall function independently of the convening or any other authority, and it should forbid the convening or any other authority to return to the court any record for reconsideration, except for such reconsideration as must operate to the benefit of the accused. The statute should forbid any reconsideration that could result in the changing of a finding of not guilty to one of guilty of any offense, or changing a finding of guilty of a lesser included offense only to a finding of guilty of an offense of higher degree or of a different offense, or increasing the punishment.

(h) The statute should require that the convening authority take no action upon the proceedings of a general court-martial until he shall have had the views of his judge advocate thereon in writing, and no convening authority shall approve any proceeding or sentence of a court-martial pronounced illegal or void by his judge advocate.

(i) The statute should place beyond question the revisory power of the Judge Advocate General of the Army, who should be specifically authorized upon a question of law raised (1) to pronounce the proceedings, findings of guilty, or sentence, in whole or in part, invalid; (2) and in a proper case to recommend to the proper convening authorities that a new trial may be had.

(j) The statute should make offenses and penalties more nearly specific.

(k) The statute should so establish the office and duties of the Judge Advocate General that in their performance he shall not be subjected directly or indirectly to military supervision of any kind, but kept free from that military influence which I regard as offensive to justice.

II. In addition, I respectfully ask you to reconsider your refusal to receive my communication officially, and give it the same publicity you gave the statement of Gen. Crowder and your own letter in support of the existing system. The reason specifically assigned by you is that it involves a personal controversy between me and Gen. Crowder, and that, therefore, it is "obviously useless and improper for publication." I ask your reconsideration on these specific grounds:

(a) The controversy is personal only in the sense that it involves the views and attitude of that officer and myself upon the existing system of military justice. You wished that the people be acquainted with, in order that they might be reassured by, his views and his attitude in support of the system; my statement is designed, in part, to show that the views and the attitude of that officer are not of such credible and bona fide character as to convey any such assurance, and that they would not convey such assurance if their character were understood. Unless my statement is published, the people will not be in a position to judge whether or not the information contained in Gen. Crowder's statement is worthy of public credit.

(b) As a matter of common fairness, inasmuch as you published Gen. Crowder's aspersions upon me in a statement which you invited him to make and then made public, you should not deny me but accord me my right of defense before the same public forum.

S. T. ANSELL,
Lieutenant Colonel, Judge Advocate.

The Secretary of War, notwithstanding the fact that in the morning press we find evidence that now he is of an entirely different state of mind, replied to that memorandum as follows.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Under what date?

Mr. ANSELL. Under date of April 5. [Reading:]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, April 5, 1919.

From: The Adjutant General of the Army.

To: Lieut. Col. S. T. Ansell, Judge Advocate.

• Subject: Indorsement of April 2.

The Secretary of War acknowledges the receipt, through military channels, of the first paragraph of the indorsement made by Lieut. Col. Ansell, under date of April 2, dealing with the subject of proposed changes in the system of military justice. The suggestions made by Lieut. Col. Ansell are entirely appropriate in form and substance and merit earnest consideration, which they will receive. With many of the suggestions the Secretary of War finds himself in hearty concurrence, if, in fact existing statute law is defective in the particulars suggested by the proposed changes. In order that the subject may be fully considered and the views of Lieut. Col. Ansell adequately studied, it is directed that Lieut. Col. Ansell prepare and submit to the Secretary of War at the earliest possible date a draft of such a bill as in his opinion would be adapted to carry into effect the ideas expressed in the first paragraph of his indorsement.

Now, coming down, as I presume logically we ought to come down, to discuss the vices of the existing law, I would like to state those vices as I see them, as I have observed them, under the following propositions.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. May I ask whether you submitted to the Secretary of War a draft of a bill?

Mr. ANSELL. I did; which is the bill that you have here.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Have you ever gotten a reply from him?

Mr. ANSELL. I have not.

The following propositions present the vices of this system:

1. Our code of military justice (technically known as the Articles of War, section 1342 of the Revised Statutes as amended), is thoroughly archaic. It is substantially the British code of 1774, which code was itself of much more ancient origin.

2. The so-called revision of 1916 was but a slight verbal revision, and made not a single systematic or substantial change; and such changes as were introduced but accentuated the vicious principles underlying the code.

3. Our code is a vicious anachronism among our institutions, coming to us, as it did, out of an age and a system of government which we properly regard as intolerable.

4. It came to us through a witless adoption, and our interests in, appreciation of, and attitude toward military matters have never been such as to lead to any systematic change or to any thorough congressional investigation or other fair inquiry into its utter inadaptability to our conditions.

5. The hearings held upon that revision demonstrated that committees of Congress are not well advised when, in investigating military matters of this kind that involve the citizen and his rights when he becomes a soldier, they confine their sources of information to the War Department and the Army.

6. Our code is in sharp conflict with these principles of government, which, in my judgment, our Constitution evidently contemplated should apply to our Army.

7. It is in equally sharp conflict with any adequate military policy that is consistent with the principles of this Government. In my judgment an army of citizens can never again be subjected to such an ill-suited system.

8. The code is not a code of law; it is not buttressed in law, nor are legal conclusions its objective. The courts applying it are only agencies of military command, not courts of law; their proceedings are not regulated by law; their findings are not judgments of law.

9. Setting up and recognizing no legal standards, no lawyers, no judges—in a word, being lawless—it contemplates no errors of law and makes no provisions for their detection or correction.

10. Military autocracy is the frankly expressed fundamental theory of our code. By it our soldiery is governed not by law but by the unregulated will of a military commander. It is, in its entirety, a government by man and not by law. No finer example of such is to be found in any modern government.

11. By the adoption of this code Congress abdicated its constitutional prerogative to make the rules for the discipline of the Army, has authorized military command to make those rules and to do as it pleases in applying them, restrained by no law, no judge. The Judge Advocate General of the Army and his office, the head of the Bureau of Military Justice, the only lawyer and the only legal establishment contemplated by the law of Congress, are by the laws of Congress made expressly subject to the "supervision" and control of the highest military authority, the Chief of Staff of the Army.

12. The result has been, as when men are subjected to the power of other men unregulated by law the result must ever be, a large measure of oppression, gross injustice, and discipline through terrorization.

13. Notwithstanding the tenacious adherence of our War Department to the existing system, it may be well for us to remember that even in times past it has been the subject of criticism of those of our most distinguished soldiers who have studied it—among whom may be mentioned Sherman, Fry, and Lee and the other leaders of the Confederacy—to the effect that it is a system unsuited to our armies.

Now, I presume that going over this may be rather tiresome to the committee. I do not know whether it is as old a story to them as it is to me, but I would like to take up these points, if I might, and develop them as best I can.

Senator LENROOT. Yes; certainly.

Mr. ANSELL. We, of course, while we were British colonies, had the law of the motherland, including the law military; though it ought to be said, because I think it is somewhat significant, that the colonies of that day, before the Revolution, governed their armies, their provincial troops, by a rather different and more liberal local system, which nevertheless regarded the British articles of war, doubtless, as their pattern.

When we came to the Revolution the State levies or quotas were each governed by their local laws.

In the beginning, the Continental Army, of course, had to be governed as best it could by our generals through their knowledge of the only systems they knew—the British system, and the differing local military codes.

Early in the war communications went from Gen. Washington to the Continental Congress to the effect that discipline was unsatisfactory—due largely, doubtless, to the fact that the Continental Congress had not legislated on the subject, that there was not a single code—and that generally the situation was unsatisfactory and something had to be done. This communication came to the attention of Mr. Adams and Mr. Jefferson, the communication having come from Gen. Washington through his judge advocate general. Doubtless the Congress was very much exercised, and these two leaders certainly were, and they resolved that something should be done immediately. Mr. Adams took charge, and I think what happened can be as well described in his own words as in anybody else's. He said:

There was extant, I observed, one system of articles of war which had carried two empires to the head of mankind, the Roman and the British, for the British articles of war are only a literal translation of the Roman. It would be vain for us to seek in our own invention or the records of warlike nations for a more complete system of military discipline. I was, therefore, for reporting the British articles of war totidem verbis. * * * So undigested were the notions of liberty prevalent among the majority of the members most zealously attached to the public cause that to this day I scarcely know how it was possible that these articles could have been carried. They were adopted, however, and they have governed our armies with little variation to this day. (History of the adoption of the British articles of 1774 by the Continental Congress; Life and Works of John Adams, vol. 3, pp. 68–82.)

He indicates that Mr. Jefferson, though appreciating the necessity for doing something, and apparently having pledged himself to help Mr. Adams to see it done, did not well toe the scratch when the moment for performance came. Mr. Adams, himself, said:

It was a very difficult and unpopular subject, and I observed to Jefferson that whatever alteration we should report with the least energy in it or the least tendency to a necessary discipline of the Army would be opposed with as much vehemence as if it were the most perfect; we might as well, therefore, report the complete system at once and let it meet its fate. Something perhaps might be gained.

Afterwards he said that he was really surprised that such a stiff system of discipline should have passed so easily. There may have been a legislative situation that permitted them to put it through with none too much comprehension, for it was put through very rapidly, word for word with the old British code of 1774.

Now, I contend that we have still got the British code of 1774, and I believe that if there is any one thing demonstrable in law it is this thing; it can be shown conclusively by comparing our present-day articles of war, which is the best proof, although requiring considerable time, with the articles of 1774; it can be shown historically by the most eminent writers on military law, the most eminent being Winthrop; it can be shown, indeed it is conceded by all, including the Judge Advocate General, that unless the revision of 1916 changed the code of 1774 then we still have the code of 1774.

There was the "Crowder revision" in 1916, but revisions are of two kinds. The revision of 1916 did strike out some archaic language, it did dress up the articles in language a little more modern than that of Rome or Gustavus Adolphus, or of England of 200 years ago, retaining, however, much of the archaic language but retaining all of the system and all of the substance.

All military writers on the subject—and they are Army men—take pride in the fact that the Articles of War do have this ancient origin. They say truly, and take pride in saying, that probably there is no written law known to us, except portions of our Bill of Rights, that retains so closely the original language and its substance and system as our Articles of War.

Winthrop calls attention to that fact and comments on it as being a wonderful virtue. Now, of course, ordinarily the mere age of a system of law that can stand all these years, and stand satisfactorily and do justice, is evidence of its worth. But this is a penal code, a military penal code, and I think, prima facie, we are justified in looking askance at any penal code that has its origin in England in 1774 and centuries anterior to that time; and I think that in its military aspect we are also justified in looking askance, because we know that the armies of England and of the Continent of that day, from 1500 up to 1774, and even until recently, certainly can not be made to serve as patterns for an American Army of this day.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Why, in a general way?

Mr. ANSELL. In those days there was no such thing as popular control of an army. The people had nothing to do with the army. The army did not come from the people, and was not supported by the people. The army was, indeed, the enemy of popular rights. It was the strong arm of the ruler, king or emperor, by whatever name he might be called.

That was so in England even up to the time of our separation. The armies of those days were armies of feudal retainers. They were armies that belonged to the king. The men in them took, not oaths to support a constitution or the state generally, but oaths of personal fealty obligating them to the king and his military subordinates. They were mercenary armies. We know all this as historical fact. The king hired the men; he bought them and he paid for them, and he did with them as he pleased. Their obligation was not to the state; their obligation was not established and regulated by law or popular will; it was an obligation of personal fealty or loyalty to this feudal superior.

Now, the result was that the king governed those men just as any overlord governed his retainers; more so, because there was no law whatever other than his will. The king was the commander in chief of this army, and he was more; he was the legislator for his army. He was the chief executive, the judge, the legislator, the executioner, the whole thing. The King of England, at the time of our separation, himself performed every duty for the army that the Constitution confers upon Congress. He, and he alone, made all the rules and regulations for the discipline of his army. He prescribed the law, the offense, and the penalty. He appointed the courts; and those courts appointed by him were his agents, or the agents of his under military officers. They were agencies to secure discipline according to the will of the king, or this military subordinate of the king. He told them what to do; he governed their proceedings. If he did not like what they did, then he either did it himself or, when the administration became so extensive that he could not exercise personal control, he did it through others.

The articles of war of 1774 and all antecedent British articles of war were not laws of Parliament. They were not expressions of popular will. They were not the result of common counsel. They were the King's articles of war. He made them. He prescribed what the courts should consist of; he prescribed the offenses; he prescribed the procedure; and without restraint applied such code to his officers and men.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. After the adoption of those same articles of war under the Articles of Federation of the Continental Congress, to whom was that kingly power transferred in our system?

Mr. ANSELL. The executive power in those days was, of course, lodged in Congress, but as a practical matter the power was placed in the Commander in Chief, subject to the supervision of the Continental Congress. The Congress made just enough verbal change to make the system of Britain fit in with our Government as constituted.

But the point is, Congress itself did not legislate. Simply by adoption it took these British articles of war and turned them over to Gen. Washington and to his successors. And there we have them to this day—articles of war that were made by a king and for a king's army, in which he combined all the functions of government, for a set of mercenary soldiers. These same articles are in force in our Government to-day. When our Constitution came along we said, "We are not going to inherit over here any of the quarrel that they have had in all times past in England, indeed, in every country, between the people and the King as to who controls the Army. It is true we are going to make the President of the United States the commander of the Army, but we are going to subject that Army and its government to popular control, to the control of Congress."

I observe in the report that has just been gotten out by the Kernan Board, and which the press this morning quotes the Secretary of War as approving in toto, there are some 8½ of the 16 pages of the report devoted to arguing the proposition of law that the power to prescribe rules of discipline, the rules of government of the Army, is not solely and exclusively in Congress, but that the Commander in Chief of the Army, under the Constitution, has inherited some of these ancient military prerogatives of the British Crown, the prerogative to make articles of war and to convene courts of his own. I say it with no disrespect, but from looking at the personnel of that board, nearly all of them professional military men—two Regular Army officers, one a National Guard officer who devotes most of his time to military service and but little of it, I imagine, to law—I judge that they really must come under the terms adopted by them to describe the right kind of army officer, “a man who knows much of the military and is a lawyer by a sort of courtesy.”

If there is any one thing that seems to me to be established beyond all question and dispute, fundamentally fixed, it is that when the Constitution of the United States said that Congress shall have the power to make rules and regulations for the government of the Army, it conferred that power solely and exclusively upon the Congress. It never, so far as I know, has been disputed before. It would be a very distracting and disturbing state of affairs if it should be held at this late day, as these gentlemen so startlingly argue, that the President of the United States had inherited so much of this kingly prerogative over the Army of the United States that it is not within the power of Congress to create a court of review, whether of Army men or civilian judges, and that if you undertook to do so you would be depriving the President of the United States of some of his kingly prerogative over our Army. They announce that the President of the United States by inheritance has this prerogative power to convene courts-martial and give to such courts instructions, and it is not within the power of Congress to deny it to him.

But they say more, that Congress can not create this superior court-martial, to review the judgments of other courts-martial created by Congress; all deducible out of the fact that he was expressly made Commander-in-Chief of the Army by the Constitution, and all ignoring the fact that the same Constitution expressly and purposely took away from him the power to make rules and regulations for the government of the Army and conferred that power upon Congress.

Senator LENROOT. Do you know how the department reconciles that view, as set forth in its report, with its position with respect to the conclusiveness of courts-martial?

Mr. ANSELL. I was going to bring that up at a later time, Mr. Chairman. Inconsistency is the department's only virtue on this subject. The department held, you see, at the beginning of this war, that, in the absence of further legislation, there was no power on earth that could review the sentence of one of these courts-martial, and they said “this is not resident even in the President of the United States by virtue of any power, but is in Congress;” and they proposed a bill to Congress which I think it might be well for this committee to look at when it comes to take this question up for a more nearly final consideration. If the President had the power which the Kernan Board, with the approval of the Secretary of War, now finds he had, his neglect to use it is responsible for most of the injustice of this war.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It is a short bill. That is the bill of January, 1918?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I wish you would have that inserted in the record at this point.

Mr. ANSELL. Very well.

(The bill referred to is here printed in the record, as follows:)

PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF SECTION 1199, REVISED STATUTES.

[The new matter is in italics.]

The Judge Advocate General shall receive, revise, and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions, and report thereon to the President, who shall have power to disapprove, vacate, or set aside any finding, in whole or in part, to modify, vacate, or set aside any sentence, in whole or in part, and to direct the execution of such part only of any sentence as has not been vacated or set aside. The President may suspend the execution of sentences in such classes of cases as may be designated by him until acted upon as herein provided, and may return any record through the reviewing authority to the court for reconsideration or correction. In addition to the duties herein enumerated to be performed by the Judge Advocate General, he shall perform such other duties as have been heretofore performed by the Judge Advocate General of the Army.

(Following is the letter submitting said bill:)

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 19, 1918.

HON. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,

Chairman Senate Committee on Military Affairs.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am inclosing herewith a draft of a proposed amendment of section 1199, Revised Statutes, which has my complete approval. I hope that it will likewise meet with the approval of your committee and that an opportunity may be found of securing its early enactment into law.

The general purpose of the proposed legislation is to vest in the President revisory powers in respect to sentences of courts-martial and other military tribunals. It has been the subject of thoughtful consideration by the Judge Advocate General, and in the light of the new conditions which now confront us, it is believed to be both wise and necessary.

The proposed amendment involves three propositions, viz, (a) vesting in the President the power to disapprove, modify, vacate, or set aside either in whole or in part any finding or sentence, and to direct the execution of such part of any sentence as has not been vacated or set aside; (b) the power to suspend execution of sentences in such classes of cases as he may designate until there has been opportunity to consider and act thereon; and (c) the power to return any trial record to the court through the reviewing authority for reconsideration or correction.

The first proposition finds its analogy in the civil courts, in the appellate power lodged in a supreme court. The second is a related power to suspend execution of a judgment pending appellate review, in order, when deemed advisable, to preserve the status quo. The third is to enlarge the power now exercised by the President so as to embrace cases coming to him for consideration under the provisions of the proposed amendment. At the present time the President exercises the power of returning to the court, through the reviewing authority, the record of any trial which has been forwarded to him for confirmation.

I believe that it would be wise public policy to lodge these powers in the President. He is the Commander in Chief of the Army, the supreme military authority, and bears to the Military Establishment and to the administration of military justice a relation analogous to that occupied by the Supreme Court in the structure of a civil judiciary. Upon him devolves the duty of securing efficiency and maintaining discipline in the military forces, and at the same time so to adjust the operation of the machinery of the military courts that, so far as possible, instances of injustice to the individual soldier will be reduced to a minimum.

The present Articles of War authorize any officer, competent to convene a general court-martial, to approve and carry into execution any sentence affecting an enlisted man, including noncommissioned officers, excepting the death sentence; and, in addition, the commanding general of a territorial department, or territorial division, or of any army in the field in time of war, as the present, may approve and carry into execution a sentence of death in certain enumerated cases, or the dismissal of an officer below the grade of brigadier general (arts. 46-48). In these cases no confirmation seems to be authorized or contemplated by the President, although the officer approving the sentence may, if he sees fit, suspend execution until the pleasure of the President is known (51st article of war). In these respects the present Articles of War do not differ essentially from the prior compilations of 1806 and 1874, although in 1862, during the Civil War, it was provided by independent legislation that a sentence of death, or of imprisonment in a penitentiary, should not be carried into execution until approved by the President. (Sec. 5, act of July 17, 1862, 12 Stat., 598.) The legislation which is now found in section 1199, Revised Statutes, originated in 1862 and thereafter went through sundry changes without affecting its essential characteristics. (Sec. 5, act of July 17, 1862, 12 Stat., 598; sec. 5, act of June 20, 1864, 13 Stat., 145.) Throughout the whole period that this legislation has been in effect it has been the practice for the Judge Advocate General of the Army to examine the records of trial by general courts-martial and other military courts primarily with the view of determining whether the proceedings were regular and valid, and to make report thereon through the Secretary of War to the President. During that whole time it has been the settled construction and practice of the War Department and its officers to regard as final and beyond appellate or corrective action the judgments of courts-martial when approved by the reviewing authority, except in cases where the proceedings were coram non iudice or for other cause void ab initio. Thus it has been held by the Judge Advocate General in many cases that a sentence pronounced by a court-martial and approved by the proper convening authority, was final and could not be revoked or set aside by the President or by any department of the Government unless the court was without jurisdiction or the proceedings were invalid, and that relief could be had only through the exercise of the executive power to pardon.

We are now assembling a large Army. Our young men are being drawn from the homes of the Nation and placed in military service, both in the ranks and as officers. A very large percentage of the officers of the new Army are of necessity drawn from civil life, and it is no reflection upon them to say that they have had little, if any opportunity to acquaint themselves with the history, usages, or principles of military law, or the practice of military tribunals.

In our new Army, more than ever before, it is not at all unlikely that sentences may be imposed by courts-martial and approved by the reviewing authorities which, if carried into execution, will work great injustice to the individual soldier. In practice and under existing legislation the trial records now come to the office of the Judge Advocate General for review. In that office cases may be examined with deliberation far removed from the immediate atmosphere of apparent military exigency. It is the purpose of the proposed legislation, when it appears, after such examination, that the substantial rights of the accused were disregarded upon the trial, or the evidence is insufficient, or an unnecessarily severe sentence has been imposed, or for other cause the sentence should be modified or set aside, to vest in the President clear statutory authority to disapprove, modify, vacate, or set aside any finding or sentence, in whole or in part. In order that he may have an opportunity to exercise this revisory power, it is proposed to give him authority to suspend execution of such sentences until opportunity has been had for review by the Judge Advocate General and a report thereon to him. With this power conferred and this practice established, a person found to have been erroneously convicted, or upon whom too severe a sentence has been imposed, may in the one case have his innocence adjudged, and in the other the proper sentence imposed, and not, as now, be remitted for relief to the pardoning power of the Executive, which leaves the question of guilt untouched and operates only by way of Executive clemency.

It will be noted that the proposed legislation authorizes the President to designate the classes of cases in which sentence shall be suspended until the case has been reviewed by the Judge Advocate General, and report made to the President. In a great majority of cases tried by courts-martial there will be no necessity for the application of the new legislation, for instance, special and summary courts deal with minor military offenses. These courts have but a limited jurisdiction as to the sentences which may be imposed, and as to such sentences, it is believed that there is no good reason why final action may not be taken by the officer appointing the court. The classes of cases intended to be reached are those which involve a sentence of death, dishonorable discharge, or dismissal. By leaving to the President the power of designating the classes of cases in which execution of sentence may be suspended, pending his action thereon, the practice to be followed may be adjusted from time to time to meet changing conditions in the military situation.

Under the ninety-sixth article of war, courts-martial are given jurisdiction to try persons subject to military law for "all crimes or offenses not capital." Under this grant of jurisdiction persons in the military service are now frequently tried for the commission of civil crimes, and it is obvious that the trial of these offenses by military courts, unlearned in the law, adds an element of uncertainty as to the legality of the outcome, which serves forcibly to emphasize the need of the revisory powers herein suggested for the protection of persons accused of crime, and to safeguard the administration of military justice.

When the existing Articles of War were revised in 1916 there was introduced as new matter the thirty-eighth article of war, which authorizes the President to prescribe rules of procedure in cases before courts-martial and other military courts. Under this grant of power the President has promulgated certain rules of procedure suspending the execution of sentences of dishonorable discharge, death, and dismissal until the records of trial in such cases have been reviewed in the office of the Judge Advocate General, but it is clear, for the reasons heretofore pointed out, that the exercise of this power does not meet all the requirements of the situation. In order to place the whole matter where it will be beyond cavil or dispute, and by a clear grant of statutory power to vest in the President an authority which he should, beyond all question, be authorized to exercise, the legislation requested should be enacted into law, since its whole purpose is to protect the rights of men on trial, and to remove the possibility of being compelled to say in any case that an injustice has been done for which the statutes provide no clear or adequate remedy.

I am sure the Judge Advocate General will be glad to appear in person, or by representative, before your committee, should any further explanation of the proposed legislation be desired.

Very respectfully,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

Mr. ANSELL. There they come to Congress and ask Congress to confer out of its power, upon the President of the United States, whom they regard as the proper depository of this power if it is to be delegated to any military official or to anybody else, this revisory power; but in doing so I bid you take notice of the fact that they carry along up to this highest court, the President of the United States, the power that they insist all military commanders shall have, the power not simply to revise for an error of law, and modify and reverse—not that—but the power to set aside the finding of not guilty, an acquittal, and to substitute for it a conviction; the power to substitute a finding of a large offense for one of minor or lesser included degree and—

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. May I not interrupt you, General, because the history of it is so interesting to me that I think it ought to be embodied here, to speak of the motive which prompted the submission of those articles of war to the Senate of the United States?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; just one more thing, if you will pardon me.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. ANSELL (continuing). And the power to strike down a smaller punishment and substitute for it a larger one.

Now, this is no more than what the subordinate military officials who convene general courts-martial have, and the power for which they have ever contended, so far as I know, up to this time, although there seem to be signs of awakening with respect to some of them.

If I may be permitted to say it—and I think I may because of my intense interest in this subject and because I think that this committee ought always to know the motives and purposes back of the submission of proposed legislation of this kind—I should like to say that I have never believed, and I have good reasons for not believing, that that bill was submitted to this body in good faith. That bill was drafted and submitted by the Judge Advocate General of the Army, through and with the approval of the Secretary of War. The question is, did the Judge Advocate General of the Army and the Secretary of War at that time want any revisory power? And really, do they want any now?

In the first place, if they had actually been desirous of discovering or locating this revisory power so that the judgments of courts-martial could have been kept within legal check, they would have given far better evidence of it by accepting that construction of the statute which, even if they regarded it as doubtful, they would have been justified in accepting to reach this desirable end, when the officer who was at that time the chief law officer of the Army, or acting as such by the authority of the War Department, had, upon most thorough consideration, written an office opinion to that effect, which had been concurred in by every single lawyer in that department, without the slightest imposition upon them by me. It could not have been, I say, so far wrong, conceding it to be disputable, which I do not concede, but that they could have accepted it and established this revisory power and thereby prevented what I conceive to be the grossest injustice, during this war. The Secretary of War now finds the President has such power constitutionally.

But, too, if it be thought that they had intended a real revisory power, the bill itself is evidence to the contrary. I can hardly conceive that anybody would submit such a bill as that to the Congress of the United States expecting it to pass upon thorough investigation, because few men in touch with the people of the United States, representatives of the people of the United States, would ever give their approval to a proposition that is so un-American, so basically illegal, and unjust and unfair, as to permit any man to strike down the judgment of a court to the disadvantage of the accused, substituting harsher punishment, harsher penalties, than the court awarded!

Analyzing that bill, let us see what kind of revision we would have gotten out of that bill. That bill would have had to be construed together with that section of the act of 1903 creating and defining the duties of the General Staff. It is all well and good to say, upon paper, that the President of the United States shall be this court of appeals, or whatever else it is to be called; but we know—any man who knows anything about this Government knows—that the President of the United States himself cannot perform such functions, first and largely because of the multiplicity and volume of his duties, and because of the crushing volume of work that would be brought to him by reason of such legislation.

Think of any President reviewing that number of criminal cases, which, with such review as we have given them, have taken 108 lawyers to review in the office of the Judge Advocate General! As a practical matter, the President of the United States could not perform the duties; he would not be expected to perform the duties. But as a matter of law he need not and would not, perform the duties because, construing the proposed legislation with legislation already existing, you would find that the Chief of Staff would be substituted for the President of the United States. By the General Staff act the Chief of Staff of the Army is the trusted adviser, upon all matters military, of the President of the United States and of the Secretary of War; and we know, and it has been held time and time again, that the Secretary of War is the constitutional mouthpiece of the President of the United States, and when he acts for the President of the United States there can be no inquiry into whether or not he has the actual authority. I invite your attention to the General Staff act. So much for the necessary delegation, and the delegation authorized by statute.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Let me interrupt you there for a moment to say that—we have it in the record—I introduced the bill in January, 1918, at the request of the Secretary of War, as the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, but our committee declined to consider it.

Mr. ANSELL. I so understand, and I think it is a good thing that it was never enacted into law, because it would have carried this iniquitous system one step further.

Senator LENROOT. Was that bill accompanied with any report from the Secretary?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It was, was it not?

Mr. ANSELL. There were letters with it; yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I think we might as well print that bill in this record, and if we can get the letters, put them in.

Senator LENROOT. If you can get the letters, put them in; yes.

The matter referred to, with an accompanying letter, will be found printed in this record at page 108.

Mr. ANSELL. I say if that bill had passed, or if any bill is passed. I wish to assure this committee, lodging this revisory power in the President of the United States, you might as well just say that it shall be lodged in the Chief of Staff of the Army.

Now, the bureaucrats of the Army were perturbed about this revisory power. When I wrote the opinion that these court-martial judgments should be revised, the ultramilitary bureau chiefs of the War Department came to the support of the existing system, as they have ever done, with the slogan that the relationship between courts-martial and the power of military command for the enforcement of discipline must be conceded; that the courts can not be independent of the military command; that the law of the courts is the will of the military commander, and is subject to his judgment and discretion and his command; that there is no other way of getting discipline, according to their sense and meaning of that word. Their slogan—the slogan of Judge Advocate General Crowder—was that the military law finds its fittest field of application in the military camp and by the military commander, without review or supervision. Probably the great majority of the high ranking officers of the Military Establishment agree in this. Doubtless they are honest in that. They have heard it all their lives; they have been brought up under that system; they believe that discipline can not be regulated by law, but must be regulated by the will of the military commander; that justice as determined by the application of legal principles has no place in the Army, and that such justice as we have is the justice which appeals as such to the natural sense of justice of some military commander, modified by his view of what the exigency requires.

Contemporaneously with the submission of this bill to the Congress of the United States—both Houses of it—the Judge Advocate General of the Army, its author and proponent, dispatched to his senior Judge Advocate General in France upon the staff of Gen. Pershing a letter and placed it upon the files of the War Department, apologizing for or excusing the fact that he had had to get out this general order No. 7 which withheld the hand of the executioner until there could be a sort of revision in the department. In that letter he asked that the reasons be explained to Gen. Pershing. He said it was necessary that the War Department do something in deference to popular opinion; it was necessary that the War Department do something “to head off a congressional investigation;” it was necessary that the War Department do something, or before long Congress would be talking about creating an appellate court with revisory power, which was anathema to the Army; and lastly, that it was necessary that the War Department do something in order to have the man in the ranks believe that he was getting some kind of revision of his case other than that which takes place at field headquarters.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Will you get that letter and put it in the record there?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes, sir; I can do that.

ESTABLISHMENT OF MILITARY JUSTICE—PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF THE ARTICLES OF WAR.

---

TUESDAY, AUGUST 26, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to adjournment, in the room of the Committee on Appropriations in the Capitol, at 10 o'clock a. m., Senator Irvine L. Lenroot presiding.

Present, Senators Lenroot (acting chairman) and Chamberlain.

STATEMENT OF MR. SAMUEL T. ANSELL—Resumed.

Mr. ANSELL. Yesterday I was requested by the committee to put into the record a letter to which I had referred, it being a letter from the Judge Advocate General of the Army to the senior judge advocate in France, the judge advocate upon the staff of Gen. Pershing, written practically contemporaneously with the submission of his proposed legislation to the Congress, whereby there was to be established a revisory power in the President of the United States. I said yesterday that this was part of the abundant evidence to prove, to my mind, that the Judge Advocate General of the Army and the War Department were not acting in good faith in making that proposition to Congress. I said that that letter showed expressly and in terms that the adoption of general order No. 7, which was a partial and ineffectual exercise of revisory power to the extent of requiring the commanding general below to withhold the execution of sentence in certain cases, was simply an administrative makeshift, intended to head off a more thorough and drastic reform.

I submit that letter, as I promised yesterday I would do, for the record.

APRIL 5, 1918.

Brig. Gen. WALTER A. BETHEL,
American Expeditionary Forces, France.

MY DEAR BETHEL: I am going to spend the necessary time out of a very busy day in an attempt to clear up the situation in respect to the establishment in France of a branch of the Judge Advocate General's Office, regarding which matter there seems to have been more or less misapprehension at your headquarters. You are, of course, familiar with the cable correspondence which has passed on the subject. For your convenience in reference, however, I inclose a copy of a memorandum that I have had prepared for the Chief of Staff, in which that correspondence is reviewed and set out in sequence.

First, let me say that it is difficult for me to understand why, upon receipt of the two cablegrams of January 20, 1918, one cabling Gen. Pershing the contents of General Order No. 7, and the other designating you as Acting Judge Advocate General, the branch office of the Judge Advocate General was not immediately established. I assumed that it was in operation from that time, and continued of this view until the receipt of Gen. Pershing's cablegram of February 25, 1918, wherein he says:

"Brig. Gen. Walter A. Bethel has not established branch office and will not do so pending further instructions."

This leads me to comment upon the situation which is presented by Gen. Pershing's cablegram No. 779, which seems to imply some dissent from the action here taken in establishing the branch office. He appears to view it as a possible obstruction to the administration of military justice and as a mistake of judgment.

I wish you would assure Gen. Pershing (whom I would address directly but for the reason that I know he has no time to read letters) that every thought of this office, and I believe every thought of the War Department, is directed toward the discovery of ways and means to help him in his enormous task; that our idea was to expedite and not delay, and that he will understand better the occasion for this order if he will consider the following:

Prior to the issue of General Order No. 7 it had become apparent that, due to the large increase in commissioned personnel, which included many officers with little or no experience in court-martial practice, a large number of proceedings were coming in which exhibited fatal defects. A congressional investigation was threatened and there was talk of the establishment of courts of appeal. The remedy for the situation was immediate executive action which would make it clearly apparent that an accused did get some kind of revision of his court-martial proceedings other than the revision at field headquarters, where these prejudicial errors were occurring. At this point permit me to say that very few errors have been discovered in cases coming up from your headquarters. It was primarily with reference to errors occurring at field headquarters other than in France that this step was taken.

Accordingly we formulated the scheme of General Order No. 7. The Secretary of War gave personal consideration to the matter and on three or four occasions discussed it exhaustively with this office. He finally approved the order and contemplated, as I did, the establishment of the branch office promptly upon the receipt of our two cables of January 20. I may say here that at other headquarters the scheme has worked beautifully. It has silenced all criticism, and I believe that no invalid sentences are now beyond the reach of remedial action.

Your own intimate knowledge of court-martial procedure makes it quite unnecessary for me to enter upon a lengthy discussion of the merit of the new system which, I feel quite sure, will not fail to commend itself to you as a substantial step in the right direction. As stated in my memorandum to the Chief of Staff, it is believed that had Gen. Pershing fully understood the purpose and operation of General Order No. 7 his cablegram No. 779 of March 24, 1918, would not have been sent. I trust that the cablegram which I have recommended be sent him in reply, a draft of which is contained in the concluding paragraph of the inclosed memorandum, will serve to convince him of the wisdom and propriety of the issue of this order and that the procedure it contemplates will materially aid rather than obstruct the prompt and efficient administration of military justice in the American Expeditionary Forces.

With best wishes, I am,

Very truly, yours,

E. H. CROWDER,
Judge Advocate General.

Yesterday I was also requested to put into the record the opinions and memoranda evidencing my efforts at the beginning of the war to subject courts-martial to legal restraint through the establishment of a revisory power in the office of the Judge Advocate General or elsewhere in the War Department, and likewise the memoranda prepared by the Judge Advocate General and the Secretary of War, supported by the concurring views of the then acting Chief of Staff and Inspector General of the Army, in opposition to such a power, and in which they contended, first, that no such power did exist under the law, and secondly, that no such power ought to exist.

I regarded all those gentlemen as thoroughly reactionary, and I said so at the time, and I think the subsequent course of the administration of military justice during the war will amply justify that statement. They contended that no such power ought to exist, because in order to secure discipline a commanding general should control courts-martial and should be permitted to do with them as he pleased. These documents I have already placed in this record.

In order that this committee may more clearly see what was at issue then and what is at issue now, I would like to read the points that were made by me in this opinion—and when I say “me” I am not speaking personally; I am speaking for the office of the Judge Advocate General as I presided over it—an opinion in which every officer in the department at the time, except Gen. Crowder, who was in fact detached, agreed. I have inserted in the record this brief in support of the original opinion; but wishing you might know the points that were made, I will briefly read them, although these points, of course, need not be taken down.

(Mr. Ansell here read to the committee from page 45 of the hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs of the United States Senate on trials by courts-martial, the same being part of the hearing of February 13, 1919, which the stenographer was directed not to report.)

Mr. ANSELL. I wish to say here for the benefit of the record, that the Texas mutiny case, so called, was finally disposed of by a memorandum of the Secretary of War which will be found among these exhibits in these Senate hearings. Here it is. It reads as follows:

NOVEMBER 27, 1917.

“As a convenient mode of doing justice exists in the instant cases, I shall be glad to act in reliance upon a usual power and leave this larger question for future consideration, informed by the further study which the Judge Advocate General is giving it. Ordinarily, however, the extraction of new and large grants of power by reinterpreting familiar statutes with settled practical construction is unwise. A frank appeal to the legislature for added power is wiser.
BAKER.”

I wish the committee to notice the confusion that obtains in the War Department, a confusion which seems to me does not do credit to a man of ordinary intelligence, not to mention a lawyer, to the effect that mercy or clemency—and military clemency is of the very mild kind known as the remission of military penalties—is or can ever be “a convenient mode of doing justice.” The Secretary of War, I think, did act under a misapprehension here. At that time, I know from personal conferences with the Secretary of War, he did not appreciate the real purpose and legal effect of pardon, and especially this kind of pardon. He was content, however, to be imposed upon, to be advised that notwithstanding that he conceded this trial was all wrong, that the men ought never to have been tried at all, that the judgment was illegal and, if there had been any possible way of doing it, should have been set aside, and the whole prosecution dismissed, nevertheless he could do nothing to reverse the illegal conviction but would let it stand, and employ as a full measure of justice the convenient method of remission.

Now let us see what situation it left those men in, men of from three to twenty years' service; noncommissioned officers. If they were the right kind of noncommissioned officers—as they were—they were just as proud of their warrants, and ought to have been, as I was of my commission as brigadier general. They are entitled to the same respect. They are an essential cog in any military machinery. Non-commissioned officers are wonderful men when they are the right kind of men; men of natural leadership, far more so than many of our officers upon whom the stamp of sovereignty has been conventionally placed, and who have not worked up or given any evidence of leadership. These men were branded as mutineers by the judgment of a court, irrevocable. Their service terminated that moment; their enlistment was cut short; the continuity of their service was interrupted; their continuous-service pay had been taken away from them.

Now, upon the advice of the Judge Advocate General—and I evidence this only to give you a fair insight into the appreciations that the War Department has for justice to the individual—the Secretary says to these unjustly convicted men: “I will do convenient justice; I will permit you to reenlist.” They had been out of the service all of the time that had elapsed between the date of the trial and the time that I brought this matter to the attention of the War Department and it finally decided to take this action. The Secretary said, “I will permit you to reenlist under a statute which says that when a man has been properly convicted and the Secretary of War believes that he has actually expiated his offense and has come back and has shown that he is a good man, the Secretary may then waive the inhibitions placed upon his reenlistment by the Act of 1894, to the effect that no man who has been dishonorably discharged from the Army can be reenlisted therein.” So the Secretary and his Judge Advocate General, in doing justice conveniently, proceeded upon the ground that these men were of the felonious type and had been properly discharged, and then found by way of fiction that they had rehabilitated themselves. Thus these men are graciously permitted their reenlistment as privates, in an army from which they had been illegally expelled, and in which they can start to work up again. They lose, besides, their right to continuous service and continuous service pay. So that the net result is that they are put back into the service by this straining of the statute, in order to do some justice to the men, but they lose their continuous service, they are branded, they have to start in as privates again, and they are really marked men, which I think we can all understand.

Senator LENROOT. Does that also affect their retirement status?

Mr. ANSELL. Their retirement?

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. ANSELL. No, Senator; retirement is presumed to be the most honorable of——

Senator LENROOT. No, but I mean as to the benefits after retirement, they having been out of service and then reenlisted.

Mr. ANSELL. No; because that depends upon a certain number of years——

Senator LENROOT. Upon the number of years in service?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes.

Senator LENROOT. And it would affect their retirement as non-commissioned officers?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes, certainly; though if at the time of their retirement some commissioned officer should happen to be favorably disposed, he might promote them and pass them for retirement.

But anybody could see that men are desperately prejudiced by such a situation as this. Now, it was a strange thing to me that I should have to argue with the authorities of the War Department that this, however convenient, was not a full measure of doing justice in the instant case. I say it is strange to me that you have to argue with any man that forgiveness of sin was what those men needed, when concededly they had committed no sin; that they were asking pardon for transgression of a law they had never violated. In my mind it is absurd. Yet I use this case to illustrate what has been done already in between 6,000 and 7,000 cases, since flagrant war was over, by the special clemency board, and of which I was, until I resigned, the head, nominally at least.

I was responsible that that much justice be done the thousands illegally convicted. It is a convenient but poor need of justice.

The War Department takes great pride in the fact that they have applied this remissive clemency to the point where they have reduced these illegal penalties 87 per cent. The average period of confinement for every person imprisoned as the result of the sentence of a general court-martial was 7.6 years, including all offenses, many of them trivial. The average was 7.6 years, excluding, of course, the imprisonments for life and those sentences resulting from commuting death sentences into imprisonment. They have reduced those sentences until the imprisonment left is less than 13 per cent of the original sentences, and the hue and cry goes abroad by proclamation, "See how lenient we are," when, as a matter of fact, applying not over-meticulous tests, but the test that a man of trained legal intelligence must apply in order to achieve essential justice, more than 60 per cent of those cases were so badly tried that no man—no fair-minded and intelligent man—could say that the records can be relied upon to sustain any punishment.

Now, the War Department hates to admit that the basic motive for clemency is to be found in the illegality or the unreliability of the proceedings, but has advertised to the world that the proceedings were correct, and that these punishments had to be given in terrorem. The department says that now that the war is over we can afford to reduce them. Of course, the department has been compelled to do something, and has done no more than it was compelled to do.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But the exercise of clemency does not remove the stigma of guilt, even where there was no evidence to sustain it.

Mr. ANSELL. I am glad you brought that up, sir, because the proclamation goes forth now that the sentence of dishonorable discharge is, as a rule, remitted.

Senator LENROOT. I suppose it would be true, would it not, that in time of war a very much more severe sentence in a given case might be proper?

Mr. ANSELL. Why, certainly, owing to the circumstances. For instance, I can conceive, as I think we can all conceive, that sleeping on post in the immediate presence of the enemy is an entirely different proposition from sleeping on post, during this war, in the southwest.

Senator LENROOT. Or being absent without leave?

Mr. ANSELL. Or being absent without leave, yes; exactly so. Therefore there must be tolerably large discretion as to penalties that will enable these courts to take care of the circumstances surrounding the offense. But in this matter I again call your attention to the report of the Kernan Board to which the Secretary of War himself has just given unqualified approval. They have abandoned what I had supposed to be not only the good old American, but the commonsense doctrine that the punishment ought to be graduated to fit the grade of the crime, and they say you can not grade military offenses.

They took, for instance, the case that I cited before the committee last spring, which was a case of a man having disobeyed the order to "stop smoking that cigarette," in the highly hostile environment of a New Jersey camp. You can picture the situation; a lot of troops, green men, undergoing training and instruction. Some of them were detailed to do kitchen police, rather removed from the formal exactions of the military requirements. They were cooks, waiters, and so on. Nothing was hardly more natural than that a boy who was used to smoking cigarettes should put a cigarette in his mouth. There was not a powder factory around there or a gasoline tank, or anything of that sort. There was simply a kitchen.

Some officer who had been in the service less than three weeks—although I will assure you that some of them who have been in the service no less than 30 years give similar orders—saw this youngster with a cigarette and said, "Stop smoking that cigarette." Offensive, I suppose, to the kitchen! He had a package of cigarettes in his shirt pocket. "Give me those cigarettes." Well, the youngster said, "What have you got to do with it? I will not give you my cigarettes, and I am not going to stop smoking this cigarette." What was the result? That boy was tried by court-martial and was sentenced to be dishonorably discharged from the Army and to 25 years' imprisonment. The Kernan Board likened that to a canker or to gangrene that the surgeon must cut out lest it spread to the whole military body and result in death to the Army.

Now, I submit that that is absurdly far-fetched, and that you can not apply any such hard and fast rule as that. That is the trouble. Whenever a government does not discriminate between disobedience of orders as committed under the circumstances designated here, and disobedience of an order to a man to take his rifle and fire or charge at the enemy on the firing line, then it is likely to lose the respect and the loyal sentiments of intelligent men.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. A summary court-martial was all that was necessary, if anything, in a case like that.

Mr. ANSELL. Nothing was necessary, Senator, but the application of a little common sense.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I say, if anything was necessary.

Mr. ANSELL. They talk a great deal about the experience that a man must have had in the line before he is competent to express an opinion upon discipline and disciplinary methods, but I wish to say to the committee, and for no other purpose than attempting to qualify according to their own standards, that I, at the time I had come to Washington here, had seen as much service with troops as any of our generals with the exception of about three. I commanded a company from the time I left the Military Academy for three years, and then for two years more; and many of these generals had done no more and many less; and I congratulate myself that I commanded it without a resort to courts-martial, even summary courts, except in the rarest instances. Now, they come here and would have you simply be impressed by their expertness. I should hope that the committee might remember the lawyer's adage that you should never be afraid to cross-examine your expert, and especially your military expert. They are the "easiest" experts in the world.

Take our generals. The mere fact that a man is a major general, or certainly the mere fact that he was a major general up to the beginning of this war, when some of them did see some service, was indicative of little more than a long time conformance to a system which in itself tended to arrest mental and professional development. It is a well known fact in the Army, a fact obvious to any man who has ever served in it, that the weakest grade in the Army of the United States is the grade of general officers. Why, the curve from the time those gentlemen leave West Point until the time they retire would run up, reaching its height probably 10 or 12 years after their graduation from the military academy, during which period the mere incapacity of youth to conform easily to these established rules, and the power of youth to retain some mental resiliency, enable a man to advance, and then drops almost abruptly downward until it about reaches the zero line. I think I might be permitted to say, because with entire accuracy it can be said, that many of our generals are jokes to everybody else in the world except ourselves and themselves.

So the very gentlemen who make this Kernan report, and who testified before the committee of the American Bar Association, have reported to the War Department, and will have the temerity to appear before this committee and tell it, that all of this criticism is uninformed opinion. That is what they call it, "uninformed opinion." Senator Chamberlain's opinion is uninformed! My opinion is uninformed! I have seen quite as much service in the line as most of them, and have had a hundred times their court-martial experience, as a member of a court, as the prosecutor, and as counsel for the accused. No man in the Army has had my court-martial experience. But, above all, as Acting Judge Advocate General, in a sense, during this war, sitting at the office where all these lines of discipline finally met, I kept tab on every division and every court-martial in every locality. Assuming a man to be a man of fair intelligence and competency and interest, what better place could he have found to observe and form an intelligent opinion upon the state of discipline in the Army than that office to which all these records came, the office charged with the duty of looking over them and ascertaining what they really meant? Ten thousand outcries from the victims, "Uninformed opinion!"

Senator LENROOT. I do not quite follow you, General, as to lack of experience of general officers in the line.

Mr. ANSELL. Where have they had experience, Senator, might I ask? Look at our Army. Up until the beginning of this war it was scattered throughout the country in small garrisons, so that a man as a line commander seldom or never commanded anything larger than a company. From there he went to command a body of territory known as an Army post. He seldom went with troops. He engaged himself largely in looking out for the post and conforming to the thousand and one details of the care of the post, including landscape gardening. If he should have been so fortunate as to be promoted to the rank of brigadier general in his later days—and I assure you that this kind of life did not tend to develop men with the quality of leadership which must be developed to make real commanders of men—he became then a department commander, again commanding territory, and sitting in a chair at his desk, as much so as any lawyer sits at his chair at his desk, and busying himself with the thousand and one administrative requirements that simply clog our peace-time administration of the Army—red tape, as it is called.

Senator LENROOT. I understand that, but I had assumed that every general officer must have had a considerable experience as a company commander.

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; as a company commander.

Senator LENROOT. What would be the average length of time that an officer would have been a company commander before he got out of touch——

Mr. ANSELL. Since the General Staff act went into effect in 1903 the best officers of our Army have spent a large part of their time on detached duty and staff duty; but the point I was making was not so much the length of time when a man commanded as it was the number of men that he commanded and the character of the command. To say, for instance, before the beginning of this war that a major general commanded the Department of the East meant no more than to label that man as a chief administrator, a paper man, a red-tape artist, and that is all there is to it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Was there a single general officer that had ever commanded a division prior to our entrance into this war?

Mr. ANSELL. Senator, we never had a division prior to our entrance into this war. We labeled that heterogeneous collection of troops on the Mexican border at one time a division, which Gen. Pershing commanded. But no professional soldier would ever call that a division.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Have we many general officers who had experience in the Spanish War?

Mr. ANSELL. No; very few. Your mind, of course, goes at once to Gen. Wood, who was the most distinguished of them, who was a regimental commander in that war.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Regimental?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; after Col. Roosevelt. And, of course, you have Gen. Pershing, who had such command as we had in the Philippines. The command in the Philippines was not the kind of command that required general leadership such as this war required, for instance. It was a bushwhacking, guerilla, all the time.

The only point that I make is that we ought not to get the idea that merely because a man is labeled a major general he is of such superior quality that his word must be taken and he must not be subjected to the cross-examination which an expert ought to be subjected to, because I will assure you that I am quite as good a man as a lieutenant colonel as I was when I was a brigadier general; and the experience is about the same.

Senator LENROOT. That is to say, in your opinion he is no better qualified than a captain would be?

Mr. ANSELL. Less qualified, I think I should prefer a captain who is in immediate contact with his men.

I have taken a great deal of time on this. It is a matter that I had wanted to say, however.

I had commenced reading the points of this brief. [Reading:]

II. It is as regrettable as it is obvious that those who oppose my views do not vision in the administration of military justice what the new Army of America will require, nor do they even see what the present is revealing. They are looking backward and taking counsel of a reactionary past whose guidance will prove harmful if not fatal.

The first of the several points under that is:

(1) The views of the Assistant Chief of Staff and the Inspector General savor of professional absolutism.

And they did. I have never known men to have such crystallized views. To undertake to point out the difference between the old Army and the new Army to those men was to talk to men who simply could not understand. They would not consider it. [Reading:]

(2) The opposing legal views are anachronistic; they are given a backward slant through undue deference to the theory of an illustrious text writer as to the nature of courts-martial, a theory which civil jurisprudence has never adopted but distinctly denied.

I have referred there to an officer whom you gentlemen will hear more of if these hearings are to include calling those who insist upon supporting the existing system—Col. Winthrop, who was, indeed, the Blackstone of the Army, a man of great capacity to express himself, and who was also a keen legal reasoner. But Col. Winthrop was first a military man, and he accepted easily and advocated the view that courts-martial are not courts, but are simply the right hand of a military commander. The best reason that that author ever gave for that view—the best legal reason—was what I adverted to yesterday. He said that they are not a part of the Federal judiciary because they are not organized under the judiciary clause of the Constitution, which of course is obvious, and then he follows that with a non sequitur, “therefore they belong to the power of military command, an executive agency;” when, of course, that same line of reasoning would have led to the conclusion that the territorial courts are not judicial bodies at all, are not governed by law, but are executive agencies, because they, too, are not organized under the judiciary clause of the Constitution but under the territorial clause, by Congress, empowered to govern the territories and dispose of them; and since the courts of the District of Columbia here are not organized under the judiciary clause of the Constitution, but under that clause of the Constitution that empowers the Congress to set aside this District here and govern it, they, too, are not courts but executive agencies. Obviously, it would be anarchy to hold that these courts are not courts because they are not the usual Federal courts that we have. They are courts, and are governed by principles of law just as much as the Federal courts are.

I will hurriedly pass over the points in my Brief on Revisory Power. The first point of the brief was as follows:

I. The action taken by the Secretary of War on the advice of the Judge Advocate General has been taken under very evident misapprehension. Such action is predicated upon the correctness of conviction, and the acceptance of such an act of grace by these innocent men necessarily implies a confession of guilt of a crime, which, upon well-established principles of law and justice, they never committed. Justice is a matter of law and not of executive favor.

That seems obvious. The second point is as follows:

II. It is as regrettable as it is obvious that those who oppose my views do not vision in the administration of military justice what the new Army of America will require, nor do they even see what the present is revealing. They are looking backward and taking counsel of a reactionary past whose guidance will prove harmful if not fatal.

And under this point I discussed these propositions:

(1) The views of the Assistant Chief of Staff and the Inspector General savor of professional absolutism.

(2) The opposing legal views are anachronistic; they are given a backward slant through undue deference to the theory of an illustrious text writer as to the nature of courts-martial, a theory which civil jurisprudence has never adopted but distinctly denied. (See Dynes v. Hoover, 20 How, 82; Keyes v. U. S., 109 U. S., 340; McCloughry v. Deming, 186 U. S., 62.)

(3) The teachings which followed upon the premise that courts-martial are executive agencies have all been disproved by the Supreme Court of the United States, though this department still clings to them.

Those teachings were:

(a) That courts-martial were not courts at all in any proper sense of the term;

(b) That, therefore, they tried an act in its military aspects alone and not the full resultant crime recognized as such by general public law;

(c) That, therefore, judgments of courts-martial could not be pleaded by a soldier in bar of trial by a Federal court; and

Those teachings were all wrong, and the sooner we abandon them the better.

(a) Courts-martial are courts created by Congress, sanctioned by the Constitution, and their judgments are entitled to respect as such. (Runkle v. United States, 122 U. S. 543, 555; McCloughry v. Deming, 186 U. S. 49, 68; Ex parte Reed, 100 U. S. 13, 21; Swain v. United States, 165 U. S. 558; Keyes v. United States, 109 U. S. 336, 340; Grafton v. United States, 206 U. S. 333, 348; Smith v. Whitney, 116 U. S. 167, 178.)

(b) Courts-martial do not try simply for the crime in its military aspects, but for the full and complete offense as recognized by the law of the land. (Ex parte Mason, 105 U. S. 696; Carter v. Roberts, 177 U. S. 496; Carter v. McCloughry, 163 U. S. 365; Grafton v. United States, 333, 348.)

(c) The judgment of a court-martial being a complete adjudication by a competent tribunal of the offense as known to the law of the land, is a bar against a second trial in any court of the United States. (Grafton v. United States, 206 U. S. 333, 348.)

These cases prove conclusively that a court-martial is a judicial tribunal of vast powers, whose jurisdiction extends to all who may belong to or are retained in our forces, affecting the life and liberty at the present time of millions; and that this jurisdiction extends to all conduct of such persons, without distinction between civil and military aspects. This office and the Army prior to the Grafton case had regarded it as settled law and justice, and sternly opposed the contrary view, that a soldier, though tried and punished by court-martial, could again be tried and punished by Federal civil courts without infringing his constitutional rights and his rights to justice.

I think there is nothing more difficult to understand in this world than the great gulf between the Army and our civil functions of government. There is nothing more obvious to the lawyer than this, that the War Department says that courts-martial are one thing, fundamentally, and the Supreme Court of the United States upon every opportunity says diametrically the opposite; and yet the contact between civil and military authority is so remote that the military view, as a practical matter, dominates, and there is no way of checking it. There is no way that a civil court of the United States can impose its view upon a military court except in the one case where the military court is absolutely destitute of jurisdiction, and a man imprisoned by its judgment applies for a writ of habeas corpus and thus gets a collateral review of the judgment of the court-martial.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You mean under the law now?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; I mean under the law now.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But Congress has the power to bring about a change.

Mr. ANSELL. Absolutely; it is a remarkable fact that the courts-martial of England are subject to review by the civil courts not only by way of the writ of habeas corpus but by writ of certiorari, by the writ of prohibition, and by the other common-law remedies; that the relation of military justice to the civil judicial authority there is such as to permit that course. Of course, the civil authority is rather reluctant to intervene, as, indeed, it ought to be.

Senator LENROOT. At some point in this hearing could you put in the English articles of war as they now exist?

Mr. ANSELL. It is called the Army Annual Act, nowadays. The old term has been abolished.

As showing you the inherent, fundamental character of a court-martial as reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States I would refer you to the following cases:

Runkle v. United States, 122 U. S. 543, 555; McCloughry v. Deming, 186 U. S. 49, 68; ex parte Reed, 100 U. S., 13, 21; Swalm v. United States, 165 U. S. 558; Keyes v. United States, 109 U. S. 336, 340; Grafton v. United States, 206 U. S. 333, 348; Smith v. Whitney, 116 U. S. 167, 178.

Ex parte Mason, 105 U. S. 696; Carter v. Roberts, 177 U. S. 496; Carter v. McCloughry, 163 U. S. 365; Grafton v. United States, 333, 348.

To show you how far removed we of the Army are from civil appreciation, I would cite a leading case in military law, the Grafton case. (Grafton v. United States, 206 U. S. 333, 348.) There was involved in that case an issue in which I was then and still am deeply interested, and that is, the very character of these courts-martial, and how far those principles of the Bill of Rights and the other principles of the law—common law, Anglo-American law—are applicable to these courts-martial, in order to secure a fair trial. I say this was the issue involved. Speaking concretely, the issue was whether a man who had been once tried by court-martial and subsequently tried by a civil court of the Philippines under the sovereignty of the United States, was entitled to the protection of that clause of the Constitution against double jeopardy. It had long been and still is the contention of the so-called lawyers of the War Department that not one single clause or legal principle in the Constitution, in the Bill of Rights, or any other of these ancient documents that have come down to us as a part of our birthright, to secure our liberties against government, not one is applicable to courts-martial—including this great protection against second trial. Here are two courts springing from a common sovereignty, the court-martial and the civil court of the Philippines. This soldier had been tried and acquitted by a court-martial of manslaughter.

I will hurriedly pass over the points in my Brief on Revisory Power. The first point of the brief was as follows:

I. The action taken by the Secretary of War on the advice of the Judge Advocate General has been taken under very evident misapprehension. But these young boys, under the circumstances, knew that it was very unlikely that they would be given capital punishment. Of course, they never contemplated capital punishment, because the Army did not contemplate it at that time.

Without going into the illegalities of these trials, I will say that I wrote a memorandum and an officer for whose legal ability Gen. Crowder has a very high regard also wrote another, and said that it would be the very height of injustice to execute these men.

Let us see what happened when the records got here. When the records came to him was the Judge Advocate of the Army an independent judge in this matter? No. The first thing he did when he got these records was to write up a review of all four cases, sustaining the legality of the proceeding.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did he do that himself?

Mr. ANSELL. I have no idea. I only know that he signed it and acted on it. But he left the final paragraph, the recommending paragraph, blank. Then he writes a note to the Chief of Staff, saying, "I have got the four death cases from France. They are cases in which the commanding general in France is very much interested, and is insisting upon the execution of the death penalty. I think it would be very unfortunate, indeed, if the War Department did not have one mind about these cases and agree to uphold the hands of Gen. Pershing."

And in that note Gen. Crowder asked Gen. March for a conference on the subject, that they might reach an agreement.

Here was your judge speaking, "We ought to agree to uphold the hands of the commanding general, regardless of the merits."

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Was that aside from his review of the cases?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; that was a note that he wrote on April 5 to Gen. March, Chief of Staff, the ultra military man, of course, and as he ought to be, and a man of no judicial appreciation. I mean his office contemplates none. I am not talking about the man, of course. The Judge Advocate General said, "We ought to agree to support the hands of Gen. Pershing in these cases," notwithstanding the fact that Gen. Pershing under the law did not have any more to do with that case than you or I. The Chief of Staff and the Judge Advocate General the next day did confer on these cases, as the Judge Advocate General had requested, and the Judge Advocate General of the Army thereupon returned to his office and filled in the blank paragraph with a recommendation, "I recommend that these men die."

When I heard about this I wrote this memorandum. I had never seen the cases before, notwithstanding the contrary testimony of some of the officers before your committee last year intent upon excusing Gen. Crowder's part in such transactions, because at the time they were given this original consideration I was in Canada; and because also, not being in favor, the cases were not sent to me. Col. Mays, who was my assistant in the office, has recently returned here and testified before the Inspector General to the effect, so he advises me, that I never could have seen those records, because the officer who reviewed them brought them to him and not to me. These cases did not come

The civil courts, rather antagonistic to that course and to the military authorities, anyway, took jurisdiction, indicted the man for murder, and proceeded to try him for the same homicide. The authority of the lower courts was to the effect that courts-martial tried not for the general offense against the law of the land, but simply for a violation of the special code—the code of the Army. That is, if a soldier killed another soldier, or somebody else for that matter, and the military authorities took jurisdiction, they took jurisdiction to try him not for murder or some other degree of unlawful homicide against the general law of the land, but for that violation of this special military code here, and tried him in the military aspect, leaving the civil court to try him for the general civil aspect; and that was the general War Department view, flowing, of course, from the fact that courts-martial are not courts but are simply military agencies designed to redress the injury according to the will of some commanding officer, and that view had been so imposed, so circulated, so ably supported by organized government, namely, the War Department, that many of the lower courts had adhered to it.

So this case, the Grafton case, brought up the very question. I applied to be counsel for Grafton in that case because we were all contributing money to hire him counsel, and I was not able to contribute very much. A great question was involved and I wanted to present it; and the War Department would not permit me. But the court held in that case that a court-martial was a court; that the offense for which this man had been tried was the offense against the law of the land, notwithstanding the fact that the authority for trial sprang out of these Articles of War, and that no other court of the same sovereignty could come along and try him again for the same offense without placing itself in the way of this inhibition against double jeopardy, and dismissed the entire proceedings.

The court took occasion to say this:

We base our decision not upon the fact that this clause of the Constitution of the United States has been carried to the Philippines by congressional enactment; we do not base this decision upon the fact that Congress has enacted, in the old fortieth article of war, an inhibition against double jeopardy. We base it upon the fact that the Constitution of the United States applies, regardless of legislation.

And yet, apparently, the Judge Advocate General's Department of the Army up until recently had never seen the great point of that case. They would not permit the disapproval of a court-martial proceeding upon the ground that the fundamental rights of the man had been violated, because they contended that the fundamental rights of a man before a court-martial were not fundamental rights: they were not rights guaranteed to him by the Constitution, at all. In other words, the measure of right that a man had before a court-martial was to be found in what Congress had mandatorily declared to be the right of the man. But the Supreme Court said that if Congress, even with its full power to make rules and regulations for the government of the Army, should undertake to say that a man could be tried a second time for the same offense, it would be restrained by this constitutional clause against double jeopardy.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You said that that view was entertained until recently. What did you mean by that?

Mr. ANSELL. I mean by that, that I as Acting Judge Advocate General fought, backed by the authority of the Grafton case, to the point where I have gotten a partial recognition, at least, of these rights, the right to counsel, the right to a fair trial, the right to have witnesses.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Only recently the President, within the last month, I understand from the press has issued an order that no commanding officer hereafter should disapprove and send back the papers in a case and order a retrial of a man who had been acquitted.

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; although that has been agitated for 18 years, I know, and the War Department has insisted that that was a proper thing, and the Judge Advocate General of the Army, in the very hearings before the committee, beginning in 1912 and terminating in 1916, insisted that that was a proper thing, that it was necessary for discipline; and when he sent the bill to your committee in the spring of 1918 conferring this revisory power, he went before the House committee and argued for the advisability of permitting this court to reverse acquittals, and he said that he had seen many instances in his service where justice would not have been done if the acquittal had been adhered to.

Senator LENROOT. I assume, General, that if Congress did in fact vest final and conclusive jurisdiction in a court-martial, it would be competent for Congress to do that?

Mr. ANSELL. Certainly, notwithstanding the Kernan learning. There is nothing fundamental about an appeal, but it is very necessary of course for the correction of error.

Senator LENROOT. Oh, yes, of course.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Under the decision of the Supreme Court in the Grafton case, even if Congress undertook to take away that right of a man not to be placed twice in jeopardy, the act of Congress would not be sustained by the court?

Mr. ANSELL. No; it would not be.

Senator LENROOT. Of course not.

Mr. ANSELL. But, as I say, it is very difficult to determine upon judicial authority how much of this existing judicial code is fundamentally wrong, because, again, except by way of habeas corpus we have no way of testing it. They can only say that every time the Supreme Court has spoken on the subject it has spoken a view diametrically opposite to that which the War Department insists upon adhering to.

Point 3 of the brief is as follows:

III. The whole argument on the other side is found in the contention that the word "revise" has no substantial meaning, but has reference only to clerical corrections. One single fact exposes the utter fallacy of that contention, and had it been considered must have prevented an expression of that view. That fact is this: The word "revise" is an organic word which solely creates and defines the duties of an entire bureau. Congress went to the great length of creating an independent bureau in the War Department for the sole and declared purpose of having it "revise" the proceedings of all military courts, and made that duty of revision the sole duty of that bureau.

Gentlemen, if there ever was a plainer case of a statute speaking by history, and bearing also upon its face its unmistakable meaning, it has never been brought to my attention. Congress was so interested in military justice during the Civil War that it created separately from the office of the Judge Advocate General a Bureau of Military Justice, so denominated, but it made the Judge Advocate General the chief also of that bureau. The only purpose it had in this world for creating that independent bureau of the War Department and equipping it with officers was to see that these court-martial judgments were revised. Congress used language that was technical and brief, and did not carry to the mind of the man who would not see its real meaning. Congress said the Chief of Military Justice should "revise" proceedings of courts-martial. The War Department at first insisted that meant a clerical revision. What in the world anybody would want clerically to revise the proceedings and judgment of any court for, unless it was going to be of benefit to the man who was undergoing sentence, I can not see.

Then, when the fallacy of that position was exposed, they said that it did confer upon the Judge Advocate General the power to study a case and make a recommendation to somebody.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And, in case of a lack of jurisdiction, to set it aside?

Mr. ANSELL. Oh, yes; to set it aside; but saying, inconsistently, it seems to me, that he could study and he could recommend, but if the commanding general had already approved, it had passed beyond any power of correction.

Senator LENROOT. When did the construction of this statute first arise after its enactment?

Mr. ANSELL. I have it in this brief, Senator.

Senator LENROOT. I would like to have you give it.

Mr. ANSELL. I am glad you asked the question. It arose, I think, the first time in 1887.

This is the fourth point in the brief (reading):

IV. "Revise" in its every sense—ordinary, legal, and technical military sense—means to correct, to alter, and amend.

The fifth point is as follows:

V. The word "revised," as a matter of fact, is in no sense ambiguous, and there is no room for construing it. It would have made no difference, therefore, what the administrative practice was or is. The quality of law is not impaired by nonuse. As a matter of fact, Judge Holt did, in form at least, pronounce sentences invalid, and did not content himself simply with recommending that pronouncement was by superior authority. His views as to the validity of proceedings were expressed in terms that savor of judicial pronouncement, and the orders of the War Department so far as examined seem to respect that quality by confirmation.

The sixth point is as follows:

VI. The judge advocate general of England certainly did have this power of revision. (I am not advised of his present authority)

The seventh point is as follows:

VII. Whence comes the established power to declare proceedings null and void for jurisdictional error? And why should not the larger power include the lesser radical one of correction of legal error?

The eighth point is as follows:

VIII. The necessity, in the name of justice, of locating this power in this department, and preferably in this office, where logically, and I think legally, it belongs, must be apparent to all who are familiar with the administration of military justice.

HEADQUARTERS FIRST DIVISION,
AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCES,

GEN. PERSHING'S INDORSEMENT.

From: The Commander in Chief.

To: The Judge Advocate General of the Army.

Subject: Trial by general court-martial, requiring action of the President.

1. I am forwarding you herewith for the action of the President four records of trial by general court-martial, in each of which cases the court has sentenced the accused to death and the sentence has been approved by the commanding general of the First Division, American Expeditionary Forces, the authority who appointed the court. In two cases the accused were convicted of willful disobedience of orders, and in the other two, of sleeping on post while sentinels in the front trenches when face to face with the enemy. Each of these cases is reviewed by Lieut. Col. Blanton Winship, Judge Advocate of the First Division. I recommend that the sentences in these cases be confirmed and that I be advised by cable of such action.

2. The fact that these men were clearly guilty of offenses punishable under the law with death is not the only, or, indeed, the principal reason for my recommendation. I believe that for purely military offenses the penalty of death should not be inflicted unless there is a military necessity therefor. It is absolutely necessary for the safety of our Army that sentinels on the outposts keep continuously on the alert, and it is just as necessary for our success as a fighting force that orders be obeyed—especially among troops in contact with the enemy. Indeed, I regard the two soldiers who willfully disobeyed orders without excuse or extenuation as more deserving of the extreme penalty than the two who slept on post, and I believe the execution of the sentences is quite as necessary in their cases as in the others. I recommend the execution of the sentences in all these cases, in the belief that it is a military necessity and that it will diminish the number of like cases that may arise in the future.

(Signed) JOHN J. PERSHING,
General, Commanding.

GEN. CROWDER'S REQUEST FOR CONFERENCE WITH CHIEF OF STAFF ON RECEIPT OF RECORDS.

APRIL 5, 1918.

MY DEAR GEN. MARCH: Here are the four cases from France involving the death sentence—two for sleeping on post and two for disobedience of orders. I regret that the reviews have been so long delayed, but I have had to go outside of the records for relevant facts.

The first paper that will encounter your attention is a brief memorandum prepared by the officer charged with the study of these cases, which will give you a survey of all four cases and will prepare you for a quick reading and understanding of the review prepared by this office in each case.

You will notice that I have not finished the review by embodying a definite recommendation.

It would be unfortunate, indeed, if the War Department did not have one mind about these cases. There is no question that the records are legally sufficient to sustain the findings and sentence. There is a very large question in my mind as to whether clemency should be extended. Undoubtedly Gen. Pershing will think, if we extend clemency, that we have not sustained him in a matter in which he has made a very explicit recommendation.

May we have a conference at an early date?

(Signed) E. H. CROWDER,
Judge Advocate General.

Maj. Gen. PEYTON C. MARCH,

tion and considerateness pronounce the trial free from prejudicial error. Even in the absence of statute it would be the duty of the department to endeavor to discover or provide a means whereby such a wrong could be righted. In the case that it could invoke a doubtful statute, it would be the duty of the department on all principle to resolve the doubt in favor of its jurisdiction to apply such a remedy. Surely there can be no excuse for the department's not taking the remedial action which the statute clearly authorizes, indeed, I think, requires it to take.

CONCLUSION.

This revisory power should exist; and I doubt not that when exercised with judicial wisdom and discretion, as it must be if it is a judicial power at all, under proper rules and regulations, it will prove a great help, and never a hindrance to safe and sound administration, and place military justice upon a plane that will cause it to merit and receive, more than it ever has heretofore received, the approval of the American people. I earnestly ask that this matter may be conceived to be, as doubtless it is, one of prime and fundamental importance to our Army. It is a matter affecting the relations of the Nation to its soldiery; it is a matter at the very base of military justice as an institution; it is a matter affecting justice under the law to the individual soldier. Justice under law is as necessary to the American Army as it is to any other American institution.

I should like to read into the record other memoranda of mine written after I was relieved in November, 1917, from my connection with the Division of Military Justice, memoranda which are closely connected with this question and in which I still sought to show the necessity and method of establishing such power, and in which I contended that the administrative palliatives could never prevent the terrible injustices which must inevitably follow any man-governed, lawless system of courts-martial.

(These memoranda appear elsewhere as Exhibits H, I, and J.)

Mr. ANSELL. Even in the early days of the war, and recognizing that commanding generals would exercise all the power that the department held to be theirs, still some of them thus early exercised the power so ruthlessly, and with such disregard for orderly administration, that I thought it advisable to call the most flagrant case to the attention of the Judge Advocate General and through him to the Secretary of War, which I did, and I should like to put that into the record. I will read you the letter. I do not like to use names, but I believe if you are ever going to correct this thing you have got to use names. and I will assume the responsibility for using the names of these officers.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I think they ought to be named.

Mr. ANSELL. This investigating a system and never touching somebody higher up, in my mind makes the investigation a farce.

On December 12, 1917, I filed a memorandum having to do with what I conceived to be the ill-judgment and the harshness of a major general in the Army, in command of one of our departments, an officer of my own corps, and that memorandum is this [reading]:

DECEMBER 12, 1917.

Memorandum for the Judge Advocate General of the Army.

Subject: Evidence of inefficiency of Maj. Gen. John W. Ruckman, commanding the Southern Department, headquarters at San Antonio, Tex., and of Col. George M. Dunn, Judge Advocate General's Department, the judge advocate upon the staff of Gen. Ruckman.

1. I feel it my duty to call to your attention what I conceive to be evidence of the incompetency of the two officers of the Army who are the subject of this memorandum with the intention and purpose that these views be brought by you to the attention of the Chief of Staff and the Secretary of War.

2. In a memorandum which I began work upon two weeks ago and which I completed yesterday (upon the revisory power of this office) I had occasion to advert to what I conceived to be convincing evidence of the failure of the department commander to exercise his power to prevent gross injustice to the enlisted men of his command who were charged with, tried for, and convicted of mutiny, and the proceedings of which trial were approved by him and the sentence carried into execution, notwithstanding such patent prejudicial errors as must have caused any competent official, certainly if competently advised, to discover such errors and because of them disapprove the proceedings.

3. Yesterday we were apprised, through the public press and for the first time, that Gen. Ruckman had proceeded summarily to execute the sentences of death in the case of 13 negro soldiers recently tried in his department. I shall not allude to this case further than to say that, under the circumstances surrounding this case which were such as to reveal themselves in all their bearings to a man of ordinary prudence and care, a man possessing the poise and sanity of judgment that should be necessary concomitants of the rank which this officer holds, could not have summarily carried into execution those sentences. Under the circumstances of this case the action taken by this commander was such a gross abuse of power as justly to merit the forfeiture of his commission.

4. I must assume that this general officer has sought and acted upon the advice of his judge advocate, Col. Dunn, and that this officer therefor has, in the same degree with Gen. Ruckman, manifested his incompetence at a critical time.

5. I am conscious also, though Maj. Davis will be able the better to advise you in this respect, that the administration of military justice in this command is generally below the standard of efficiency which should be required. A short while ago I was so impressed with this view that I had occasion to remark, "It seems to me the commanding general of the Southern Department never reads or interests himself in the judgments of his courts-martial."

6. The responsibility, of course, is not mine further than thus to advise you.

S. T. ANSELL.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Was anything ever done in reference to that?

Mr. ANSELL. No, sir; nothing.

Senator LENROOT. No reply was made to that letter at all?

Mr. ANSELL. No, sir. It is only fair to say that this particular general was not the only one. There were others who were manifesting the same tendency and disposition, even then, and they have manifested it in greater degree since. Of course, if we are once to concede that a commanding general can use these courts to do as he pleases, that he is the government and they are his agencies, I assume that, having conceded so much, we should not criticize any action that he takes; but I, for one, could never concede that.

Though it were to be considered as a War Department theory, it nevertheless seems to me that when a commanding general closes a case to-day and executes his men to-morrow morning in the cold gray dawn, in this country, 5,000 miles from the battle zone, he shows that he has not that quality which he ought to have to be a real leader of men or a worthy bearer of the major general's shoulder straps. Why, a decent regard for the orderly performance of such important duties, it seems to me, would require considerable time to intervene between the approval of a death sentence and the execution of the men. Those men, surely, assuming their utmost guilt, as I do assume it, had the right to compose their affairs. They had the right to appeal to the President of the United States for clemency. Time ought to intervene between the approval of any sentence of death and the execution of that sentence in order that a man may do these things.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It is not the law, now, that overrules that theory of the War Department, but an order which was issued as a result of the criticisms of the department?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. So that General Order No. 7, to which you refer, is not a law but is simply a regulation?

Mr. ANSELL. That is so.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And but for that regulation the commanding officer would still have the power to have a man executed within 24 hours after his sentence?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes.

Senator LENROOT. That General Order No. 7 has gone into the record, has it not?

Mr. ANSELL. I do not believe it has.

Senator LENROOT. It should go in.

Mr. ANSELL. I will put it in.

(The order referred to is here printed in full, as follows:)

GENERAL ORDERS, No. 169.

WAR DEPARTMENT.

Washington, December 29, 1917.

1. Whenever, in time of war, the commanding general of a territorial department or a territorial division confirms a sentence of death, the execution of such sentence shall be deferred until the record of trial has been reviewed in the office of the Judge Advocate General and the reviewing authority has been informed by the Judge Advocate General that such review has been made and that there is no legal objection to carrying the sentence into execution. The general court-martial order publishing the result of the trial shall recite that the date for the execution of the sentence will be hereafter fixed and published in general orders; and the fixing of the date of execution and the publication thereof shall follow the receipt of advice from the Judge Advocate General that there is no legal objection to the execution of the sentence. This rule of procedure does not relate to such action as a reviewing authority may desire to take under the fifty-first article of war.

GENERAL ORDERS, No. 7.

WAR DEPARTMENT,

Washington, January 17, 1918.

I. Section I, General Orders, No. 169, War Department, 1917, is rescinded and the following rules of procedure prescribed by the President are substituted therefor. This order will be effective from and after February 1, 1918:

1. Whenever, in time of war, the commanding general of a territorial department or a territorial division confirms a sentence of death, or one of dismissal of an officer, he will enter in the record of trial his action thereon, but will not direct the execution of the sentence. His action will conclude with a recital that the execution of the sentence will be directed in orders after the record of trial has been reviewed in the office of the Judge Advocate General, or a branch thereof, and its legality there determined, and that jurisdiction is retained to take any additional or corrective action, prior to or at the time of the publication of the general court-martial order in the case, that may be found necessary. Nothing contained in this rule is intended to apply to any action which a reviewing authority may desire to take under the fifty-first article of war.

2. Whenever, in time of peace or war, any officer having authority to review a trial by general court-martial, approves a sentence imposed by such court which includes dishonorable discharge, and such officer does not intend to suspend such dishonorable discharge until the soldier's release from confinement, as provided in the fifty-second article of war, the said officer will enter in the record of trial his action thereon, but will not direct the execution of the sentence. His action will conclude with the recital specified in rule 1. This rule will not apply to a commanding general in the field, except as provided in rule 5.

3. When a record of trial in a case covered by rules 1 or 2 is reviewed in the office of the Judge Advocate General, or any branch thereof, and is found to be legally sufficient to sustain the findings and sentence of the court, the reviewing authority will be so informed by letter, if the usual time of mail delivery between the two points does not exceed six days, otherwise, by telegram or cable, and the reviewing authority will then complete the case by publishing his orders thereon and directing the execution of the sentence. If it is found, upon review, that the record is not sufficient to sustain the findings and sentence of the court, the record of trial will be returned to the reviewing authority with a clear statement of the error, omission, or defect which has been found. If such error, omission, or defect admits of correction, the reviewing authority will be advised to reconvene the court for such correction; otherwise he will be advised of the action proper for him to take by way of approval or disapproval of the findings or sentence of the court, remission of the sentence in whole or in part, retrial of the case, or such other action as may be appropriate in the premises.

4. Any delay in the execution of any sentence by reason of the procedure prescribed in rules 1, 2, or 3 will be credited upon any term of confinement or imprisonment imposed. The general court-martial order directing the execution of the sentence will recite that the sentence of confinement or imprisonment will commence to run from a specified date, which date in any given case will be the date of original action by the reviewing authority.

5. The procedure prescribed in rules 1 and 2 shall apply to any commanding general in the field whenever the Secretary of War shall so decide and shall direct such commanding general to send records of courts-martial involving the class of cases and the character of punishment covered by said rules, either to the office of the Judge Advocate General at Washington, D. C., or to any branch thereof which the Secretary of War may establish, for final review, before the sentence shall be finally executed.

6. Whenever, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, the expeditious review of trials by general courts-martial occurring in certain commands requires the establishment of a branch of the Judge Advocate General's office at some convenient point near the said commands, he may establish such branch office and direct the sending of general court-martial records thereto. Such branch office, when so established, shall be wholly detached from the command of any commanding general in the field, or of any territorial, department, or division commander, and shall be responsible for the performance of its duties to the Judge Advocate General. [250. 4, A. G. O.]

II. There is hereby established, in aid of the revisory power conferred on the Judge Advocate General of the Army by section 1199, Revised Statutes, a branch of the office of the Judge Advocate General, at Paris, France, or at some other point convenient to the headquarters of the American Expeditionary Forces in France, to be selected by the officer detailed as the head of such branch office, after conference with the commanding general of the American Expeditionary Forces in France. The officer so detailed shall be the Acting Judge Advocate General of the American Expeditionary Forces in Europe, and shall report to and be controlled in the performance of his duties by the Judge Advocate General of the Army.

The records of all general courts-martial in which is imposed a sentence of death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge and of all military commissions originating in the said expeditionary forces, will be forwarded to the said branch office for review, and it shall be the duty of the said acting Judge Advocate General to examine and review such records, to return to the proper commanding officer for correction such as are incomplete, and to report to the proper officer any defect or irregularity which renders the findings or sentence invalid or void, in whole or in part, to the end that any such sentence or any part thereof so found to be invalid or void shall not be carried into effect. The said Acting Judge Advocate General will forward all records in which action is complete, together with his review thereof and all proceedings thereon to the Judge Advocate General of the Army for permanent file. [250.4, A. G. O.]

By order of the Secretary of War:

JOHN BIDDLE,
Major General, Acting Chief of Staff.

Official:

H. P. McCAIN,
The Adjutant General.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Can you remember, in a general way, about the date of that General Order No. 7?

Mr. ANSELL. About February; but it began—they first issued a little order, simply staying the execution of death sentences, a brief order, immediately after this affair; and then they began to work on a larger order to the same effect, which went no further than to stay the execution of the sentence of death.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. No other sentence?

Mr. ANSELL. No other sentence. Though I had brought them to the attention of the department, I was not invited to participate in those matters. An officer in the department, however, handed me the original draft of the order, and I felt so strongly on the matter that I took it to Gen. Crowder and said, "It is true this is a step in the right direction, but it does not go far enough. I do not know what your authority is according to your view, but why not carry it to the point of giving it general application to all those sentences the execution of which would place a man beyond the Army, to which he could not return; specifically, sentences of death, dismissal, and of dishonorable discharge"? And, after some two or three weeks' argument, the order was finally amended, and probably published in February, so as to stay all sentences in cases not only of death but of dismissal and of dishonorable discharge, until we could study the record and advise—having no authority—the commanding general.

I think that when this committee come to consider punishments they ought to consider, in the light of service appreciation and military environment, the terribleness of the sentence of dismissal and dishonorable discharge.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Are you prepared to go into that with us; because we want to get it all together?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; but when we come to talk of the bill, if we ever do, I will go into those matters. But right now——

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Right in that connection: This advisory power which it is claimed that the Judge Advocate General had, of advising the commanding officer with respect to these sentences, how often was that advisory power exercised, and if ever exercised, what effect did it have?

Mr. ANSELL. Why, Senator, we did not review. I do not know why we should make any pretense about it. I had a responsibility in that office—notwithstanding the fact that Gen. Crowder was there. I had a responsibility—and I say to you, speaking out of that sense of responsibility, that we did not revise court-martial records. We revised officers' cases, we revised death cases, and we got little further. There was one man, not always the best man, and with all too much to do, who revised—that is, looked over—the other cases.

But I want you to understand that. I am as independent, perhaps, as a man for his own good ought to be, but do not think that you can take a human being labelled a lawyer and put him in the War Department and subject him to the power of military command and expect him to be judicially independent. He will not be. It may be that the military commander and the judge advocate do not disagree so much, because the judge advocate does the agreeing. In the same way the Judge Advocate General is not independent, but yields, meekly and modestly, to the Chief of Staff.

There is no better case of the deplorable situation into which the law department of the Army has dropped than that of the four death cases from France. See, briefly, what happened in those cases. Judge Advocate General Crowder was dealing with the lives of four men, boys, who were volunteers, not yet 19 years of age. Two of them were tried for sleeping on post in the front line trench, and two were tried for disobedience of an order to get their equipment and go to drill. I will not go into the record of the cases minutely. There is not much record to go into, because I will say that the records in these cases comprise less than four loosely written typewritten sheets of paper—a record that condemned them to death.

Two, with a counsel whose incompetency I can scarcely find language to describe, a young lieutenant, were permitted to appear before this court and plead guilty to a capital offense. The only thing he did was to call a single witness and actually put the military character of his client in issue by asking that man, who was the company commander, this question, "What is the military record of my client here?" And the man said, "Bad; very bad. One of the worst in the country." That ended it, and that was the extent of counsel's service to that man.

The other two pleaded not guilty; but upon testimony, the brevity of which I have indicated, they were found guilty.

The two men who were found guilty of sleeping on post had been on that post, a cossack post, two men looking through the peephole out over no man's land and one resting for an hour, for the seventh day and night, until sheer exhaustion unquestionably had overtaken them. It was during the time when, with a small force, we were undertaking to hold a very large sector.

Senator LENROOT. Did that appear in the testimony?

Mr. ANSELL. That appeared. Not in the words I have used, Senator, but the facts appeared and these circumstances appeared.

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. ANSELL. The other two pleaded guilty to a disobedience of orders, and then immediately after this plea they made this statement, absolutely inconsistently with the plea, "We had been drilled so hard on these bleak hills of the Vosges in this severe climate, worked so hard and so long, that we finally reached the point of physical exhaustion, and we could no longer drill." Now, notwithstanding the truth or falsity of that statement, what was the duty of the court? The very moment that a man pleads guilty to a capital offense and then makes a statement of physical incapacity to obey an order, the duty of the court is, of course, beyond all argument, to enter a plea of not guilty and try out the case. The court did not do that. They just proceeded to railroad them through. Those men were not even arrested, the charges were not even preferred against them, in the customary way. The charge and the arrest ordinarily come immediately after the commission of the offense. The men who were alleged to have been sleeping on post were not even relieved. In fact, one of them had been found asleep, according to the report of the lieutenant and of the corporal, earlier in the evening. They did not relieve him; they kept him there, notwithstanding the evidence of his physical exhaustion. But they did not even proceed against those men in the usual military way. They waited for a month or five weeks after that, and in the meantime the military authorities had changed their policy. The records will show that in the same locality and the same command similar offenses had been treated, and treated adequately, rather lightly. But having changed their policy, the military authorities said, "We have got to shoot somebody, and here we have got these four cases." They ran them before the court, and meantime with a court of five men in two cases and of six in the other, with the accused defended as I have indicated to you, the courts reached the conclusion of guilt, and sentenced these men to die. Then the record came, not as it ought to have come, directly to the President of the United States, who in this case was the confirming authority, fortunately, but Gen. Pershing had the records come through him. Gen. Pershing had nothing whatever to do with these cases any more than you have, or you, or I. The fact that he was commander of the Army in France does not, under the code, give him any power in these quasi judicial matters, and the channel of authority is straight from the division commander who convened that court and approved the judgment, to the President of the United States who is the confirming authority. Yet the Army commander, Gen. Pershing, interjected his authority, and put all his great power in a memorandum that accompanied those records, to induce the President of the United States to confirm these sentences of death, and even requested that he be given a mandate by cable so that the death sentences could be carried out very expeditiously.

When those records got here it seems to me that it would have been obvious to any lawyer that substantial justice was not done. Errors of law stood out upon the records. Notice, one court tried both men for sleeping on post; absolute similarity of circumstances, interwoven just like that [indicating]; one court, in the same evening, consuming 40 minutes on each case, tried one of these men after another. Who may believe that that court was a fair court in any but the first trial?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The same court tried all of them?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; the same personnel, with the addition of a single man, or maybe two men, in two of the cases.

But I am addressing myself to the similarity of the cases, of all the facts and circumstances. Of course, when the court came to the trial of the second man he had already been tried. There they were, standing before the same loophole, and all that kind of thing.

Another thing, this counsel did not do his duty. The accused soldier did not have any counsel. I would have no hesitancy under those circumstances in saying that though he did have nominal counsel he did not have real counsel, the counsel that the Constitution speaks of.

It was perfectly obvious, also, that these men themselves did not act understandingly. Take the men who pleaded guilty—the two of them—they made improvident pleas. They did not know what they were up against. They were not advised.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Is there anything in the record to show that they were informed of the pleas?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes. You understand that this was a capital offense; but there are so many capital offenses in the manual. The slightest disobedience of orders, a lifting up of your hand against your superior officer, are capital offenses. There is a long list of capital offenses, but they do not get capital sentences for most of them, and frequently they plead guilty to a capital offense.

But these young boys, under the circumstances, knew that it was very unlikely that they would be given capital punishment. Of course, they never contemplated capital punishment, because the Army did not contemplate it at that time.

Without going into the illegalities of these trials, I will say that I wrote a memorandum and an officer for whose legal ability Gen. Crowder has a very high regard also wrote another, and said that it would be the very height of injustice to execute these men.

Let us see what happened when the records got here. When the records came to him was the Judge Advocate of the Army an independent judge in this matter? No. The first thing he did when he got these records was to write up a review of all four cases, sustaining the legality of the proceeding.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did he do that himself?

Mr. ANSELL. I have no idea. I only know that he signed it and acted on it. But he left the final paragraph, the recommending paragraph, blank. Then he writes a note to the Chief of Staff, saying, "I have got the four death cases from France. They are cases in which the commanding general in France is very much interested, and is insisting upon the execution of the death penalty. I think it would be very unfortunate, indeed, if the War Department did not have one mind about these cases and agree to uphold the hands of Gen. Pershing."

And in that note Gen. Crowder asked Gen. March for a conference on the subject, that they might reach an agreement.

Here was your judge speaking, "We ought to agree to uphold the hands of the commanding general, regardless of the merits."

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Was that aside from his review of the cases?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; that was a note that he wrote on April 5 to Gen. March, Chief of Staff, the ultra military man, of course, and as he ought to be, and a man of no judicial appreciation. I mean his office contemplates none. I am not talking about the man, of course. The Judge Advocate General said, "We ought to agree to support the hands of Gen. Pershing in these cases," notwithstanding the fact that Gen. Pershing under the law did not have any more to do with that case than you or I. The Chief of Staff and the Judge Advocate General the next day did confer on these cases, as the Judge Advocate General had requested, and the Judge Advocate General of the Army thereupon returned to his office and filled in the blank paragraph with a recommendation, "I recommend that these men die."

When I heard about this I wrote this memorandum. I had never seen the cases before, notwithstanding the contrary testimony of some of the officers before your committee last year intent upon excusing Gen. Crowder's part in such transactions, because at the time they were given this original consideration I was in Canada; and because also, not being in favor, the cases were not sent to me. Col. Mays, who was my assistant in the office, has recently returned here and testified before the Inspector General to the effect, so he advises me, that I never could have seen those records, because the officer who reviewed them brought them to him and not to me. These cases did not come to me. I saw them this way: A clerk in the department met me in the corridor and said, with tears in her eyes, "They are going to hang these four boys." I said: "I know nothing about it." She said: "You get the records; look it up, please, and look it up hastily." And I got the records and took them home with me and studied them. If we go directly to the end of the thing, I would say that no man would hang a dog on any such record. I went to the Judge Advocate General, and he was perturbed and irritated at my coming, and finally said to me: "If you have got anything to say about those cases, you submit it in writing." And I submitted in writing my reasons why they should not die.

And then did that memorandum get to the Secretary of War or the Chief of Staff or the President of the United States? No. He did cull such facts as he wanted out of that memorandum and put them and other things in a memorandum, No. 2, to the Chief of Staff, in which he says: "I think you ought to be acquainted with these additional facts which I have discovered subsequently to my first interview; but understand, when I submit this memorandum to you, I do it with no desire to reopen this case." And he concluded with the statement that "while these facts suggest clemency, nevertheless I do not recommend it. Gen. Pershing, of course, would feel that we had not supported him, and I sympathize with his view." Now, he has stated in this public statement that was issued broadcast throughout the country at great expense to the Government, that he filed a second memorandum, which he says, to use his rather uncandid language, "looks in the direction of clemency." In the direction of clemency!

SENATOR CHAMBERLAIN. May I ask you there, Can you put in the record your memorandum to him and his second memorandum to the Chief of Staff?

MR. ANSELL. With the permission of the committee, I will put the memoranda filed by him and by me in this case into the record.

SENATOR CHAMBERLAIN. Yes. And then you say the Secretary of War did not see it?

MR. ANSELL. He did not see it. It was that which seems to have set, if I might speak plainly, the department firmly against me.

SENATOR CHAMBERLAIN. By the way, when you put those things in the record, in order that the committee may have it before them, I would like to have his first memorandum, your memorandum, and the second memorandum of Gen. Crowder, and I would like to have you put under it that portion of this propaganda that went out from Wignmore—the language that Crowder used when he said it was looking toward clemency.

MR. ANSELL. I should like to do that.

SENATOR CHAMBERLAIN. I would like to have them together, since I have had more or less controversy about that, myself.

SENATOR LENROOT. I suggest that he put in the record all of that record that he has in his possession.

MR. ANSELL. These are copies that I have, of course.

SENATOR LENROOT. Yes, of course.

The matter above referred to is here printed in full in the record as follows:

LEDOYEN'S CASE.

Record.

GENERAL ORDERS, }
No. 162. }

HEADQUARTERS FIRST DIVISION,
AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCES,
France, December 15, 1917.

1. A general court-martial is appointed to meet at headquarters 16th Infantry, for the trial of such persons as may be properly brought before it.

Detail for the court: Col. W. F. Creary, Infantry; Maj. Phillip Remington, 16th Infantry; Capt. J. P. Bubb, 16th Infantry; 1st Lieut. B. D. Spalding, 16th Infantry; 1st Lieut. A. P. Withers, 16th Infantry; 1st Lieut. C. L. Irwin, 16th Infantry; 1st Lieut. P. L. Ransom, 16th Infantry; 1st Lieut. A. F. Kingman, 16th Infantry; 1st Lieut. W. C. Comfort, 16th Infantry. 1st Lieut. Paul C. Green, 16th Infantry, judge advocate; 2d Lieut. H. W. Clark, 16th Infantry assistant judge advocate.

The employment of a stenographic reporter is authorized.

By command of Maj. Gen. Bullard:

WM. H. CRUIKSHANK.
Adjutant General, Division Adjutant.

FRANCE, January 3, 1918.

The court met pursuant to the foregoing order at 8.50 o'clock p. m.

Present: Col. W. F. Creary, Infantry; Maj. Phillip A. P. Withers, 16th Infantry; 1st Lieut. B. D. Spalding, 16th Infantry; 1st Lieut. A. P. Withers, 16th Infantry; 1st Lieut. P. L. Ransom, 16th Infantry; 1st Lieut. W. C. Comfort, 16th Infantry; 1st Lieut. Paul C. Green, 16th Infantry, judge advocate; 2d Lieut. H. W. Clark, 16th Infantry, assistant judge advocate.

Absent: Capt. J. P. Bubb, 16th Infantry (sick); 1st Lieut. C. L. Irwin, 16th Infantry (sick); 1st Lieut. A. F. Kingman, 16th Infantry (sick).

The court proceeded to the trial of Olen Ledoyen, private, Company B, 16th Infantry, who, appearing before the court, introduced Lieut. Black, 16th Infantry, as counsel.

Pvt. Joseph A. Shea, Headquarters Company, 16th Infantry, was sworn as reporter.

The order appointing the court was read to the accused, and he was asked if he objected to being tried by any member present, to which he answered as follows: "The accused objects to Maj. Phillip Remington on the ground that he is the officer who has investigated the charges and has formed an opinion."

Maj. REMINGTON. I have investigated these charges and have formed an opinion.

The COURT. If there is no objection on the part of any member present, Maj. Remington will be excused from sitting as member of the court at this trial.

There being no objection on the part of the members present, Maj. Phillip Remington was excused and withdrew.

The accused was asked if he objected to being tried by any of the members remaining, to which he replied in the negative.

The members of the court, the judge advocate, and the assistant judge advocate were sworn.

The accused was then arraigned upon the following charges and specifications:

Charge I: Violation of the 64th Article of War.

Specification: In that Pvt. Olen Ledoyen, Company B, 16th Infantry, having received a lawful command from 1st Lieut. Fred M. Logan, his superior officer, to get his equipment and fall in for drill, in France, on or about the 14th day of December, 1917, did willfully disobey the same.

FRED M. LOGAN,
1st Lieut. 16th Infantry.

To which the accused pleaded:

To the specification: Guilty.

To the charge: Guilty.

The paragraphs of the Courts-Martial Manual that set out the gist of the offense were read to the court by the judge advocate.

By the president of the court: "You, Private Ledoyen, the accused, understand that in pleading guilty to the charges and specifications here you admit that you committed all the elements of the acts with which you are charged, and that you committed them of your own free will, and that you were not forced into doing it by any influence. By pleading guilty you make it not necessary for the judge advocate to prove these charges against you, the extreme penalty for which in time of war is death, or such other punishment as the court-martial may direct. In pleading guilty you throw yourself upon the mercy of the court to adjudge you this penalty. Having been thus informed, do you wish your plea of guilty to stand?

The accused: "Yes, sir."

First Lieut. Fred M. Logan, Sixteenth Infantry, a witness for the prosecution, was sworn, and testified as follows:

Questions by the prosecution:

Q. State your name, rank, and organization.—A. Fred M. Logan, First Lieut. Sixteenth Infantry.

Q. Do you know the accused? If so, state his name, rank and organization.—A. Olen Ledoyen, private, Company B, Sixteenth Infantry.

Q. On or about the 14th day of December, 1917, did you give Private Ledoyen an order?—A. I did.

Q. He did not obey that order, did he?—A. No, sir; he did not. He refused and stated that he refused.

Q. What was the order?—A. He was ordered to get his pack and get ready for drill with his squad.

Q. Was there any reason why he would not obey?—A. No, sir. He did it willfully, and was warned at the time.

Q. Did you give him this order in person?—A. I did.

Q. Did he say anything in regard to why he disobeyed?—A. No, sir.

Q. You may state any further facts or circumstances surrounding the case.—A. At the time, when he was ordered to get his pack and report for drill with his squad, he refused, and stated that he would not go to drill. I then told him of the consequences of such an act, and gave him another opportunity to go get his pack and drill, and he again refused, saying "I refuse to go to drill."

Q. You warned him of the consequences of his acts?—A. Yes, sir.

The defense declined to cross-examine the witness.

Questions by the court:

Q. State as nearly as you can remember the exact words that you used in warning the accused of the consequences of his act.—A. I told him that he was liabbling himself to trial by general court-martial, which might impose a very heavy penalty. There were four who first refused to go to drill, and two reconsidered and went to drill later. I asked the accused if he understood what he was doing, and he and Private Fishback still refused to drill.

Q. Did the accused know that a court-martial might impose a death penalty for his act?—A. I think not. I do not believe that I told him that.

Q. You stated a heavy sentence?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did this man offer any reason as to why he refused to drill?—A. No, sir.

Q. Was it simply a positive, flat refusal with no excuses?—A. Yes, sir.

The prosecution rests.

The defense, having no testimony to offer, made the following verbal statement: "Lieut. Logan had us out on the hill the day before and we nearly froze to death, and the next day I was so stiff I could not drill."

The court was closed and finds the accused: Of the specification, Charge I. Guilty; of Charge I. Guilty.

The court was opened and the judge advocate, in the presence of the accused and his counsel, stated that he had the record of four previous convictions which were read, and copies of which are hereto appended, marked 1, 2, 3, and 4.

Judge Advocate. "Do you, the accused, admit the correctness of these charges and convictions?"

The accused: "Yes, sir."

The court was closed, and sentences accused, Olen Ledoyen, Company B, Sixteenth Infantry, to: Two-thirds of the members present concurring therein, the court sentences the accused to be shot to death with musketry.

The court at 9.45 o'clock p. m. was opened and adjourned to meet at the call of the president.

W. F. CREARY,
Colonel, Infantry, President.

PAUL C. GREENE,
First Lieutenant, Sixteenth Infantry, Judge Advocate.

HEADQUARTERS FIRST DIVISION,
AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCES,
France, January 17, 1918.

In the foregoing case Pvt. Olen Ledoyen, Company B, Sixteenth Infantry, the sentence is approved and the record forwarded for action under the provisions of the forty-eighth article of war.

Major General, United States Army, Commanding.

GEN. PERSHING'S INDORSEMENT.

From: The Commander in Chief.

To: The Judge Advocate General of the Army.

Subject: Trial by general court-martial, requiring action of the President.

1. I am forwarding you herewith for the action of the President four records of trial by general court-martial, in each of which cases the court has sentenced the accused to death and the sentence has been approved by the commanding general of the First Division, American Expeditionary Forces, the authority who appointed the court. In two cases the accused were convicted of willful disobedience of orders, and in the other two, of sleeping on post while sentinels in the front trenches when face to face with the enemy. Each of these cases is reviewed by Lieut. Col. Blanton Winship, Judge Advocate of the First Division. I recommend that the sentences in these cases be confirmed and that I be advised by cable of such action.

2. The fact that these men were clearly guilty of offenses punishable under the law with death is not the only, or, indeed, the principal reason for my recommendation. I believe that for purely military offenses the penalty of death should not be inflicted unless there is a military necessity therefor. It is absolutely necessary for the safety of our Army that sentinels on the outposts keep continuously on the alert, and it is just as necessary for our success as a fighting force that orders be obeyed—especially among troops in contact with the enemy. Indeed, I regard the two soldiers who willfully disobeyed orders without excuse or extenuation as more deserving of the extreme penalty than the two who slept on post, and I believe the execution of the sentences is quite as necessary in their cases as in the others. I recommend the execution of the sentences in all these cases, in the belief that it is a military necessity and that it will diminish the number of like cases that may arise in the future.

(Signed) JOHN J. PERSHING,
General, Commanding.

GEN. CROWDER'S REQUEST FOR CONFERENCE WITH CHIEF OF STAFF ON RECEIPT OF RECORDS.

APRIL 5, 1918.

MY DEAR GEN. MARCH: Here are the four cases from France involving the death sentence—two for sleeping on post and two for disobedience of orders. I regret that the reviews have been so long delayed, but I have had to go outside of the records for relevant facts.

The first paper that will encounter your attention is a brief memorandum prepared by the officer charged with the study of these cases, which will give you a survey of all four cases and will prepare you for a quick reading and understanding of the review prepared by this office in each case.

You will notice that I have not finished the review by embodying a definite recommendation.

It would be unfortunate, indeed, if the War Department did not have one mind about these cases. There is no question that the records are legally sufficient to sustain the findings and sentence. There is a very large question in my mind as to whether clemency should be extended. Undoubtedly Gen. Pershing will think, if we extend clemency, that we have not sustained him in a matter in which he has made a very explicit recommendation.

May we have a conference at an early date?

(Signed) E. H. CROWDER,
Judge Advocate General.

MAJ. GEN. PEYTON C. MARCH,
Chief of Staff.

(4)

ON RETURN FROM INTERVIEW GEN. CROWDER CONCLUDED HIS REVIEW OF CASES, AS FOLLOWS:

The court was lawfully constituted. The proceedings were regular. The record discloses no errors. The findings and sentence are supported by the record and are authorized by law.

I recommend that the sentence be confirmed and carried into execution. With this in view there is herewith inclosed for your signature a letter transmitting the record to the President for his action thereon, together with an executive order designed to carry this recommendation into effect, should such action meet with your approval.

(Signed) E. H. CROWDER,
Judge Advocate General.

GEN. ANSELL'S MEMORANDUM OPPOSING CONFIRMATION OF DEATH SENTENCE.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, April 15, 1918.

Memorandum for Gen. Crowder.

Re Death penalty in the four cases from France.

1. After reading these records I said to you the other day that were I the confirming authority I would not confirm these sentences, and that for the same reason I could not, were I you, recommend confirmation. At your request I shall now state very briefly my reasons as I then stated them to you orally.

Ledoyen's case.—He was charged with disobeying the lawful order to fall in for drill, and was convicted upon his plea of guilty. After plea and before finding, the accused formally stated in his own behalf that he "could not go to drill" because of the extreme exposure to which he had been subjected the day before; that is, that it was physically impossible for him to drill. This statement was plainly inconsistent with his plea of guilty; accordingly, the court should have directed a plea of not guilty and tried the case on that issue. Surely in a capital case a plea of guilty, especially when, as in all these cases, the accused has not had competent counsel, should be accepted only when it was made with the utmost comprehension of all legal implications and of all consequences and only when the plea stands finally as the full, complete, and unmodified intelligent answer of the accused to the charge. Obviously the record in this case does not meet the test, and the proceedings should be disapproved.

Fishback's case.—This is in all respects a companion piece to Ledoyen's case. The military authorities have treated the two as on "all fours," and ask for the death penalty in both upon common ground. There is one difference, however. The accused in this case made no statement after his plea of guilty, and so the record does not show upon its face any statement inconsistent with the plea. Considered independently, then, the record gives no basis for the destructive opposition made to Ledoyen's case. The human facts do. The facts of the two cases are the same; the conditions and circumstances of the conduct denounced in both cases are the same. This is shown by the record and conceded and acted upon by the military authorities. Disapproval need not be based upon strict legalism. Other considerations are admissible. In view of what I have said, and following the facts of record in Ledoyen's case, I could not confirm the Fishback case.

Sebastian's and Cook's case.—The death penalty in each of these cases was awarded for sleeping on post after an inadequate defense. In capital cases extenuating circumstances are matters of defense. The defense in these cases set up, formally and without force or persuasion, however, the fact that the accused had been in the front-line trench for five previous nights from 4.45 in the evening until 6 o'clock in the morning, with an actual stand in the sentry post of two hours on and one hour off. Of course, little rest and no sleep could be had in such a brief respite. Night after night of vigilance, without opportunity for sleep, must rapidly bring exhaustion unless there be chance for rest and sleep during the day. The accused in one case testified that sleep was impossible in the dugout during the day because of the chopping of wood therein. In the other case the accused testified that little or no sleep could be had because of noise, without speaking more specifically. These are matters of extenuation, the truth of which the court made no effort to prove or disprove. A competent statement made in defense and standing unimpeached ought to be taken as true. Furthermore, in one of the cases the evidence of exhaustion is rather convincing. The accused was found evidently asleep in the early evening, around 8 o'clock. He should have been relieved then by the corporal who observed his condition. He was not relieved until discovered asleep the second time in the early morning hours.

Generally.—These cases were not well tried. The composition of the court in Ledoyen's case consisted of one colonel, one major, and four first lieutenants. The four first lieutenants could have had but little experience. I can not help recall the British rule which requires, I think, in such cases three years' service to render an officer competent as a member of a court-martial. The same court that tried Ledoyen tried Fishback. The court that tried Cook was composed of the same members, except a captain (doubtless of considerable experience) and a first lieutenant (practically of none) were present. And the same court that tried Cook tried Sebastian.

The character of the record, with its brevity, is such as to leave the human understanding disturbed by the formal conviction that it carries. These were mere youth. Not one made the slightest fight for his life. Each was "defended" by a second lieutenant. Such defense as each had was not worthy the name. Were I charged with the defense of such a boy on trial for his life, I would not, while charged with that duty, permit him to make a plea that means the forfeit of his life. The Government should be made to maintain its case at every point in the trial of a capital crime. Court, judge advocate, and counsel should all endeavor to see that there is a full trial as well as a fair trial, and that no matter of defense, including extenuation, be omitted.

There is another matter that, finding lodgment in my conscience, I shall express: There is an insistence upon the part of Gen. Pershing which tends to prejudice these cases. He seems to have forgot that he is not the reviewing authority. The relation between confirming authority and the President in these cases is judicial. I do not say that Gen. Pershing may not make general recommendations as to the maintenance of discipline in his command. I know he may. But his recommendation in these cases is a special thing, specially interposed in the course of justice, and characterized by great insistence. He asks that he be advised by cable of the act of confirmation, and makes a powerful argument, the gist of which, after all, is to be found in his view of the necessity of exemplary punishment in these cases. It may be the punishment made especially drastic for the purpose of example at times has its place and value; but exemplary punishment is dangerous to justice. The execution of all military offenders would very likely decrease the number of future offenses and offenders. But such Draconian methods would destroy justice without which all else in human society is of no worth.

It is only right for me to say to you that the military mind will, in my opinion, almost unanimously approve of confirmation in these cases. I do not say that the military view is to be ignored by the Commander in Chief of the Army. I myself would not ignore it. But when it offends against my well-considered sense of law and justice I can not follow it.

S. T. ANSELL,
Brigadier General.

COPY OF COL. ALFRED E. CLARK'S MEMORANDUM GIVING REASONS WHY DEATH SENTENCES SHOULD NOT BE EXECUTED.

APRIL 10, 1918.

Memorandum for Gen. Crowder.

Subject: Four cases from France involving the death sentence.

1. In addition to what appears in the several reviews of these four cases, the following additional facts are called to your attention as bearing upon the justice and expediency of carrying the sentences into effect:

(a) All these cases arose in the 16th Infantry. Two of the accused were not brought to trial for 50 days and upward after their alleged offenses. All of the cases were tried with an expedition which does not give on the face of the records any appearance of deliberation. In each case the defense of the accused was so indifferent as to be practically no defense.

that is, from the beginning of the first trial until the conclusion of the second trial there elapsed 1 hour and 45 minutes. Counsel for the accused made no statement or argument in either of these cases.

In the other two cases eight members of the court sat. The first of these two trials began at 1.20 p. m. and the second was completed at 5.25 p. m. In the first of these cases counsel for the accused made an argument of six lines, and the second an argument of eight lines.

(c) Two of the soldiers—Fishback and Ledoyen—were tried for willful disobedience of an order to go out and drill. It does not appear that their organization was near or in contact with the enemy. Both of these men were tried the same evening between 8 and 9.45 p. m.—two trials. Fishback was first tried; and it appears in the record of that case that both of the soldiers were together when the order was given. The lieutenant who claims to have given the order testified:

“Q. Did he (Fishback) make any reply to the order?”

“A. Either he or Ledoyen made the reply that they refused to go to drill.”

The answer leaves it in doubt as to which refused. Clearly there was but one order given, apparently directed to both. Clearly, also, when the court passed upon the Fishback case it necessarily had in practical effect decided the Ledoyen case, which immediately followed. Notwithstanding this, counsel for the accused made no challenge.

It is alleged that the disobedience occurred on November 14. The charge sheet shows that each of these men was placed in confinement on November 13. There is evidence in the record that these men were both in arrest or under guard when the order was given. Why they were in arrest and by whom placed in arrest, and whether or not they were to be released from arrest to go out to drill in obedience to the order does not appear.

(d) With respect to the two men convicted of sleeping on post, one—Pvt. Sebastian—is alleged to have committed the offense on the night of November 3-4; Pvt. Cook, on the following night. Cook was put in arrest November 13 and Sebastian November 14.

The length of time which elapsed after the alleged offenses and before the men were brought to trial, the expeditious and seemingly formal manner in which they were tried, the lack of any apparent effort on the part of the counsel for the accused to make a real defense, the circumstances of extenuation shown in the reviews—especially in the cases of the two men convicted of sleeping on post—altogether, and coupled with the disposition made by the same court of other cases of like nature arising in the same organization about the same time, make up a record on which it will be difficult to defend or justify the execution of death sentences by way of punishment, or upon any ground other than that as a matter of pure military expediency some one should be executed for the moral effect such action may have upon the other soldiers.

(e) The four convicted men entered the Army by voluntary enlistment—Ledoyen on February 3, 1917; age on enlistment papers, 18 years and 1 month. Sebastian, April 18, 1917; age, 19 years and 6 months. Fishback, February 17, 1917; age, 19 years and 2 months. Cook, May 11, 1917; age 18 years and 11 months. None had any previous military experience.

(f) Reference has already been made to other cases tried by the same court. These will now be more particularly referred to.

William Hindman, private, Company G, 16th Infantry. This soldier was accused of sleeping on post in the front trenches on the night of November 5-6. This is the same night that Pvt. Cook, who was convicted, is alleged to have committed a like offense. In the Hindman case Corpl. Walenie and Pvt. Clark were witnesses for the prosecution, as they were also in the Cook case. In each case it was said that Pvt. Clark was on duty when his comrades were found asleep. The story told by Corpl. Walenie concerning Pvt. Hindman is in essential respects very much like the story he told concerning Pvt. Cook. If anything, the evidence was stronger against Pvt. Cook, because Corpl. Walenie testified that the former was sitting down with his blanket around his head and, as he believed, asleep when discovered by the corporal. In the case of Pvt. Cook, who was convicted, the evidence clearly shows that he was standing on the firing step in a natural position, with his rifle resting on the parapet at the time of the alleged offense. Cook was convicted upon the testimony of the two witnesses referred to, and Hindman was acquitted in spite of the evidence of these same witnesses by the same court.

Adam Klein, private, Company G, 16th Infantry, was accused of sleeping on post November 3, 1917. This is the same night that it is alleged Pvt. Sebastian was found asleep. It will be noted that all these men belong to the same organization. Lieut. D. S. McCune testified directly that he found Klein asleep. He was on duty in the front-line trench. Klein was acquitted.

Dewey G. Brady, Company G, 16th Infantry, was accused of sleeping on post on the night of November 5. This is the same night that it is alleged Pvt. Cook was found asleep. Again Corpl. Walenic was the chief witness for the prosecution. His story of how he came upon Brady, found him asleep, took his rifle, etc., is in essential respects a replica of the story he told in the Cook case, and the evidence in support of the charge against Brady is quite as strong, if not more convincing, than that in either the Cook or the Sebastian cases, in which the men were convicted. Brady was tried by the same court and acquitted.

Pvt. Herbert Tobias, Company E, 18th Infantry, was accused of sleeping on post in the front trenches on November 9. He was tried by a different court, appointed, however, by the same reviewing authority, viz, Maj. Gen. Bullard. The evidence was direct and positive that he was found sound asleep on his post. The accused did not take the stand and make any denial of the charge. He was tried December 15, was found guilty, and sentenced to be dishonorably discharged, with the usual forfeitures, and to be confined for three years. The reviewing authority returned the record for some clerical corrections, and with the suggestion that the court reconsider the case with the view to imposing a heavier penalty. Upon reconsideration the court increased the period of confinement to 10 years, and this sentence was approved.

(g) A number of cases have come from other organizations in France where men were convicted of sleeping on post or willful disobedience of orders. The following are some of the sentences:

Pvt. John L. Shade, United States Marines, convicted of sleeping on post November 19, 1917. The sentence as approved was six months' confinement and forfeiture of two-thirds of his pay for a like period. Maj. Gen. Bundy, reviewing authority.

Pvt. Aubrey La Lace, convicted of sleeping on post January 14, 1918. The approved sentence was confinement for one year and one month, with total forfeiture during that period. Maj. Gen. Kernan, reviewing authority.

Pvt. William F. Gildia, convicted of sleeping on post October 31, 1917. The approved sentence was confinement for six months and forfeiture of two-thirds of his pay for a like period. Gen. Coe reviewing authority.

Pvt. Enio J. Halonen, United States marines, was convicted of sleeping on post December 7, 1917. The sentence as approved was confinement for three months and forfeiture of two-thirds off his pay for a like period. Maj. Gen. Bundy was the reviewing authority.

Pvt. Edward M. Wood was convicted of leaving his post before being regularly relieved on November 14. The sentence as approved provided for confinement for six months and forfeiture of two-thirds of his pay for a like period. Maj. Gen. Kernan reviewing authority.

Pvt. James Hadestron was convicted of leaving his post before being regularly relieved on December 29. The sentence as approved was confinement for six months with forfeiture of two-thirds of his pay for a like period. Maj. Gen. Bundy reviewing authority.

The records show with respect to some of these cases that the offenses were not committed in the front-line trenches. As to others, the records do not show where the offenses were committed.

A number of cases have also come in from France where men were convicted of willful disobedience of orders under circumstances which do not distinguish them as to the locus of the offense from the cases of Fishback and Ledoyen, sentenced to death. The sentences run from a few months to several years.

ALFRED E. CLARK,
Lieutenant Colonel, Judge Advocate.

GEN. CHOWDER'S FINAL MEMORANDUM.

APRIL 16, 1918.

Memorandum for Gen. March.

Subject: Four cases from France involving the death penalty.

1. Since our interview on the four cases from France involving the death sentence, at which interview we agreed that we would submit the cases with a recommendation that the sentences be carried into execution, my attention has been invited to certain facts of which I had no knowledge at the time of the interview and to which I think your attention should have been invited.

The following four cases of sleeping on post, three of which appear to have arisen in the same regiment, namely, the 16th Infantry, on approximately the same date, and one in the 18th Infantry four days later, were disposed of as follows:

(a) William Hindman, private, Company G, 16th Infantry. This soldier was accused of sleeping on post in the front trenches on the night of November 5-6. This is the same night that Pvt. Cook, who was convicted, is alleged to have committed a like offense. In the Hindman case Corpl. Walenic and Pvt. Clark were witnesses for the prosecution, as they were also in the Cook case. In each case it was said that Pvt. Clark was on duty when his comrades were found asleep. The story told by Corpl. Walenic concerning Pvt. Hindman is in essential respects very much like the story he told concerning Pvt. Cook. If anything, the evidence was stronger against Pvt. Hindman than against Pvt. Cook, because Corpl. Walenic testified that the former was sitting down with his blanket around his head, and as he believed, asleep, when discovered by the corporal. In the case of Pvt. Cook, who was convicted, the evidence clearly shows that he was standing on the firing step in a natural position, with his rifle resting on the parapet at the time of the alleged offense. Cook was convicted upon the testimony of the two witnesses referred to, and Hindman was acquitted in spite of the evidence of these same witnesses, by the same court.

(b) Adam Klein, private, Company G, 16th Infantry, was accused of sleeping on post November 3, 1917. This is the same night that it is alleged Pvt. Sebastian was found asleep. Lieut. D. C. McCune testified directly that he found Klein asleep. He was on duty in the front-line trench. Klein was acquitted.

(c) Dewey C. Brady, Company G, 16th Infantry, was accused of sleeping on post on the night of November 5. This is the same night that it is alleged Pvt. Cook was found asleep. Again Corpl. Walenic was the chief witness for the prosecution. His story of how he came upon Brady, found him asleep, took his rifle, etc., is in essential respects a replica of the story he told in the Cook case, and the evidence in support of the charge against Brady is quite as strong, if not more convincing, than in either the Cook or the Sebastian cases, in which the men were convicted. Brady was tried by the same court and acquitted.

(d) Herbert Tobias, private, Company E, 18th Infantry, was accused of sleeping on post in the front trenches on November 9. He was tried by a different court, appointed, however, by the same reviewing authority, viz, Maj. Gen. Bullard. The evidence was direct and positive that he was found sound asleep on his post. The accused did not take the stand and make any denial of the charge. He was tried December 15, was found guilty, and sentenced to be dishonorably discharged, with the usual forfeitures, and to be confined for three years. The reviewing authority returned the record for some clerical corrections, and with the suggestion that the court reconsider the case with a view to imposing a heavier penalty. Upon reconsideration, the court increased the period of confinement to ten years, and this sentence was approved.

2. I think, perhaps, you would also like to know something of the state of discipline in other organizations in France as evidenced by the fact that in the following cases men have been convicted of sleeping on post, or of leaving post before being regularly relieved, with sentences adjudged which are, by comparison with the death sentence, almost trivial:

(1) Pvt. John L. Shade, United States Marines, convicted of sleeping on post November 19, 1917. The sentence as approved was six months' confinement and forfeiture of two-thirds of his pay for a like period. Maj. Gen. Bundy, reviewing authority.

(2) Pvt. Aubrey Le Lace, convicted of sleeping on post January 14, 1918. The approved sentence was confinement for one year and one month, with total forfeiture during that period. Maj. Gen. Kernan, reviewing authority.

(3) Pvt. William F. Glidia, convicted of sleeping on post October 31, 1917. The approved sentence was confinement for six months and forfeiture of two-thirds of his pay for a like period. Gen. Coe, reviewing authority.

(4) Pvt. Enio J. Halonen, United States Marines, was convicted of sleeping on post December 7, 1917. The sentence as approved was confinement for three months and forfeiture of two-thirds of his pay for a like period. Maj. Gen. Bundy was the reviewing authority.

(5) Pvt. Edward M. Wood was convicted of leaving his post before being regularly relieved on November 14, 1917. The sentence as approved provided for confinement for six months and forfeiture of two-thirds of his pay for a like period. Maj. Gen. Kernan, reviewing authority.

(6) Pvt. James Hadestron was convicted of leaving his post before being regularly relieved on December 29. The sentence as approved was confinement for six months, with forfeiture of two-thirds of his pay for a like period. Maj. Gen. Bundy, reviewing authority.

The records show with respect to some of the six cases listed above that the offenses were not committed in the front-line trenches. As to others the records do not show where the offenses were committed.

3. In addition to the foregoing the study in this office reveals a number of cases which have come in from France where men have been convicted of willful disobedience of orders under circumstances which do not distinguish them as to the locus of the offense from the cases of Fishback and Ledoyen, who were sentenced to death. The sentences in the cases referred to run from a few months to several years' confinement.

4. Permit me finally to observe, without reopening the case, that it will always be a matter of regret to me that the four cases upon which we are called upon to act were not well tried. The composition of the court in Ledoyen's case consisted of one colonel, one major, and four first lieutenants. The four first lieutenants could have had but little experience. The same court that tried Ledoyen tried Fishback. The court that tried Cook was composed of the same members, except a captain (doubtless of considerable experience) and a first lieutenant (presumably of little experience); and the same court that tried Cook tried Sebastian.

We have discussed the fact that each of the four defendants was a mere youth, and I am a little impressed by the fact that not one of them made any fight for his life. Each of the four men was defended by a second lieutenant, who made no special plea for them. I regret exceedingly that in each case the accused was allowed to make a plea of guilty. As counsel for them I should have strongly advised that they plead not guilty and require the Government to maintain its case at every point.

It will not have escaped your notice that Gen. Pershing has no office of review in these cases. He seems to have required that these cases be sent to him for the purpose of putting on the record an expression of his view that all four men should be placed before a firing squad. I do not make this statement for the purpose of criticizing his action. Indeed, I sympathize with it. But it is fair, in the consideration of the action to be taken here, to bear in mind the fact that Gen. Pershing was not functioning as a reviewing officer with any official relation to the prosecution, but as commanding general anxious to maintain the discipline of his command.

E. H. CROWDER,
Judge Advocate General.

Mr. ANSELL. As I say, that memorandum did not get anywhere. Two of these cases are the cases that we saw featured in the Washington Post here on Friday or Saturday morning, where there was printed a letter written by Mr. Baker to the President, saying, in effect, "My dear Mr. President: You recall the cases of Sebastian and Cook, who were tried and found guilty last year, in France, of sleeping on post, and whom you so graciously pardoned. I wish to advise you what the happy effect of that clemency was in those two cases. They were restored to the colors, and one of them has been killed in the battle in the Argonne, and the other has been honorably discharged."

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Twice wounded.

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; twice wounded and then discharged.

The other two cases, however, gentlemen, he did not mention, and those other cases were commuted, fortunately, by the President later to three years in the penitentiary.

And I say that these were cases where the President did not have to resort to pardon, because the President, being the confirming authority in these cases, had the power that a commanding general below has, to set the proceedings all aside. They pardoned two of them and sent two to the penitentiary. The man who died in the Argonne, though pardoned, died with the judgment of guilt, of having slept on his post in the face of the enemy, branded upon him. As a matter of law, he was not guilty at all. The same thing is true of the man so seriously wounded.

And the men who have served in the penitentiary from that time to this are, in my judgment, serving absolutely unlawful sentences: and I so said in the memorandum that I wrote in that case before going to France, which never reached the Secretary of War. Before leaving for France, finding that it had not been forwarded, I did send that memorandum to a distinguished Member of Congress and ask him to take the matter up with the President of the United States.

Senator LENROOT. And clemency was eventually granted?

Mr. ANSELL. Clemency granted in all cases.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In all four cases?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes.

Senator LENROOT. I mean in all four cases.

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; two of the men were pardoned outright, notwithstanding the fact, Mr. Chairman, that the division commander said they should die, notwithstanding the fact that Gen. Pershing clamored that they should die, notwithstanding the fact that the Judge Advocate General agreed that they should die, and notwithstanding the fact that the Chief of Staff said they should die, and the entire military hierarchy clamored that they should die. But fortunately, in this case the civil view of justice did prevail to the point where though they did not set aside the sentence as they ought to have done, because that course was not called to the attention of the Secretary of War, the men did not die.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That was in your memorandum?

Mr. ANSELL. In my memorandum. He did not set them aside: strike down the judgments as they ought to have been struck down.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The Secretary of War did not approve these judgments, did he?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; he approved of the judgments and reduced them.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He did not disapprove?

Mr. ANSELL. No, indeed; he did not disapprove them. He and the President approved of the sentences but granted some clemency.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Let me be sure about that. The Secretary of War, you say, did not see your memorandum?

Mr. ANSELL. No.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you know whether or not he approved of the final judgment of Gen. Crowder and Gen. Marsh?

Mr. ANSELL. No; I think not, entirely. I think the Secretary of War recommended clemency.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you think so?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes.

Senator LENROOT. Was that before or after the intervention of these memoranda you speak of?

Mr. ANSELL. I have not the slightest idea. You see, I went to Europe, and I only know that I got a personal letter from a reliable source over here saying that the men would not be hanged. I did not know what happened. Whether the President ever conferred with the Member of Congress I do not know. I think so.

Senator LENROOT. That is what I wanted to know.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I think the President very properly addressed the Secretary of War a letter the other day commending the gallantry of these young fellows; and may I ask to have those two letters inserted in the record? They are printed in the press and we can not vouch for their authenticity, but I assume they are correct:

(The newspaper clipping referred to is here printed in full as follows:)

SAVED BY PRESIDENT, BOYS PROVE HEROES; SLEPT AT POSTS; PARDONED; ONE IS KILLED IN WAR, SECOND WOUNDED.

An exchange of letters between President Wilson and Secretary of War Baker yesterday revealed the redemption of two boy soldiers sentenced to die after a court-martial in France for sleeping on outpost duty, but later pardoned by the President. The letters, which tell the story, are as follows:

"MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: You will recall that early in 1918 four death sentences were presented to you from France. Two, for disobedience of orders, you remitted to terms of imprisonment, and two young boys, Sebastian and Cook, who were convicted of sleeping on outpost duty, you fully pardoned.

"It will interest you to know that upon restoration to duty both made good soldiers. Sebastian died in battle in the Aisne offensive in July, 1918. Cook was wounded in the same battle and restored to health in time to fight in the Meuse-Argonne battle, when he again fought gallantly and was the second time wounded. He has now been restored to health through medical attention and has been honorably discharged from the service.

"Respectfully, yours,

"NEWTON D. BAKER."

Here is the President's reply:

"MY DEAR BAKER: Thank you for your thoughtfulness in telling me about the records made by Sebastian and Cook, the two youngsters who were pardoned for sleeping on outpost duty. It is very delightful to know that they redeemed themselves so thoroughly, and it was very thoughtful of you to give me the pleasure of learning about it.

"Cordially and faithfully, yours,

"WOODROW WILSON."

Mr. ANSELL. The point I make in those cases is that it is bad enough that men have got to serve a term in the penitentiary when, as I say, lawyers and judges would have said that the conviction was illegal; but the point I make is that the whole military hierarchy, capped by your Chief of Staff and the Judge Advocate General of the Army, who is not independent of the Chief of Staff, clamored and entered into an agreement that these men should die.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. By the way, General, right in that connection, even the act of extending clemency on the part of the President does not remove the stigma of conviction.

Mr. ANSELL. Certainly not.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In other words, the judgment still stands?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. So that the young man who was killed, and the men who were discharged, still have that stigma against them.

Mr. ANSELL. Yes. But the great point in these cases is, I called them up not only to illustrate how narrowly these men escaped death, but to illustrate the dependence under existing law of your Judge Advocate General upon the power of military command, and the evils of it. The Judge Advocate General is absolutely dependent on the power of military command, in his case the Chief of Staff. How much more true is that of the subordinate judge advocate upon the staff of the commanding general?

Senator LENROOT. I am not speaking about the offenses punishable by death; but do you draw a distinction between the revision of a court-martial in time of war in the face of the enemy where it does appear that substantial justice has been done, but technical error has been committed—a distinction between revising that kind of a court-martial, and one where there could be injury following a mere technical following of the law?

Mr. ANSELL. You know, Mr. Chairman, I am rather glad that you asked me this question, because I have rather set views along this line, and I believe they are views that will be approved by all legally trained men; indeed, I believe by men of practical common sense.

You are drawing the distinction between a case in which you say from looking over the record that substantial justice has been done notwithstanding technical error, and the case where there is technical error and not substantial justice done.

The moment you admit such a distinction as that you are lost. If you hold that there is in the proceedings error of the kind that lawyers call prejudicial, and nevertheless permit your judgment to be overruled by the general conception that the result is a just one, you have tried that man not according to law; you have tried him according to your own personal judgment of whether the man is guilty or not. In other words, I think if a member of this committee or if any lawyer, or for that matter any other man, admits that "it is true this man was not legally tried; it is true there are technical errors which, in and of themselves, are sufficient to work a reversal of the judgment in the case, nevertheless I, because of a personal view that I have of that record and that trial, and a knowledge of the attending circumstances, believe that substantial justice will be done by affirming that judgment," you have drawn a destructive distinction between legal guilt and moral guilt. That must not be done. That is the distinction that the mob draws.

Senator LENROOT. But, General, is not the trend of the civil law—of the civil courts—more and more to disregard technical error and look to the substance?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; certainly, Mr. Chairman.

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. ANSELL. But that involves only the question, Is error prejudicial to the judgment?

Senator LENROOT. Yes; certainly.

Mr. ANSELL. And do not let us say according to the law of the land and the precedents and authorities—the enlightened authority—that this judgment is bad, and yet insist upon its execution. Do not let us compromise with that. If we once determine that the judgment is prejudiced by error, let us have a new trial. This very question, Mr. Chairman, is one of vital interest.

Senator LENROOT. Let me see, General: Then it is your view in all cases that, although error might have been committed, unless the revising authority finds that the error is really prejudicial it would not be ground for reversal of judgment?

Mr. ANSELL. Certainly not, sir. Nobody could deprecate more than I some of the civil decisions that I think have been not in line with sensible authorities. Some appellate decisions have shown a meticulousness that I think judges and lawyers disapprove of. I remember one court actually held that the indictment was bad because in the concluding sentence it did not contain the definite article before the word "state," and therefore the court said they could not tell what law was violated. Utterly absurd!

But when we come to the substantial things, the denial of a man's substantial rights, though I know that as human beings we frequently say from our knowledge of the record, from our knowledge of the situation and the circumstances, from what we imply from that record, that we believe that that fellow is as guilty as Cain, yet is not that the time, right then, for the law to interpose and govern our judgment? In 1849 a distinguished and eminent London barrister had cause, after he had been counsel for a Capt. Douglass of the English army, to attack the English court-martial system, as the result of which it was much improved. He fought the case through the military hierarchy, terminating, if I remember, at that time in Lord Wellington himself—it may not have been so, but I think it was—in any event, a distinguished general and statesman, through the Judge Advocate General, upon a question of competency of evidence. They said "The evidence was incompetent, but still we know the fellow is guilty." He got nowhere. Then suddenly he wrote an open letter to the Queen and published it, and I am sure that any member of this committee, if he is interested in the beauties of legal expression that we frequently find in such productions, will find it well worth his while to read this letter. It would be well worth the while of any member of the committee interested in our present establishment and its history. He ran up against this very thing. The Judge Advocate General of England said "Why, you know, Mr. Warren, that this fellow is guilty. The whole Army knows he is guilty. It is a matter of common knowledge that he is guilty." It happened that that was one of those cases in which time proved that the man was not guilty; but the War Department and the Army insisted that he was guilty, and this lawyer went, single-handed, to the country upon it.

He ran across this very argument, you see, and I want to quote to you a striking paragraph from this letter. It is worth quoting. It might well be put in our military books, that our younger men should study and reflect upon it. I am quoting from an address that I made, and I put the statement of this British barrister in antithesis to some statement made by some of our judge advocates when they were testifying before the committee of the American Bar Association in this city: and I say as a lawyer I have sympathy, not contempt, for a lawyer who finds himself so imposed upon by military authority, that he has got to testify as these men testified. Listen to what these men testified to. [Reading:]

While in many cases the trials of enlisted men are not so elaborate as the trials of officers, and in many cases the rules of evidence are not observed, and counsel is obviously inadequate, and while in a considerable percentage of the cases we find the decision is not sustained by the fact, still I do not recall a single case in which, morally, we were not convinced that the accused was guilty. (Testimony of a reviewing judge advocate before committee American Bar Association, Mar. 27-28, 1919. notes, vol. 1; concurred in by the others.)

I say I place in antithesis to this the only rule that lawyers can respect, the only rule that can protect a man's rights on trial, the only rule that a government can afford to adhere to, if you are going to have a government by law and not by the judgment of a mere personal being.

I quote from Warren. [Reading:]

It concerns the safety of all citizens alike that legal guilt should be made the sole condition for legal punishment; for legal guilt, rightly understood, is nothing but moral guilt ascertained according to those rules of trial which experience and reflection have combined to suggest for the security of the State at large. * * * They (these fundamental principles of our law) have, nevertheless, been lost sight of, and with a disastrous effect, by the military authorities conducting and supporting the validity of the proceedings about to be brought before Your Majesty. (Warren's letter to the Queen, p. 9.)

That made a profound impression on me, because it is a conclusive answer to this sort of rough-and-ready standard that people are inclined to adopt for the determination of the guilt of others, but never of themselves. If you want to find the sharpest critic in the world of the American system of military justice, show me an officer who has once been haled before a court-martial.

Senator LENROOT. By my question to you, General, with reference to substantial justice being done, I of course did not mean to infer that it should be made to appear de hors the record.

Mr. ANSELL. I did not suppose so.

Senator LENROOT. But could there not be such a thing as saying that there had been substantial justice done according to the record, and at the same time there was substantial error?

Mr. ANSELL. I should think not. If they could say, as lawyers, "This is not substantial error," I am willing to abide by that. But do not let them say "This is substantial error but nevertheless we are going to disregard it, because substantial justice has been done."

That brings us to another thing. If you are going to revise the Articles of War, we must not lose sight of the present attitude of the Army on these questions. We run against it all the time. Take the question of evidence; there is no man in all the world with less legal appreciation than a Regular Army officer; none. I make that statement. He is trained away from legal appreciations; and if you just talk law or legal principles or lawyers, you excite his prejudices right away. But it is not only the American Regular Army officer; he is nothing in the world but a successor of the old British officer, and I think Gen. Napier was as fine an example of a fine British Army officer as you will ever find, though thoroughly and absolutely destitute of every legal appreciation. The British, however, have gone far ahead of us in remodeling this system that we took over from them; but it has not been done with the consent of the regular army, but against them. They have been obdurate in the matter. It has been done by the lawyers of the land.

Gen. Napier undertook to take the lawyers to task for interference with military discipline—that is their great standby, discipline—and he made an attack upon the attitude of the English bar, and you will find that attack published in Napier's Notes on Military

Law; and there was not a shrewder soldier in all England than he. He just simply had a wrong mental poise toward legal proceedings. Napier got after the lawyers about undertaking to apply in the trial of courts-martial the rules of evidence as they were understood in the civil courts.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Is this Warren, now?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; this is Warren again, answering Napier. There are others who have said the same thing as Napier, but his is a handy book. I want to read this to you, because, in my twenty-odd years of experience if I had not heard the same expression put this way a thousand times by our regular officers, I never heard it in my life. And I have heard it from the highest authorities; from chiefs of staff, particularly. Listen to what this distinguished British general said, to whom England owed so much. She could not follow him here. He could not stand cross-examination when he says:

And why should not a soldier commit himself? The business of courts-martial is not to discuss law, but to get at the truth by all the means in its power. We soldiers want to get at the fact, no matter how, for the sake of discipline, and I know of no better evidence against a man than himself. (Napier's Notes, Military Law, accepted and frequently quoted by officers of the United States Army.)

He was quarreling with the British bar, because the British bar had undertaken to intercede for the men who are subjected to this military third-degree method which is prevalent in our service at this very day. "We want to get at the fact, the truth:" as though army men had some empirical standard for getting at the truth which worked invariably, but that standard was not according to the law—something else than that they had! I say that I have heard that statement quoted a thousand times in the War Department: "We do not want lawyers; we do not want law; we do not want rules of evidence. We just want the plain unvarnished fact." If there is a set of men on God's earth more incompetent by virtue of their authority and environment to get at the truth other than by the rules of evidence, than the officers of the Army, I do not know where they are to be found.

I want to take the time to read Warren's classic answer. He said:

Our rules of evidence are the safeguards of every subject of your Majesty, high and low, rich and poor, young and old. Were those rules to be disregarded, anybody might at any time be found guilty of anything. They ought, of all others, to be kept inviolate, for the whole administration of justice depends upon them. They are, as I have this day seen observed in full force and eloquence, the result of the collective wisdom of generations and founded on the principles of immutable equity. (Warren's letter to the Queen on a late court-martial, p. 8, which was instrumental in revolutionizing the British military code.)

Yet your very committee, when you came to revise these articles in 1916, instead of writing into these articles that courts-martial would have to observe the rules of evidence as they are observed by our Federal courts, namely, the rules of common law as they have been changed by statutes of Congress, did what? It had been the understanding, the custom, that courts-martial would, when convenient, follow well-understood rules of evidence; which of course they did not understand, but nevertheless we had that generally accepted standard resting upon custom and practice, and at the behest of the Judge Advocate General you struck down this rule.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. May I say in reference to that revision of 1916, I was chairman of the committee during the hearings on that, and there were no hardships being alleged against the military system then; there was no insistence that they should be amended: there were no cases of hardship brought to the attention of the committee; and I think you will remember that the only purpose of the amendment was to give them effect in the Philippines and in our insular possessions, and possibly there were a few other changes that were insisted upon, but nobody made any objection.

Mr. ANSELL. I am not criticizing that, Senator.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I just wanted you to know the fact about it.

Mr. ANSELL. I do not think there was the interest in the matter that there is now. The committee did not know. These things had not been called to your attention. But nevertheless I want to show you what a committee is up against when you come to take your advice from the War Department, exclusively.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. If I had known then what I know now—if the committee had known then what they know now—they would have been very likely to make changes.

Mr. ANSELL. Yes. One of the changes—and there were only three important changes, and I use the word “substantial” and “important”—in this revision was this. Listen. [Reading:]

The President may prescribe the procedure, including modes of proof, in cases before courts-martial. (Articles of war enacted in 1916 upon the recommendation of the Judge Advocate General of the War Department.)

And that of course abolished the rule that then existed requiring courts-martial to recognize the rules of evidence applied in criminal courts of the United States.

But let us see the argument that was made for this revision, because it is indicative of a state of mind that I think we ought to know about.

First, you will observe that it is right in line with the old idea that the commander in chief is everything. He is the supreme court. That is what is said. They likened the commander in chief to the Supreme Court, and then they said “We will liken the administration of military justice to equity and admiralty matters, because in those matters under existing statute the Supreme Court of the United States can make these rules of procedure, including modes of proof.”

The truth of the matter is that we do not regard the enlisted men of the Army as really human beings, persons, who can suffer, and who when properly appealed to can respond, can actually move mountains through that appeal but rather as property. We actually went to the statutes of the United States on the civil side of things and took those statutes that intrusted to the Supreme Court of the United States the making of rules of evidence in matters that can concern only property—equity and admiralty especially—and said that we thought it would be a wonderfully good thing if we invested the President of the United States with like power over soldiers. Now, in this little manual you will find how to prove murder and how to prove rape and arson; how to get at the gist of the thing.

And there are rules of evidence. But you have put it in the hands of the President to prescribe these rules of evidence, and the effect is this, that he has not prescribed them. Of course not! I think it would be very difficult for a man to prescribe thus briefly rules of evidence; there is so much left that goes beyond the mere expression. But still, he has not prescribed them; and under this power if he prescribed them to-day, he can change them to-morrow; and when he does not prescribe, the courts feel at liberty to follow any rule they please, very properly; and since that time—I speak out of my experience for the War Department both before and after the making of this statute—since that time we have less respect for the rules of evidence than we ever had before, because what is found in the manual rises to no greater dignity than what else is found in the manual, how many sheets of paper to use and how to fold them and how to number them, which can be violated with impunity; and of course where nothing is prescribed, there is license to the court to do as it pleases.

Going back to the efforts made during the war, I have shown that the reactionary and absolutist view prevailed, and the Judge Advocate General was reduced to making “studies” and memoranda of advice upon pure questions of law for the benefit of commanding generals, if they chose to accept or profit by them.

It was up to me to accept the situation, and I endeavored, for the office of the Judge Advocate General, to perform the duty as best I could. It was up to us so to organize the office that we could make such a strong appeal to the sense of natural justice of a commanding general that we might induce him to act justly and according to law; no authority, of course, no appeal to a legal standard; only an appeal to the power of military command to do what was right after we had failed to establish a rule requiring him to do what was right. It is the strangest thing in all the world that though I organized all of these board of review, the clemency boards, all the divisions, and so on, not through War Department orders but office orders, and that though this organization was reluctantly assented to or opposed by the Judge Advocate General and the department generally and was criticized by superior military authority on the ground that I was overloading my office, and did not need any such review, the department now relies upon the organization as the saving grace. An acting Chief of Staff told me, “Too many lawyers down there, Ansell; too many.” But I organized the board of review in spite of opposition, and the first and second divisions of that board of review, and put the best lawyers I could get there, and then I instructed the board of review to point out all legal errors and to try and establish standards, in accordance with the Grafton decision and the Runkle decision and other decisions, for the government of court-martial procedure, and instructed them again and again to use all the power, the force and the persuasion of logic that they had, and to point to inexpediency when legal argument could not be made to stick, in order to induce these commanding generals to do what was right; and I would like to put in the record those memoranda establishing the office organization.

Senator LENROOT. Very well.

The memoranda referred to are here printed in full, as follows:

ORDERS ORGANIZING BOARDS OF REVIEW IN THE OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL.

ANSELL EXHIBIT L.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, August 6, 1918.

There is hereby created in the Military Justice Division of this office a board of review, to consist of such and as many officers of that division as the chief thereof, after conference with the head of the office shall designate. The duties of such board will be in the nature of those of an appellate tribunal and shall be performed with due regard to their character as such. It shall be the duty of the board, under the general direction of the head of this office and the chief of division, to review all proceedings of all general courts-martial received in this office which at present are reviewed in writing. The preliminary review of any such case, after having been made and prepared by the officer to whom the record has been assigned will be transmitted to the board of review, and thereupon the members of said board will proceed to consider the preliminary review jointly and concurrently in the manner similar to that employed by appellate tribunals in reaching and expressing their decision. The board may adopt the preliminary review as its own, may modify or rewrite such review, or may direct that it be modified or rewritten so as to express their views. When a majority or more of the board agree upon a review the review shall show the names of those who concur, but not of any who may dissent, and the review thus agreed upon shall be transmitted to the chief of division, with the record. Any dissenting member may indicate the reasons for his dissent, either orally or in writing, to the chief of division, and in important cases and where he so desires to the head of the office.

The members of the board may consult freely with the officer preparing the preliminary review and the head of the division, and may discuss the case with the head of the office when that course is agreeable to him. It is preferable, however, not to discuss the case with others. When practicable the board will be assigned sufficient room space, clerical force, and any other aid necessary and available.

S. T. ANSELL,
Acting Judge Advocate General.

ANSELL EXHIBIT M.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, November 6, 1918.

The board of review, Military Justice Division, created therein by office memorandum of August 6, 1918, is hereby divided into two divisions, to be known as "The Board of Review, First Division," and "The Board of Review, Second Division." The present personnel of the board will constitute the first division. The Chief of the Military Justice Division will, immediately after consultation with the head of the office, designate the personnel of the second division. The organization, constitution, procedure, powers, and duties of each division will be as prescribed in said office memorandum. Each division will function separately and independently of the other and upon cases assigned it by the chief of division, who will endeavor to see that cases of the same or similar character be referred as far as practicable to the same division.

S. T. ANSELL,
Acting Judge Advocate General.

ANSELL EXHIBIT N.

INSTRUCTIONS TO BOARDS OF REVIEW TO RECOMMEND CLEMENCY IN CASES UNDER G. O. 7.

For the Chief, Division of Military Justice:

1. No system of administration of justice can be other than patently deficient which does not provide for an expeditious and, at the same time, thorough consideration of clemency; and a system which obstructs or delays the granting of clemency in a proper case is subject to severest criticism.

2. This office has within the organization of the Military Justice Division a clemency section, and this takes care of those cases which arise upon an application submitted by the prisoner himself. But this is not sufficiently general. Frequently it becomes perfectly obvious upon the review of a case in this office upon the receipt of the record, that the penalty is altogether too severe, or that for other reasons clemency ought to be granted and not deferred until an application should come from the prisoner himself. I can conceive of no better time to initiate a recommendation for clemency than upon the completion of the review of a case, when the impression of the incident of guilt is still well defined and the evidence and the circumstances of the commission of the offense are fresh in the mind. This office ought not to be limited in the performance of its functions of review to considering the strict technical question of the legality of the proceedings, but in its capacity as the bureau of military justice it should extend its consideration to include the question of clemency.

3. I have recently been advised that during my absence in Europe, it was held by this office, and the Division of Military Justice so instructed, that the functions of this office, in considering cases coming to it under General Order 7, were to be limited simply to the question of legality of proceedings and were not to be extended to the quantum of punishment and like matters affecting clemency; and that in such cases this office could not with propriety make recommendations to the reviewing authority upon matters of mitigation and remission.

4. While this may be a correct construction of the order, when it is viewed in one light, I do not think it is correct when viewed in the proper light. It could not have been the purpose of General Order 7 to impose a limitation upon this office. I am personally familiar with the origin and the administrative circumstances out of which it arose. Of course, it is to be conceded that it is the function of this office to pass upon an application for clemency after the reviewing authority shall have acted upon the receipts of our review, and his action shall have become final; and inasmuch as our review is now made before his action becomes final, it is seasonable to include within it our views upon matters of clemency. This becomes especially obvious in those cases of dismissal and dishonorable discharge which, when executed by the authorities below, pass beyond the power of clemency; and it was this very class of cases which General Order 7 reaches. If we confine ourselves strictly to the question of legality, while we have thereto assured that the sentence, if executed, is legal, it will at the same time pass beyond all restorative power.

5. I have to advise you, therefore, that hereafter your reviews shall include the consideration of clemency and your recommendations, and where, as in the case of dismissal of an officer, the authority below, even if he has the disposition, has not the power to mitigate, because of the fact that any mitigation must result in commutation, a power exclusively in the hands of the President, you will prepare your recommendation for clemency for direct presentation to the War Department.

SEPTEMBER '18.

ANSELL EXHIBIT O.

INSTRUCTIONS UPON THE METHOD OF REVIEW.

JANUARY 3, 1919.

Memorandum for Military Justice Division.

1. I have heretofore advised you frequently and informally, and I take this occasion to advise you more formally, of certain views of mine which I believe to be worthy of consideration and, perhaps, observation by those who have to do with the administration of military justice; indeed, in my judgment, must be observed generally in the establishment, if that administration is to be what justice requires it to be and what thoughtful public opinion would like it to be. I advise you thus that my views may not be misunderstood and that they may furnish you with a general guide in the review of proceedings and constitute your authority for action in which you and others may not personally concur.

2. Courts-martial are courts, tribunals for the doing of justice, as much so as any tribunals in the land, and they must be fairly and impartially constituted and they must fairly and impartially function. Judicial fairness in the case of courts-martial should be tested not only by the letter of the Articles of War, but by those principles established in our jurisprudence which are designed to secure fair and impartial trial and which are applicable to all hearings of a judicial character.

3. The former military view, which had received in this country considerable judicial support, was that courts-martial performed only executive functions and passed, in an administrative way, upon the military aspect of the misconduct of one subject to military law. The legal view now judicially established is quite the opposite, and is that courts-martial have full and complete jurisdiction over the conduct of all who are subject to military jurisdiction, with full power to try them not only for military offenses, but for crimes against the general public law. This should bring to us in the Army, and most especially to those of us more directly interested in military justice, new appreciations.

Murder, for instance, tried before a court-martial, is none the less than murder tried before a civil court and jury, with none the less serious consequences for society and the accused, and should be tried with none the less thoroughness and fairness. Thoroughness and fairness of courts-martial should be determined with less inclination to regard courts-martial as tribunals sui generis, and with greater regard for those fundamental safeguards with which the law beneficently surrounds every person placed in jeopardy. Articles of War having to do with rights of the accused therefore should be construed, both with respect to what they provide and what they fail to provide, more and more in the light of and in comparison with those constitutional principles which touch the rights of an accused in a criminal prosecution. Those principles should apply to courts-martial, except where clearly inapplicable to the military system.

4. I wish to speak now more specifically and give the general views above enunciated concrete application:

(a) My views are in conflict with the view advanced at times in argument * * * to the effect that in determining the principles of fairness and impartiality to be applied to test courts-martial, those principles should be sought in the analogy of a Roman chancellor or judge. Courts-martial are criminal courts administering criminal law; they consist of from 5 to 13 members, and thus the very law of their constitution denies the analogy of the single trier of law and fact found in Roman jurisprudence, and clearly establishes on the other hand their analogy to the common law court and jury for the trial of criminal offenses; it is in that analogy, therefore, that we must seek the principles by which the fairness and impartiality of courts-martial must be tested. Applying these principles to a case now in hand, they serve, in my judgment, to prohibit the successive trial by the same court of several accused charged with the same or similar offenses, involving the same transaction, state of facts, and evidence.

(b) I further disagree with the view that article 37, as it exists in the military code, was designed to have, or does have, the curative effect which the Board of Review seems to me at times to attribute to it. That article does not permit us to register a legal conclusion that there was substantial error committed, and then to overcome it with the personal conclusion of the guilt of the accused gathered out of the entire case. No revisory power and no appellate court should ever reverse or disapprove, except for prejudicial error. The substance of the article appears nowadays frequently in civil codes, in which position it was clearly predicated upon the evil found in the disposition of some appellate tribunals to reverse for meticulous and fanciful errors, and was, therefore, designed to correct a bad judicial habit appearing in some places. It can not be truthfully said that the Army was ever given to meticulous disapproval or that there has ever been a tendency in the establishment to indulge too freely the power of disapproval. The contrary was quite true, in my judgment, and in this view I must think general public judgment concurs. This article, as it appears in the military code, is rather more of a grant of power than a limitation.

(c) In my judgment, punishments awarded by courts-martial during this war are properly criticizable in general for their undue and inexplicable severity. Frequently they are such as to shock the conscience. Such punishments violate justice and serve no proper end. They invite and merit public reproach. We frequently have to confess that nobody expects such punishments to be served. Such a confession, while true, is an admission of the injustice of the punishments, and is bound to bring courts-martial into disrepute.

I wish you would help me in determining the course which this office ought to take in making an effort to see that these unjust and severe penalties may be brought within the bounds of reason and justice.

5. The review of proceedings should be expeditious. The result should be made to turn upon substantial error, so tangible that we may have no great difficulty in discovering the principles touching it. To such and not to inconsequential error should our consideration be invited, and upon such should the case turn. With such error, however, justice will not permit us to compromise either by a resort to any assumed curative capacity of the 37th Article of War or any other consideration.

6. My sense of applied law and justice, with which others, of course, may differ, requires me to enunciate these views clearly and unmistakably and ask you to be governed by them until they may be superseded.

S. T. ANSELL,

Acting Judge Advocate General.

Mr. ANSELL. I say that the strange thing is now that the gentlemen who are engaged in defending this system find their chief and almost only support in the fact that this organization of the office was made by me. In justice, look at the Wigmore publication, look at the statements of the Secretary of War, the statements of the Judge Advocate General. Why, they say we have the finest reviewing machinery in the world; that there is no appellate court in the world that goes over a record with such thoroughness.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And those were on your recommendation down there and adopted over the protests of the Assistant Chief of Staff?

Mr. ANSELL. That is true; adopted in spite of the contrary desire of military authority. If there was not protest or criticism, there was coolness to it all.

Senator LENROOT. Did you have a formal approval by the Secretary of War?

Mr. ANSELL. No; I just—Mr. Chairman, this is rather difficult to believe at the present time, because it is not in accordance with the usual administration, but in those times in the War Department if you got anything done, you did it, and took the responsibility; and I say that these very agencies, every one of which was organized by me and without help and largely with the hindrance of the War Department, every one of those agencies is now instanced by the War Department as showing the great virtues of this system. Of course, this reviewing machinery is simply standing the pyramid on its pinnacle. They say, "We do not want any lawyers in the courts below. We want the courts to do as they please. We do not want to be governed by legal principles, but when the mass of error finally becomes the scum at the top, we will take it off, there, by our boards of review;" a board that, of course, has no authority. It is nothing in the world but a lot of sophistry and shrewd argument. I say that the cases were not properly reviewed. I say that they were not all reviewed; that there were only a few of them that were reviewed, and that such reviews as were made were frequently ineffectual.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You were asked if your course had the approval in this matter of the Secretary of War. Is it not a fact that the Secretary of War—I do not mean this one, particularly, but the Secretary of War—was not accustomed to listen to those in inferior stations, in the Judge Advocate General's office, or in any of the other departments?

Mr. ANSELL. No.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. So that if you reached him at all, no matter what your recommendation might be, you generally had to go through the Judge Advocate General?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; you not only would have to go through the Judge Advocate General, Senator, but you would have to go through the Chief of Staff.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. So that if they desired to withhold any recommendation you made or anything you said, they could do it?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes. It seems to me to be impossible under a scheme of military organization such as we have, for the administrative head to get real facts and real advice. You have got a bureaucracy there: it has been there and is going to be there apparently forever. Along comes the Secretary of War, who of course knows nothing about it, and he is gotten by the bureaucracy just like that [indicating], and just swims along with it.

I remember Secretary Garrison coming there, and with his very large and generous way of doing things he said, "I am the Secretary of War, and anybody who has a complaint or a suggestion to make, even though it be a corporal or a private, can get to me. I will hear him, with such time as I have. That is, the channel to me is free." I remember how everybody laughed at the new Secretary. Well, he may have thought that he was in touch with the Army—the privates and corporals, etc.—But Secretary Garrison could not reverse a machine like that in a moment. Just see what a private or a corporal would have to do in order to get to the Secretary of War—probably an impracticable scheme of administration anyway. He has got to get the consent of his company commander, he has got to get the consent of his battalion commander, he has got to get the consent of his regimental commander, he has got to get the consent of his post commander, he has got to get the consent of his department commander, and then he has got to get the consent of the Chief of Staff.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He could not even get past the first sergeant, to begin with.

Mr. ANSELL. Of course not; he could not get past the first sergeant. You have got the first sergeant to pass before you get to any of these others. It is absurd. You can not get to the Secretary of War. I did not get to the Secretary of War; and I did not when I was a brigadier general. They were always pleasant and always glad to see you when you did see them; but you did not get into the Secretary's room except through the Chief of Staff. Probably it will always be so. I think it is unfortunate.

This military system is so hidebound, it is so crystallized, and its channels are so fixed and so easily obstructed, that you do not get very far. The strange thing about our Military Establishment is this: I frequently think of it in my own case. I was not militarily ambitious, and it did not make any difference to me, except that there was a great lesson there.

The Congress of the United States called on a brigadier general, a man who had been acting Judge Advocate General during the war, to come down and testify on a pending bill. He comes down, and it is his disposition to call a spade a spade and speak frankly, which he did. Just before that I had received the distinguished-service medal, the highest honor that can come to a man off the field of battle, and, to drop to the language of the street, I was "the white-haired willie-boy of the War Department." But when I did my duty before this committee over which you presided, Senator Chamberlain, I was promptly disciplined. But was it because I did not tell the truth? No; nobody said anything about that. It was because I did what I did; it was because I came down here and talked just as I am talking now, as I always talk. Let gentlemen on the other side say what they want to, this was their attitude: "It is because you are divulging the secrets of the system, giving away the system, giving away state secrets, things that we want to keep away from Congress and the public." There is not an institution on earth that so repels public inquiry and public knowledge as the Army of the United States. They come to Congress only when they want something.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. May I ask something in that connection? Your answer suggests something to me. You indicated having been disciplined yourself. What became of the men in the department who stood by the system and who held lesser rank?

Mr. ANSELL. They have all gone. The last one got his moving orders Saturday morning.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. No; I mean those who stood in with the system?

Mr. ANSELL. Stood in with the system?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. ANSELL. Pardon me. They have gone, too. They have gone higher up.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. They have received promotion?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And the man who did not stand with the system?

Mr. ANSELL. He has gone, too; down and out.

Senator LENROOT. Do I understand that those who concurred with the views of the department have been promoted, not in the usual order, but outside of the usual method of promotion?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; I will make this statement, that men who criticized this system, or who sympathized with those who did criticize it, have been subject to the department's gravest displeasure. They have been menaced and threatened and disciplined. And those who take the opposite view and support the system have prospered exceedingly; they have gone up and on. And unless we soon disrupt the system, I do not know how high they will go.

Senator LENROOT. I suppose the testimony of witnesses at the end of the record shows what disposition has been made of them?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; but, of course, there has not been much testimony on my side of the case, because you must have observed, when I was before you before, I never gave you the name of any man in uniform, because he was not free to testify, and if he had testified he would have been punished. I recall one of the most brilliant lawyers in this country, excepting none whom I know, Col. Morgan, now professor of law at Yale. I embarrassed him very much. I was making a little address before the Commercial Club in this city, and when I got through with it people began to talk about the court-martial system, because the country was interested then, and I happened to say, "Why do you not ask Col. Morgan about that," a friend of mine sitting over at another table. Morgan got up, and in about one minute stated his views about the court-martial system, not flattering the system, of course.

He was haled before the Judge Advocate General; he was accused of disloyalty to the Army and to the department and to the Judge Advocate General; he was charged with creating general embarrassment, with being a destructive agency, and a letter was read or shown to him requesting an investigation of his conduct by the Inspector General of the Army, preliminary to disciplinary action. They did not take the disciplinary action, but it was obvious that this excellent man was from then on persona non grata in the department. He was a lieutenant colonel, and other men were promoted over him when he was standing at the top by reason of ability and length of service. He was unquestionably at the top in point of ability.

He left here without having been promoted. Others who had no claims were promoted and are still being promoted.

I say those who criticize the system have all gone. They were not rewarded. The last one went yesterday or the day before. He got his orders to walk the plank.

If there was ever one institution in the world that really ought to be thoroughly investigated, in my judgment, it is the office of the Judge Advocate General of the Army. If I can speak impersonally, I think it is safe for me to say this, because I have given evidence of the fact that I am interested in this not personally. I can never profit, whatever you think of this system. I am a civilian, and so I always intend to be. But there are deep things at stake here. You have got to have justice in this Army or you will have no Army. You would have some difficulty in raising an Army now, by reason of the general dissatisfaction of the men with their treatment in the service, more difficulty than you did have when you raised this Army. Injustice reigns supreme in the bureau of military justice itself.

The man who has been the executive officer largely throughout this war was Col. Weeks, a distinguished officer, a colonel, a young man, a lawyer, a graduate of West Point, made executive officer because of his great organizing ability. That office was beautifully organized, not by me but by him. He is a most efficient man. It would have been difficult to run the establishment without him. He fitted into a niche where his absence could not have been well supplied. But he does not believe in the existing system. He disbelieves in it very much; and notwithstanding the fact that that man has had service in the field, as a judge advocate in China, and at the port of embarkation at Hoboken, a very difficult place and very difficult work, and organized this office and was running it smoothly, so smoothly that the papers got out of that office, although it was a law office, more quickly than they get out of any other office in the War Department, due to him and his service, he is now ordered to Charleston, an insignificant place, which, of course, will carry immediate reduction, because the rule is that you can have only the rank that is compatible with the place. He was not ordered in the usual way, as when the head of the office calls in an officer and says,

"Jones, we need an officer some other place, and I give you notice in order that you may arrange your own affairs here and get your family fixed and make the usual personal arrangements"; not that way; not the way of comity and courtesy that should characterize all such actions in such circumstances. No; they wrote out a memorandum for the Acting Judge Advocate General's signature, and they took it personally to the Chief of Staff, all unknown to this officer, and got the "O. K." of the Chief of Staff, and then took it to The Adjutant General and asked him to get out the order immediately, of which this man is all unaware until he gets the telegraphic order.

Now, when he goes to the Judge Advocate General and the Acting Judge Advocate General, they at first undertake to assert that the order is in due course, which, of course, was not true. He was not due for service outside of Washington. He has been here but briefly. He had just come from field service. There was no reason for his removal. They first said, "We are sending you there so that you can get experience on the outside," of which, as I say, he has just had far more than any other man in the department. Then they finally, probably inadvertently, gave the whole thing away. They said, "Well, Colonel, there have been two leaks in this office within the last 10 days, not 4 days apart, and you are too close to the newspaper man who put those leaks in the paper."

Now, what kind of treatment is that? The man said, "I have given out nothing"—as he had not, and as I know that he had not. He knew absolutely nothing about the two things. And yet, because of this arbitrary power and this man's independence and views—he is an officer whose heart is right and whose head is right, and who believes in making this establishment progressive and just—he is to be exiled. He wanted to go to West Point as professor of law, for which he is eminently qualified. No, his views are not right. A man can not be made professor of law at the United States Military Academy now unless he agrees with this system as it is.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You speak of your being disciplined. How? Do you mind telling how you were disciplined?

Mr. ANSELL. Personally, I care nothing about that; but it is illustrative of the depths to which our appreciations of justice have gone. I do not think of it as of any personal moment.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You are talking now just as you did before, when discipline was used.

Mr. ANSELL. Let us see what happened in that case. You may assume, because it is a fact, there was no officer in the Army more highly respected than I. I was young, vigorous, and active, and was thought very highly of by my fellow officers and by the department—by the present department including the Secretary. On the last day of January they paraded me along with several others.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. This year?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; this year; to give me this congressional badge of most distinguished service, reciting in the order my services in a very flattering way, and indicating that I have a far greater capacity than I have. But, nevertheless, this highest distinction in our service was pleasant, and a very beautiful tribute, and received as such on the last day of January.

On the 12th and 14th days of February I testified before your committee on that bill.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. May I ask you, just right there: You had never talked with the chairman of the committee or to any member of the committee, so far as I knew; and you were subpoenaed before the committee?

Mr. ANSELL. No, Senator; I had never talked to a member of Congress about this system. I must say that I had wanted to, but I did not; neither to Senator Chamberlain nor to anybody else. I was opposed to it; did not like it; would not have minded seeing an investigation; was really glad when Congress did start. But, nevertheless, I did not start it and had nothing to do with it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And at that time you had not discussed it in any way outside of the department?

Mr. ANSELL. Outside of the department?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. ANSELL. I think not, sir. Sometimes expressions may be dropped at a dinner or socially.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I mean in the newspapers?

Mr. ANSELL. No. The department knew where I stood, though.

On the 12th and 14th of February, two weeks after I received the distinguished-service medal, I testified before this committee. The orders were at that time that a man would not be reduced to his Regular Army grade from the National Army grade unless the position that he occupied was abolished or unless he proved incompetent for his place.

On the Saturday morning before the Congress adjourned on March 4 an order was issued demoting me, which was not published until the day after Congress adjourned—demoting me from the grade of brigadier general to the grade of lieutenant colonel, my Regular Army rank; and the newspapers are authority for the statement, and doubtless it is correct, made by the Secretary of War, that my demotion had absolutely nothing to do with my connection with the criticism of the existing system. He did say that.

I was demoted. I was given this distinguished-service medal only two weeks before I testified. I was demoted two weeks after I testified, and in violation of the order of the department that governed demotion. Surely, if I had been found incompetent, the only thing that I had done since I received this highest evidence of competency was to testify. My place was not abolished, because they sent clear to France and got another brigadier general to put in my place. Now, I would not have minded if the Secretary of War had said to the people of the country, "I do not like this man Ansell's attitude; I do not like his views, and he is embarrassing me, and he is embarrassing the administration. I wish he had done otherwise. I do not like his policies." If he had done that, of course, I would have had the utmost respect for that; but to say that I was demoted in due course without connection with this controversy, of course that is not acceptable. That is a statement of official fact that carries no conviction; nobody respects such.

But he said on another occasion that it was in line with the general demobilization of the Judge Advocate General's department; that there were to be no more promotions in that department. There have been more colonels made in that department since I was demoted than before.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Who had not been in the service over two years?

Mr. ANSELL. Oh, of course not. Lawyers who had been in the service but a year were promoted above me and put on the clemency board as my seniors, voicing the views of the Judge Advocate General and the Secretary of War, who held me out, however, over my protest, as the president of the clemency board in order that the public might get such assurance as it could out of the fact that I was there.

Senator LENROOT. Was the brigadier general who took your place a temporary one?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes. Of course, it took him away from his office that he understood and brought him to an office that he did not understand and does not understand yet. He knew nothing about it.

Now, aside from the personalities involved in this——

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I want to get it. I think the country ought to know it.

Senator LENROOT. I think so.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Not as affecting you, but as showing the methods of the War Department in this branch of the service; because it may develop later that there are other branches where the same treatment is accorded to efficient men.

Was there not, as a matter of fact, a further effort to discipline you, in the nature of investigation, or otherwise?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes. It is rather difficult to speak patiently about such pettiness.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I think the chairman would like to know about it, too.

Senator LENROOT. I would be very glad to have you state frankly the whole situation.

Mr. ANSELL. If such tyrannous conduct can never occur again, this information will not have been in vain. See what happened. They demoted me, took me from the head of the office to the very bottom, because that is where they placed me. The other chiefs and assistant chiefs of the division of course had temporary rank, although they were not regular officers. They were new men. They put me at the bottom. And yet, Mr. Chairman, I sat there and did exactly the duty which I had ever done, except signing my name, which was signed by another man; and yet, in spite of that, the Secretary of War and the Judge Advocate General of the Army and Prof. John H. Wigmore, after brief service made a colonel in the department, met. Did they take this attack, as they call it, as they ought to have taken it? The attitude of the Secretary of War, the guardian of the rights of every man in the Army, should have been one of inquiry into this thing. "What does it mean that this brigadier general, an officer of good standing, should go down there and testify before that committee as he has? What does it mean when Members of Congress and Senators, speaking from their positions in the Congress, make these statements here? What does it mean when there is this uncertainty in the country about the administration of military justice? What is my duty as the public official at the head of this great department?" Why, it naturally would occur to a faithful official to investigate. He should be alert to do so. Even if the complaint should be found to be not justified, it was his duty, so long as it carried the prima facies with it, to investigate.

No. They met, these three men, and they decided upon a plan of campaign to maintain and defend the existing system at all costs, and discredit the complaints and destroy the complainants.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Who were the men? You mentioned them a while ago.

Mr. ANSELL. They were Mr. Baker, Gen. Crowder, and Prof. Wigmore.

The first thing done publicly was a statement for the press, devoted largely to discrediting me. They did not deny what I said before your committee, except in certain personal respects, such as that I had not been relieved from supervision of military justice because of my views, though it was admitted that I had been relieved without assigned reasons. It was stated that I had been treated—my views—with every consideration. The statement went on. It suggested that I wanted to be Judge Advocate General of the Army, a thing which every friend of mine in the world knows that I have never wanted to be, although it would have been a legitimate ambition. It is generally known that I should have been out of the Army before this if it had not been for the war.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I will say in your behalf in that regard that you have expressed the desire that Gen. Crowder might be heard first; but you wanted to be heard and to say what you had to say before the committee.

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; I think I have been fair. But they said that by surreptitious methods I tried to get myself appointed Acting Judge Advocate General, the emphasis being on the surreptitiousness. The facts are that my regular assistant, a Regular Army officer, Col. White, came to me and said, "Ansell, you are exercising a lot of authority here and signing your name as 'Acting Judge Advocate General,' and you have no authority to do it." He pointed out section 1139 of the Revised Statutes, and I examined it, and I said, "I think you are right." On that very afternoon I called up Gen. Crowder over the telephone, but could not get him, and, inasmuch as I was leaving the office, I dropped him a note, not formal, and told him that this had been brought to my attention and that I could not be Acting Judge Advocate General in charge of the powers and policies of that office unless I was designated under the statute; that merely succeeding as the senior could not authorize me to do those things. When the next senior comes into a place temporarily, briefly, for a day or two while the senior is temporarily absent, he has nothing to do with policies. When you are going to hold on day in and day out and month in and month out you can not do it by virtue merely of seniority. Gen. Crowder, when he left the office, had told me that he did not want to come back to take charge. He was then Provost Marshal General, and he was liaison officer between the department and Congress, and he was war councillor—three fields, either one of which was probably a full-sized man's job. But when this was called to my attention I dropped him this note and said, "What do you think about it?" He wrote back saying, "I fully agree with you, and you present the case directly to the Secretary of War." He now puts the emphasis on the word "directly," and says because I did not present this case directly to the Secretary of War I am guilty of surreptitious conduct. Now, what was done, and all that was done, was for me to address a brief and simple memorandum to the Chief of Staff of the Army, who, under orders, is the channel for communication, just as I addressed everything except where the Secretary of War had personally taken up the matter with me or had personally directed otherwise because of his personal interest in it. The Chief of Staff is legally and de facto the alter ego of the Secretary of War, and to him we address all these communications.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. If you had done otherwise you would have violated the rule?

Mr. ANSELL. I would. I simply sought the views of the Judge Advocate General, and his response seemed to me to be reasonable and in line with what he had already said and done.

So I made this brief memorandum to the Secretary of War through the Chief of Staff, saying that I seemed to be charged with the policy and output of the office, and it seemed to me under the statute I should be designated as acting chief of the bureau by the President, in order that I might have this authority under the statute, as my senior assistant had suggested; and my final sentence was: "I am authorized to say that the Judge Advocate General of the Army concurs."

He comes back with what I think must be designated as a mere quibble. He says that he did not want me to be designated as Acting Judge Advocate General. He did not want to be dispossessed. He wanted to be Judge Advocate General and Provost Marshal General and war councillor and all of the other things; which I did not know. And I judged what he wanted by his language, and it was a full concurrence with my suggestion. I say that I never spoke to the Chief of Staff or any other human being, except in this communication, to have me designated as Acting Judge Advocate General; and yet he calls that surreptitious.

Now, they got together and published this document accusing me of wanting to succeed, and wanting to succeed by surreptitious methods, and gave it to the papers—the Associated Press and all of them—all timed for the usual Monday morning fulmination. It had been held there two or three days and sent out everywhere, with great headlines, about me. All of this was done by the Secretary of War, who invited it by writing a letter to Gen. Crowder as a vehicle upon which this letter of Gen. Crowder's could travel. The Secretary did not say, "Let us investigate what Ansell and Senator Chamberlain and members of the House and people over the country are saying." He did not say that. He said, "General, I know that the system is a good system. I am absolutely assured that it has not done injustice during the war, but my own personal assurance is not sufficient. I want you to make such a statement as you can make that will assure the people of the United States, who are anxious about their sons in the service; that no injustice has been done. We must repel this attack that has been made upon us and give the people assurance."

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That was his letter to Gen. Crowder?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; and he said, "Please make the statement immediately." And the statement was made immediately that the system was splendid; that it had virtues that few human institutions have; and then it devoted itself largely to destroying me for bringing to the public, as I have had to do, the situation. And then, not content with what they gave to the press, but in accordance with the plan, they published this 70-page document here, which was an elaboration of the statement that was given to the press, in itself a long one, written by Prof. Wigmore.

This conference between the Secretary, Gen. Crowder, and Col. Wigmore that I told you about established a propaganda bureau, in which Prof. Wigmore was the chief. There were several officers and 13 or 14 clerks assigned solely for this purpose, and the Government of the United States paid their salaries.

The bureau got out this very elaborate statement, which is devoted to encomiums upon the system, and then concludes, as the other did, by calling the attention of the public to my surreptitious conduct, adding here another gross example of "surreptition," which is this: that in the fall of 1918, after I had returned from France, I recommended that the revisory power that was being exercised by General Kreger, representing our office in France, should be increased and made more effective. I did, and there in that order, the draft of the order prepared by me, I made the ruling of the Acting Judge Advocate General for that force in France final over any commanding general unless the commanding general appealed to the Secretary of War, when of course the Secretary's decision upon a matter of law would be final; and they say that I was disloyal to the Secretary of War therein, because I knew that he had decided that the commanding general himself would be final. The Secretary of War had decided, apparently after much wobbling, that the commanding general himself would be final, but from time to time, in hard cases and as a result of my insistence, that had been broken down, and I thought the time was ripe to break it down entirely—I speak frankly—over there, a place far removed from the seat of Government in Washington, and where men could be hanged for rape, for instance, upon the testimony of the women of a race whose language we did not understand and whose customs we did not know; at any rate, far removed from the seat of government here, where the President and the Secretary of War might act. I said that the ruling of the Judge Advocate General upon questions of law would be final unless the commanding general besought the Secretary of War for reversal. They say that that was disloyal, and that it was gained by surreptition. There, again, I did no more than frankly and in so many words put in the draft of an order, and wrote a memorandum to support it and sent all to the Chief of Staff, openly and above board, as the regulations require, and heard no more of it until the order was published. If that is surreptition, it is surreptitious to do business in the War Department through its prescribed channels, and in the prescribed way, and that is all there is to it.

That lengthy pamphlet was gotten out. There were 90,000 copies of this pamphlet published and sent to all the lawyers, preachers, and other professional men as part of the propaganda to maintain this system and to discredit those who would attack it. I wish to say to you, Mr. Chairman, that the records of the cases cited will prove that the Secretary of War and the Judge Advocate General of the Army have resorted to methods which, if adopted by a man in his dealings with another man privately, would merit and receive the severest condemnation. The truth is not in that document, and the records will prove that the truth is not in that document. The cases that they cite here are not only not fairly handled, they are falsely and untruthfully presented here, all with the purpose that the Congress of the United States and the lawyers of the United States might be misled and deceived. It is a sordid story, in my judgment, doing this department of the Government little credit.

Senator LENROOT. What is the title of that pamphlet?

Mr. ANSELL. It is entitled "Military Justice During the War."

ESTABLISHMENT OF MILITARY JUSTICE—PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF THE ARTICLES OF WAR.

---

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 27, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to adjournment, in the room of the Committee on Appropriations in the Capitol, at 10 o'clock a. m., Senator Irvine L. Lenroot presiding.

Present: Senators Lenroot (acting chairman) and Chamberlain.

STATEMENT OF MR. SAMUEL T. ANSELL—Resumed.

Senator LENROOT. I think, Gen. Ansell, you were narrating your own discipline, or had you finished?

Mr. ANSELL. I was induced yesterday, if the committee please, to depart from what little plan I had and to go into the administration of this system, which, to tell you the truth, I had hardly intended to do at the beginning, although, in view of the attitude that the War Department has taken, namely, that the system is all right and that just the human agencies by which it is administered are largely responsible for any difficulty that there may be, it may be that the administration of the system is rather more important than I thought it was.

The system itself is a system that can not be administered properly. It permits, tolerates, invites maladministration. So I thought I would continue upon the actual administration of this system in the War Department until I got to the organization of the present clemency board, get through that as quickly as I can, and then assure the committee I would go back and discuss the substantive law and its deficiencies and the remedies proposed.

I say that yesterday I was induced to enter into a field of discussion which was really entirely too personal to myself to be agreeable, but which, nevertheless, I believe has its usefulness to the committee and to Congress, and will serve to reveal how a Secretary of War can be induced by an organized military bureaucracy to use the great power of his office to oppress, to destroy, any who would dare differ with that bureaucracy. That is the truth. That, to my mind, will show that justice itself has been outraged in her own temple, the Bureau of Justice, which is a part of the Department of the Judge Advocate General.

The appreciations of justice in the Army truly have never been lower than they are to-day. Most regrettably, they can hardly expect to improve and become higher as long as the bureau which is charged with the chief administration of justice takes the attitude and indulges in the practices that it does take and indulge in and has taken and indulged in during this war.

The Judge Advocate General's Department is no longer a place of certain and assured justice. All too frequently it is a department given over to base wrong and tyranny, and the oppression of the men and officers who serve in it, and of the Army at large.

I am going far enough into this question of administration to show, I think, that justice is jockeyed around in that department, and it has been degraded to serve the personal purposes of an imperious master, the Judge Advocate General himself. The Army may be small hereafter, and it may be the old type of Regular Establishment or it may be an Army drawn from the people, but justice is certainly a subject that does not grow smaller or less important merely because of the number of men who are affected by it. If justice in a general sense can be said to be the largest interest of man on earth, then I say that justice is the largest interest of the Army.

The gentlemen from the Army and the War Department will be here engaging, and properly engaging, the attention of this committee and of the Congress with plans and programs of reorganization, and of raising and supporting an Army; and yet it seems to me, antecedent to all of those, is this question of military justice, more important than the size of the Army and the kind of Army and the organization of the Army. It may be that I overestimate it; having seen it at too close a range, I may have lost something of perspective; but the assurances of an officialdom, though they mount to the skies, will be of no avail unless justice exists in the Army. Officialdom is the last to hear of or to appreciate or to take steps to remedy injustice. It is a system of which it is a part. Discovery of and reform of injustice usually must come from the outside, from those who are the subjects of the injustice, from their efforts, their relatives, and the interested public generally.

I believe I have talked to more enlisted men than any other man in the Army during and after this war, personally, and it is a matter of the greatest regret to me that I fail to observe any of the enthusiasm among our soldiery that you would naturally expect to possess them, returning, as they have returned, victoriously; and I have talked to men who have not suffered this injustice; I have talked to men who have not been up against it but who have only seen it or sensed it.

The enlisted men of the Army know the Army, are conscious of this subjective effect to orders, laws, and discipline better than anybody else. They always know, and the people will know through them, and they will sense it. And let such injustice go far enough, and we shall be permitted only to hope that hereafter the patriotism of our people will be sufficient to assure willing hands to take up our arms and not hold them listless. It is a subject worthy of the very deepest concern, no matter what personalities are involved or what political aspects it can have. I can not conceive that it has any. It ought not to have any.

It makes no difference about any personal controversies, so far as this system is concerned; but obviously, if one set of men are as insistent as I am that the system is wrong, and another set of men are equally insistent that it is very nearly perfect, there is bound to be some controversy.

In my communication addressed to the Secretary of War in reply to his and the Judge Advocate General's first defense of military justice [see Exhibit P], a reply which he declined to receive or permit to be published, though he published broadcast their own defense of the system, I said that the subject would never be composed until it was fairly composed, and I said to the Secretary of War what I say now, a fact which he does not seem to appreciate, that it is absolutely impossible for an official, however high, who has committed himself at once and immediately to a strong and strenuous defense of this system without investigation, who has arrayed himself with the solid phalanx of the Army—principally of the Regular Army—in support of this system, to initiate or conduct an investigation that can be fair, and that people will regard as fair.

I said to him, with such respect as the statement could carry in addressing the Secretary of War, that there ought to be an investigation of this subject and of his own part in it. He had appointed the Inspector General, the most reactionary of men—the ultra-militaristic type by virtue of his position, if nothing else, but he is so personally—to investigate the subject of military justice and my connection with it, and my testimony before the Senate committee, of which Senator Chamberlain was then the chairman, and I was called upon to come before the very man whom, in the brief the points of which I read to this subcommittee yesterday, I labeled as prejudiced and reactionary. I showed what his influence had been to maintain this system. I had to handle him as he ought to have been handled, having taken the stand that he had taken. That officer was the officer designated by the Secretary of War to conduct an investigation into the administration of military justice, my part in it and my testimony before the Senate Military Committee. The Secretary does not seem to perceive that, having committed himself, he has committed the entire department. Surely he would not sit in judgment upon a matter in which he had taken such a strong stand.

See how that investigation came along. First, after I had filed my opinion insisting upon subjecting courts-martial to legal regulation, in November, 1917, the Judge Advocate of the Army came back, took charge, relieved me from all connection with military justice, except, of course, when he was away for any period somebody had to act, and I acted; but I mean to say that I was relieved of all authority over that while he was there. While he was there I had nothing to do with it, though all the rest of the department I did have to do with, notwithstanding my great interest in this very subject. All this matter was handled by the Judge Advocate General, a senior assistant of his, a man without experience in the Judge Advocate General's department, in the administration of military justice, and the Secretary of War. At no time was I consulted except as, out of a sense of duty, I went to the authorities.

Then, in the springtime, when it was perfectly obvious that our department was not familiar with the emergency legislation of the nations with which we were associated, and especially not familiar with whatever those nations had done in the improvement of military justice and its administration, I asked to be sent to Europe and to be equipped in such a way that I could make this investigation. I was sent to Europe. A single officer to assist me was denied me. I was given a clerk. And after the greatest exertion for between three and four months I returned to this country with a report, not only on the emergency legislation and its administration, but on military justice in those nations with which we were associated; which report never got beyond the Judge Advocate General of the Army.

Recently, however, in January, after this all came to the public, the War Department designates a perfectly inexperienced man who six months before had come from civil life and had manifested no particular quality for the place, unless it be his staunch adherence to the Judge Advocate General and his views, and sent him to Europe with a large staff and much money to make this second somewhat belated investigation; and I understand he is about to return or has returned.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you object to giving the name of that officer?

Mr. ANSELL. Maj. Rigby.

Senator LENROOT. With reference to this report, which you say never got beyond the Judge Advocate General, it has never been made public?

Mr. ANSELL. It has, now. I have read it into the record; and I will insert that report, with the permission of the committee, right here. The department has to be compelled to do what it does.

ANSELL EXHIBIT "Q."

EXTRACTS FROM GEN. ANSELL'S REPORT UPON MILITARY ADMINISTRATION IN EUROPE.

FRANCE.

The under secretary of state for military justice.

(a) Corresponds to but has broader functions than our own bureau.—This under secretariat in the French ministry of war, while corresponding to our own bureau, is given a far more prominent place in the establishment than is our department. Shortly after the beginning of war it was raised from the rank of direction to its present status, where it has contact with Parliament concerning its own affairs and an independence of administration unknown to us. While corresponding absolutely to our own department, as far as our department goes, it performs very much broader duties in three respects.

(1) It makes all inspections necessary to acquaint itself with the condition of the administration of military justice in the army and all inspections preparatory to the most important courts-martial and civil litigation.

(2) It conducts before all the tribunals all litigation in which the ministry and the military establishment may be interested.

(3) It is charged with the general inspection and direction of prisoners of war.

It is abundantly equipped for all these functions.

(b) Methods of maintaining discipline in French Army sharply distinguishable from our own in several respects:

(1) There is but one kind of court-martial.—It corresponds to our general court. There seems to be no need of any of the inferior courts because of the established system of disciplinary punishments for all minor offenses. The French tried an inferior court, only to abandon it. Special courts of inferior jurisdiction were provided for by the decree of September 6, 1914, but they were found unsatisfactory, were abandoned in practice, and finally actually prohibited by the law of April 27, 1918. I was advised that they were opposed principally because it was thought they were the alternate whereby commanders would neglect their duty to impose summary disciplinary punishments, and also because courts-martial might become too frequent.

(2) *The system of summary disciplinary punishment (mentioned above).—*This system is an established, tried, and tested agency of French Discipline. No French officer can be found who disputes its efficacy. It is contended that, properly supervised as it is, (1) it results in effective discipline without the least injustice; (2) develops the proper sense of responsibility of command in all officers and corresponding respect for them upon the part of those commanded; and (3) obviates the great loss of time and energy consumed in courts-martial, leaving officers and members of the command free for their purely military duties. This system of discipline is regulated elaborately and in detail by the decree of May 25, 1910. There is no appeal to the courts. It applies to officers as well as to enlisted men. ¶

There is one feature of the punishments authorized worthy of remark. Corporal punishment, bodily indignity, or public disgrace is not permitted. The appeal seems to be to the pride and dignity, rather than to the sense of shame. The system carries with it a very wise concurrence of authority and responsibility. Every man must judge as he would be judged. The kind of field punishments habitually indulged in in the British Army have no place with the French. Considering the moral quality of our soldiery, as I have seen it evidenced here, it is my view that we could safely apply the basic principles of the French rather than English discipline.

(3) There is a far more thorough investigation prior to courts-martial than there is with us.—This is made by competent lawyers. Complaint of conduct that would subject the offender to court-martial having been made to the convening authority, or charges having been preferred to him, the whole matter, including all the papers, is turned over to a "rapporteur," who is an officer of the bureau of military justice assigned to duty with the command. He makes a thorough investigation and performs all the duties of the juge d'instruction in the civil system, except that he himself does not finally decide whether the accused shall be subjected to court-martial or not. Upon that question he makes a report, with recommendations, to the convening authority. The convening authority may disagree with the "rapporteur," but in practice he seldom does. If it is decided to proceed to trial, the record of the case as it is made up is submitted to a "commissaire du gouvernement," who is also a lawyer appointed by the minister of war, who sits at the trial and represents both the Government and the accused in a sense unknown to us; that is, while he endeavors to see that the Government's case is presented, he is no more a prosecutor for the Government than he is counsel for the accused. He is there to see that justice is done between the State and the accused. This official is described as "a public minister representing justice." He should be at least of the grade of the accused. He is always a lawyer and is usually a man of considerable or even great distinction at the bar. He takes no part in the deliberations of the court. However, the court relies upon him for advice during the trial and may, and frequently does, consult with him during its deliberations, but this must be done in the presence of all parties.

If the papers upon coming to the hands of the "commissaire du gouvernement" are defective in stating a legal case, he amends them; if, for any reason they are fatally defective, he quashes them; and if during the trial he should become convinced of the deficiency of the proceeding as a matter of law, he so signifies to the court; in such a case his view is controlling. Even upon the facts the formal expression of his view that the State ought not to prevail is sufficient to work an acquittal or dismissal.

In time of war the two legal functionaries described above are united in a single person—"le commissaire-rapporteur."

(c) Judgments of courts-martial are subject to an independent revisory power—

(1) The Court of Cassation has, or until recently had, jurisdiction in time of peace over the judgments of courts-martial only under exceptional circumstances in the case of persons generally subject to military law, but civilians tried by court-martial for State offenses may always in time of peace have their cases reviewed by that court.

(2) A Court of Revision sits in time of peace and war for the Army. The court originally consisted of two civilian magistrates of the court of appeals and three officers of the Army. I am advised at the department that not long before war broke out there was a change in the situation by decree that permitted an appeal to the Court of Cassation in place of the Court of Revision, and I am advised that in time of peace the Court of Revision had been largely, if not entirely, superseded by that court. In time of war the Court of Revision consists of five officers of proper rank, sitting at the headquarters of the Army or at each Army, as may be necessary.

In time of war there is no appeal to the court of cassation by military persons, and the Government may also, by decree, control appeals in time of war to courts of revision. In August, 1914, all appeals to the court of revision were suppressed. June 8, 1914, revision was reestablished for all judgments of death. On June 8, revision was suppressed again for death sentences imposed for passing or inducing one to pass to the enemy or to rebel armies and for revolt; but, as to these offenses, it was reestablished by the decree of July 12, 1917. By the decree of February 28, 1918, revision was reestablished for judgments of condemnation to hard labor for life and for deportation. The present situation is, then, that there maybe revision of judgments in the following cases: (1) Death penalties, (2) hard labor for life, (3) deportation.

By telegram of April 20, 1917, it was ordered that no capital case, whether it had been revised and rejected, or not revised at all, should be executed until the record had been submitted to the decision of the President. In all these cases the under-secretary of state for military justice submits the record, with his review and recommendation, to the President of the Republic or to the minister of war directly, without the intervention of other authority. By decree of June 12, 1917, the above provision requiring submission of death sentences to the President was temporarily abrogated in certain cases, but by note of July 17, 1917, the rule prescribed by the telegram of the 20th of April, 1917, was reestablished in all respects. The present law, therefore, is that no capital sentence can be executed without the approving decision of the President of the Republic.

I am also advised that cases carrying military degradation of an officer or soldier, dismissal of an officer, or the dishonorable discharge of a soldier are, by reason of the fact that the President is the pardoning power, usually submitted to the department by the general in chief of the Army on his own motion.

Courts of revision do not retry the facts. They will annul the judgment of courts-martial, and in a proper case order a new trial, only in the following cases:

- (1) When the court was not lawfully composed.
- (2) When it has violated the rules of its jurisdiction.
- (3) When the penalty pronounced by the law has not been applied to the facts found to exist, or when a penalty has been awarded not known to the law.
- (4) When there has been a violation or omission of forms prescribed to be observed under pain of nullity.
- (5) When the court has failed to comply with the request of the accused or the "commissaire du gouvernement" to make use of a faculty or right provided him by law.

(d) An elaborate system of suspension of sentences.—Except in the most heinous cases, all sentences that would deprive the Army of a man's military service are suspended for the period of the war. There is also an elaborate system whereby an offender may be completely rehabilitated. Commendation in orders will work a complete rehabilitation. Men are not lost to the Army. They serve either in prison works or in the chasseurs d'Afrique in France. Military service thus rendered is penal but is not beyond the realm of rehabilitation. All military persons are amenable to courts-martial exclusively for all violations of law, including the common law of the land, except certain offenses against the fishery and forest laws, in which civil courts have jurisdiction.

Bureau of Military Justice.

The personnel of the Bureau of Military Justice, presided over by a lieutenant general, is purely military. The ranking officers of the department are all eminent lawyers. The system of court-martial procedure is in general respects very similar to the French.

(a) Distinctive features; A court of revision of all judgments of courts-martial.—The system embraces this distinguishing feature: In accordance with law, the King, by a decree dated the 20th of July, 1917, instituted a supreme council of revision. Its rules of procedure were promulgated on the 12th of August following. The council was originally composed of one of the generals commanding a section of military justice, who is its president; of the military advocate general of the vice military advocate general; of the colonel attached to the section of justice, of a councillor of the court of appeals, designated by the Minister of Grace and Justice, and an official known as a chief reviewer, chosen by the supreme commander from among the officers of the army who are qualified lawyers. As first established, it had jurisdiction to revise all sentences involving a penalty greater than seven years' imprisonment in all cases where there was not already legal recourse to the supreme tribunal of war and marine. (This latter tribunal has jurisdiction only in exceptional cases.)

In April of the present year this court of revision was reconstructed and enlarged, with a larger number of councillors of the court of appeals, and with jurisdiction to revise all serious penalties. The decree constituting the council expressly provides that the examination in revision will not suspend the execution of sentence. I was advised, however, that upon application, either by the accused or the department of military justice, a stay of sentence could be obtained in a proper case. The jurisdiction of the supreme council of revision is final, except in certain special cases. The records are first presented to the bureau of military justice and by that bureau transmitted for revision. (Concerning this court, see appendix "D" and rough translation.)

THE OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL.

(1) History and place in the Government.—Originally, before the appointment of the commander in chief in 1793, the Judge Advocate General acted as secretary and legal adviser to a board of general officers by the aid of which the government of the army was carried out by the Crown; and it was apparently to discharge the duty of defending the board and the action of the military authorities taken under his advice to this board that the presence of the Judge Advocate General in the House of Commons was needed. When the board was abolished, on the appointment of the commander in chief, the Judge Advocate General continued to be the legal adviser to that official, and though at times, up until 1805, he was not a member of Parliament nor a privy councillor, yet, nevertheless, in the absence of a responsible minister he acted as such and remitted capital punishment and dismissed officers in the name of His Majesty. In order to bring this Crown functionary under parliamentary control, the office of the Judge Advocate General was in 1806 made a political one, the holder became a privy councillor, a minister of the Crown. He had the duty of advising the Sovereign upon all matters coming within the scope of his office and was liable like any other minister to be called to account in Parliament for any act done in the exercise of his official function. From this time until 1851 the Judge Advocate General assumed to act judicially and his decisions were expressed as pointing out the nature of the defects in such language as, "I have the honor to inform you that the conviction can not be legally sustained or enforced," or that the "proceedings are invalid" and recommending or suggesting that "the prisoner be released and the entry of the conviction erased;" or, "that the commanding officer be informed that the finding amounted to an acquittal and should be so recorded in the usual form of 'not guilty.'" In a brief memorandum filed with me by the present Judge Advocate General (Judge Cassel<sup>1</sup>) it is said:

"In the late sixties, however, the form used more frequently took the shape of a direction such as 'Under the circumstances the proceedings are quashed.' 'I have to request that you will cause the prisoner to be released and the record of the conviction erased.'"

(2) His place as sole legal adviser to the political head of the Department.—In 1875 a case was submitted to the law officers, Sir John Coleridge and Sir John Jessel, who in effect gave it as their opinion that it was the function of the Judge Advocate General to give advice and not to pronounce judgment, and that in constitutional theory "his opinion is not binding, although, no doubt, in practice it is not usual to disregard it." However, this was not followed by the succeeding Judge Advocates General. Judge Osborne Morgan in a minute to the secretary of state in 1880, when he was Judge Advocate General, while accepting in a sense the opinion of the law officers as a theoretical legal definition, nevertheless adopted as the constitutional basis of his office the definition set forth in a minute of his predecessor, Judge Ayrton, under date of the 17th of February, 1874, and held that the Judge Advocate General "was constitutionally as well as morally responsible for the legality of sentences of courts-martial." During all this time the office was a political office of a ministerial character, its holder having a seat in and responsible to Parliament. So it remained until 1873, from which date until 1905 there was an interim in which the office was held by the president of the Probate Divorce and Admiralty Division. In 1906 a further change was made and the present system initiated. The Judge Advocate General became a permanent official, debarred like other civil servants from sitting in Parliament, and with direct responsibility to the Secretary of State for War. To quote from the present Judge Advocate General—

"The result is that the responsibility of advising the Crown as to the exercise of the prerogative as respects the sentence of courts-martial is transferred to the secretary of state, and the functions of the Judge Advocate General are to advise the secretary of state as to the advice he shall tender to His Majesty. The secretary of state is at liberty to disregard the advice tendered to him by the Judge Advocate General, but he will rarely, if ever, take the responsibility of disregarding the advice of that official on legal matters."

The law officers of the Government are all agreed that while the office of the Judge Advocate General is theoretically advisory to the secretary of state the disregard of that advice would be so unusual and would be considered so serious a matter that it could not go far without challenging parliamentary correction. It is understood that in a case of exceptional importance the Secretary of State for War may refer the opinion of the Judge Advocate General to the attorney general and the solicitor general and may have their advice upon the question in dispute. This course has rarely been adopted, and I am advised there has been but one reference to those law officers within the last three decades. The reorganization of the office that has taken place within the last 150 years has resulted in placing a responsible minister at the head of the War Department, who stands between the Sovereign and Parliament, and to whom, rather than to the Sovereign, the Judge Advocate General of England reports directly. His opinions are subject to no military supervision or to any other kind, except in the rare instance when his decision may be submitted for the review of the attorney general.

(3) He is independent of all military supervision and control.—His sole superior is the political head of the department, namely, the Secretary of State for War, who is responsible immediately to Parliament. The office was originated in necessity as an independent check on military authority. It was established more than 200 years ago, primarily to correct abuses of courts-martial and the exercise of military authority. Court-martial sentences at that time were notorious for their disregard of the fundamental principles of justice of the law of the land. It is fundamentally inherent, therefore, in the establishment of this office that this official shall be amenable to no military authority whatever, but solely to the political departments of government. His appointment by the Sovereign, his authority as defined in the patent of office, his civilian status, he being no part of the military establishment, with life tenure and retirement, all establish his independence of military authority in the performance of the functions of his office. All this nobody in or out of the army disputes and none can be found to question its wisdom. His opinion in matters pertaining to his official function being subject to no military scrutiny or control, he is the final legal authority on the administration of military justice.

(4) The several deputies judge advocate general.—The judge advocate general has a deputy judge advocate general in each of the overseas forces; that is, in France, India, Mesopotamia, Macedonia, Egypt, Cyprus, and with the various other expeditionary forces of England. This official, while representing the authority of the judge advocate general is also upon the staff of the commander in chief of the force. There, as at the war office, rarely or never are the opinions of the deputy judge advocate general disregarded. If the commander in chief feels that he must differ with the deputy judge advocate general, the question is submitted directly to the judge advocate general himself. The opinion of the responsible law officer is accepted without question by the army. The attitude of the army is one of respect for his authority. This administrative principle has a profound influence upon administrative action. A convening or confirming authority, or any other military authority charged with an independent responsibility, may, and with the utmost freedom in practice does, submit to the judge advocate general or his deputy any question arising in due course of administration, and his opinion is regarded as authoritative by the army and by the department, and will serve as a military justification for the action by that official.

Under the secretary of state for war, alone, the judge advocate general of England is the head of the administration of military justice.

(1) Thorough preliminary investigation prior to resort to court-martial.—What is universally pronounced as one great element of strength in the British system is to be found in the thorough preliminary investigation required to be made to determine whether the accused shall be subject to court-martial. After the officer prefers a complaint the commanding officer (usually the regimental commander) conducts a preliminary hearing, at which the accused is present. The witnesses against him are called and examined under oath and cross-examined by the accused. The accused then presents his own witnesses. Upon the evidence thus taken the commanding officer decides whether to dismiss the charge altogether, or whether to resort to his power of summary punishment, or whether to forward the charges to the convening authority for trial. In case he decides to resort to summary punishment, if the offense involves one of the larger summary punishments authorized by the statute, the man must be asked if he submits to the commanding officer's jurisdiction or whether he would prefer court-martial. A well-advised man usually submits to the summary discipline. If he takes a court-martial, or if the commanding officer decides to forward the charges to the convening authority, the substance of what each witness testified to is settled in a conference between the commanding officer or his adjutant and the accused, and upon disagreement the witnesses must be recalled. All this testimony is forwarded to the convening authority, where the judge advocate looks over both the charges and the substance of the testimony and decides whether there shall be a trial or not. If he finds incompetent testimony he indicates his ruling to that effect upon the testimony sheet, or if it appears that an offense has been committed for the proof of which evidence exists but has not been included in the evidence sheet, then the file is returned to the commanding officer for further investigation and again the man has the right to be present and examine the witnesses. At any time before final disposition by the commanding officer he has the right to administer his own punishment or dismiss the charges. All papers, including the evidence sheet, are sent to the president of the court, who must be guided by the rulings of the law officer as to what is relevant and what is not. This testimony sheet also serves as a check upon the testimony of witnesses.

(3) The different kinds of courts-martial in practice.—Courts-martial authorized in the British system are (1) the ordinary general court-martial, (2) the field general, (3) the district court, and (4) the regimental court. Where it is impracticable to maintain the ordinary general court-martial, the field general may be resorted to; and it has been held impracticable to maintain the ordinary general court-martial in France and other fields of service for enlisted men. Officers, however, are almost invariably tried by ordinary general court-martial. The distinguishing theory is that trials of officers are so few as to be within the range of practicability. So, in France and all active fields of service there are (1) the ordinary general court for officers and (2) the field general for enlisted men. At home there are (1) the ordinary general court for everybody and (2) the district court for enlisted men and the regimental court. The last-named court is obsolete by reason of the summary punishing power, and the district court is infrequently resorted to.

(4) General and field general courts-martial are provided with law officers, who control the court upon questions of law.—The ordinary general courts-martial are provided with a judge advocate warranted by the judge advocate general or deputy judge advocate general. The English judge advocate is not, as with us, a prosecutor, but a law officer whose opinion may be taken by the prosecutor (counsel for the government) by counsel for the accused and by the court. He may, and frequently does, give his opinion to the court without their request, and would do so if he believed the court needed it or was about to err. When the evidence is all in he sums up and instructs the court upon the law in very much the same manner as a judge instructs a jury. The judge advocate is usually an eminent barrister who has had experience on the criminal bench.

The field general court is not provided with a judge advocate by law, but it is now the established practice to detail with each field general a member who is especially qualified in the law and who has all the qualifications of the judge advocate just mentioned. Out of deference to the line he is seldom or never made the president of the court, but, on the other hand, neither is he the junior member. While theoretically he has no more power than any other member of the court, under the British system he may spread his own views upon the record and may, indeed, report specially to the deputy judge advocate general any errors committed by the court on the trial.

(5) Some weaknesses of present system.—The present British system is weak. the law authorities find, in the following respects:

(a) The law does not provide for having a judge advocate on every field general. This difficulty has been obviated largely, as just said, by detailing as "law member" an officer who is an eminent barrister and of experience in the administration of criminal law, specially selected for the purpose of controlling the court in matters of law. The present judge advocate general strongly recommends the supplying of every court-martial, except the summary court, with a legal member, and would recommend it immediately to Parliament were it opportune to do so.

(b) This law member should have a controlling power in matters of law. As just explained, he does have that power in fact, but only at the expense of transcending legal theory.

(c) In cases of death sentences the law does not, as it should, provide for a stay of execution until review by the judge advocate general. Inasmuch, however, as death sentences can in no case be confirmed by any authority below the commander in chief, the confirming authority always has the approving view of the deputy judge advocate general. Then, too, as a matter of fact, the deputy judge advocate general will take no risk of future disagreement with his chief post executionem, and, except in the plainest case of a death sentence, he would ask for the judge advocate general's review before sentence is executed.

(d) There should be a legal stay of execution for another reason: In order that the accused may request pardon. While every convening and confirming authority has the authority at any stage in the proceedings to ask for the opinion of the judge advocate general, an authority which is very frequently availed of, there is no express authority for staying the sentence or establishing an interval between the awarding of the sentence and its execution in order that the pardoning power may be sought. The recent Army act, however, with this in view, requires the president in all sentences of death to announce the verdict upon conviction, in order that the accused man may pursue his usual remedies or ask pardon.

(e) In the matter of settling charges there is an inconsistent relation in that charges are both settled before trial and ultimately passed upon in review after trial by the same legal authority. The present judge advocate general has so organized his office into divisions that the division that settles the charges never reviews the proceedings. In fact, so independent will he keep them that he himself, since he may be called upon to review a case, never personally settles the charges. All such matters, indeed all preliminary matters of this character touching prima facie legality, are attended to by a division which acts independently of the judge advocate general and takes action in the name of its own chief. If it were convenient at the present time to do so, the present judge advocate general would propose the statutory establishment of this independence.

(f) No reason is known for the illogical position that inasmuch as an acquittal is required to be announced in the British system immediately to the accused, all convictions should not be announced also.

(6) Judge Advocate General as reviewing authority.—The judge advocate general reviews all cases, even those that have been reviewed by the several deputy judge advocates general in the various Expeditionary Forces, though those passed by a deputy are not scanned with such great care. The number of cases now being reviewed are about 1,100 per week, and he tries to keep the work up to date. A case received to-day should be taken up by an examiner to-morrow and passed without delay. He is guided in his power of review by the rules, vague as they are, established by the criminal appeals act as grounds of reversal or quashal. The scintilla of evidence theory has long been abandoned in England, and because of the vagueness of the rules established in the criminal appeals act, the appellate courts have very properly reserved to themselves the right to say what shall constitute grounds of reversal and quashal, keeping in view, of course, so far as sufficiency of proof is concerned, the established common-sense rule in deference to those who have heard the witnesses testify. He not infrequently reverses, however, for insufficiency of proof, and uses the formula found in the criminal appeals act, that is, "There is not a reasonable sufficiency of evidence" or when "a substantial injustice has on the whole case been done the accused."

a. The Judge Advocate General of England has never limited himself to jurisdictional deficiencies in quashing proceedings; he will quash for other reversible error.

b. Practical steps in quashing.—When he decides to quash proceedings he makes what he calls a "minute" of the deficiencies without going so much into detail as we do. In several of the cases I noted he simply said, in a nut-shell statement of the reason for his conclusion, "I find that the charge alleges no offense known to the law;" or "that the only evidence adduced for the Government was incompetent;" or that "the evidence is not reasonably sufficient;" or "the accused was denied the substantial right of counsel and witnesses for his defense;" and that "for this reason the sentence should be quashed," or sometimes, "must be quashed." With but little more, this minute is addressed to the "S. of S." (that is, the Secretary of State for War) who returns the minute initialed. The minute is transmitted by the Army Council to the proper commander with a direction from the Army Council to see that the necessary notation is entered on the record of the accused and that all steps be taken to restore him to his former status.

Even in cases of quashing for defect of jurisdiction he seldom recommends another trial, as he leans decidedly against a second trial in such cases, though in particularly aggravated cases, where obviously the accused should not go unpunished, he does, of course, recommend trial.

S. T. ANSELL.

Returning from Europe, I found Gen. Crowder away more and more, the control that he exercised when he came back to relieve me from administration of military justice in the fall before became very much relaxed, and I assumed more and more of it. I found that during my absence what I had told Gen. Crowder would happen had happened in regard to General Order No. 7, which I have referred to before as an administrative palliative enabling the department to make a study of these death sentences before they were executed. I found that the officer who had been engaged in this during my absence, a very able officer, indeed—I do not know whether he agrees with me on this subject or not, but an able lawyer and officer—had held, as I say, what I had pointed out to Gen. Crowder as a matter of law would have to be held with reference to General Order No. 7, that we were expressly limited by General Order No. 7—I mean the Office of the Judge Advocate General was limited—to the study or the review of pure questions of law; not passing on them—do not get that idea—but studying on them in order that we might advise with the commanding general below, and thus endeavor to keep him straight, if he saw fit to accept our advice. But the duties of the Judge Advocate General were so defined there, I said, that we would be limited, in the administration of military justice, to what was set out in that order, and that we would be denied the power, which I deemed to be a very necessary one, in the administration of justice, to recommend clemency to the President of the United States in all cases. So it had been held while I was away that this order acted as a limitation to that effect, and there had been no recommendation for clemency consequent upon these reviews and studies we made since the time of the publication of General Order No. 7 until after I got back.

Senator LENROOT. What had been done with respect to them?

Mr. ANSELL. They just made the review upon the technical questions of law, and sent the study or review to the commanding general.

But you see, regardless of what he might do, Senators, the man who studies this case and this record is in an excellent position to advise the President as to whether clemency ought to be granted or not, regardless of what the legal solution may be.

When I got back I took the bull by the horns, because it was nothing less than that, and I reversed what the acting Judge Advocate General had in my absence very properly, as a matter of law, held to be the limitations placed upon our office to recommend clemency, and instructed the boards to review and recommend clemency in proper cases.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. To recommend to the President?

Mr. ANSELL. To the President, or to a subordinate commander. I wish to say here that when we began to recommend this clemency to these commanding generals below, it had to be done with a delicacy that does not speak well for justice. They are men of power, supported by the War Department, and they wanted no interference from a mere lawyer, and frequently we got very sharp retorts from them to the effect, "You had better mind your own business; we know what this requires."

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. They were superior in rank to the men who made the recommendations.

Mr. ANSELL. Yes. They are major generals, and at best the head of my office was only a brigadier. But I mention this to show you that by reason of this palliative, notwithstanding the fact that it would be thus interpreted, and the drafter of the order, the Judge Advocate General, had been advised that the order would be thus interpreted as a limitation upon our power inhibiting us to make this recommendation to clemency, it was not changed. It stayed there and operated as an limitation, and it was not changed until I got back here, and as I say, in violation of the proper rules in the construction of an order or a statute, I deliberately changed it, in the interest of justice. The departmental line-up was against the granting of clemency even then, and it has been worse since, notwithstanding that it has been published to the community at large that the special clemency board has been given a free hand to recommend and carry through clemency, a matter which I will take up in a moment.

Senator LENROOT. How did this board come to be designated as a clemency board, if they had no power to make recommendations?

Mr. ANSELL. This clemency board, if the Senator please, was not organized at this time. This board of review was a board of review created by me for the purpose of reviewing, for matters of law, the proceedings of courts-martial, limiting themselves to questions of law; and then when I got back I issued an office order enlarging their jurisdiction so that they could include a recommendation for clemency. That is, they would send one of those studies back to the commanding general, and they might say, "As a matter of pure law, the proceedings are regular, valid. Nevertheless, for these reasons, we think you ought to grant clemency." That was not by the clemency board, you see, Senators. The clemency board came into existence later.

Now, it is true there had always been in the office of the Judge Advocate General an officer who, among other things, passed upon applications for clemency, for remission of penalties, made by our prisoners in the old Regular Army, itself. Prisoners could make these applications every six months. Applications were treated, as a rule, rather perfunctorily. The regulations of the War Department were such as to repress these applications. The entire office had only four or five officers in it, and was not well organized; but in former times there was one officer there whose duty it was to look over the men's applications for clemency; the regular routine performance. There was no officer there and no organization in the Judge Advocate General's Department designed to recommend clemency at the very moment of reviewing the case in the first instance, you see, Senators. So I enlarged this jurisdiction of the board of review for that purpose, notwithstanding the fact that, as I say, General Order No. 7 prohibited it.

Now, we worked along. We were imposed upon by the power of military command, and I assure you nobody in the world knows it better than I. I was at the point of contact between the power of military command and the law; not the gentlemen in my office, but I. I was the official who was answerable to the Chief of Staff and other officers exercising military command. They had it out with me. The Army did not know about it; of course not. I have some very vivid recollections of what took place, and I will assure you that a lawyer's case, or a soldier's, if he wants to call my place a soldier's place, was a very uncomfortable one, if you were actuated by an ordinary sense of your duty and a desire to do justice when up against this all-powerful power of military command.

But after the armistice the Judge Advocate General returned again to the office and more largely assumed the reins, and the first thing that the Judge Advocate General of the Army did again was to relieve me from all contact with and supervision of military justice. The truth of the matter is, of course, that he and the department did not like my liberal views. They will not say it, but their conduct speaks far louder than any words.

I was relieved when he came back the first time, of course, with the knowledge of the Secretary of War, if not at his suggestion. I was relieved again, the first thing, when he came back the second time. I was kept in charge of contracts and all other legal matters of the War Department except the one in which I was most interested—military justice. I do not say I was the most competent; I say that I was the most interested in this human thing that I started out very interested in, and that I am interested in it yet.

After the armistice the punishments got worse than before the armistice.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You mean the sentences or the punishments?

Mr. ANSELL. The punishments and the sentences. Why, there seemed to be a contagion all over the Army of these terrible punishments, stimulated perhaps by the fact that after the fighting there was a let down, I suppose. Men go away without leave more frequently then. I do not mean to say that there is any great increase of vicious conduct; that is not so; but there is less observance of these thousand and one military exactions after an armistice, as we may appreciate.

Senator LENROOT. You mean the morale is lowered?

Mr. ANSELL. The morale of that particular type; not morale of any substantial type, I think, Senator. That is, there was no more felonious conduct then. There were no more gross breaches of the military obligation then. There was more absence without leave, more going without pass, and probably there may have been some let down in dress—I have seen that—and to that extent a lowering of morale.

Observing this increasing harshness, from the cases that passed over my desk, I began to send to the chiefs of division and have them present to me the cases from the various camps here in the United States. I observed that the curve went away up on arbitrary punishment; and on a certain day, which was the Thursday before the 11th day of January, I got the cases from Camp Dix, commanded by a major general of the Regular Army who had been Chief of Staff who had been honored by the commander in chief with every gift that can come to an officer of the Army; an old officer with great experience; and those punishments, those proceedings, approved by him, were so shocking not only to me but to gentlemen of the office, one particularly, the Chief of the Division of Military Justice, an old-time Regular Army officer, who believes in the rough-and-ready type of justice, and who disagrees, therefore, with me—that I knew something had to be done, and I had to start in again; an unpleasant task.

I went to the Judge Advocate General of the Army. I told him about this, and in the earlier conversation I got the impression that he concurred with me; but later in the afternoon of the same day he sent for me and told me that my views apparently were looking to general clemency, and I said that was true; I was convinced that something had to be done, first to restrain the aggravated tendency to severer punishments and also to investigate all of our punishments during the war. He said that he was at first impressed with my suggestion, but it would be, he feared, an impeachment of the military judicial machinery, and that he was reluctant to take action.

Finding myself, three days after that, in charge of the office——

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. When was this?

Mr. ANSELL. This was on the 11th of January last. Finding myself in charge of the office and observing that very morning further and impelling evidence of what was happening in the field, and being in charge of that office by reason of the fact that the general was away,

I addressed a memorandum to the Secretary of War calling his attention to the situation, and I put a copy of it, of course, on the Judge Advocate General's desk. Of course, I shall be accused of having taken advantage of the absence of the Judge Advocate General in doing this, but I am not concerned with the accusation. I did, in a sense, take advantage of it, because the thing had to be brought to somebody's attention, and I had not succeeded. But exigent action was needed, because there was evidence that very morning of orders that had been published by two commanding generals in this country to the effect that all absences without leave of four days' duration would be punished by general court-martial, and conveying instructions that where a case of absence without leave was referred to a general court-martial, as all of them by this order were, it was for the purpose of seeing that the delinquents got proper punishment. That means to say that absences, however trivial, could not be referred to a special court, because the limit of the punishing power of a special court was six months' confinement and forfeiture of six months' pay; so that, of course, under the commands of these two generals, courts were instructed to punish all absences without leave, however trivial, with greater punishment than six months' confinement and forfeiture of six months' pay.

Senator LENROOT. I would like to ask you, there, General, is that in your view, as an example to the Army or as to its deterrent effect upon the men as a whole, a more severe punishment than six months' confinement?

Mr. ANSELL. Senator, it is I know contended by the War Department now that these large punishments, harsh in terms at least, were imposed by the Army in terrorem. That is no defense of the punishment. That is what this War Department defense, published under date of March 10, says about it. That is what the Kernan board says. The Kernan board says it is a wonderful method of maintaining discipline in the Army. That is, they say that at the time these sentences were imposed, no human being ever intended that they should be served. They say that you had these green men; that you had to make soldiers out of them in a very short time, and it was necessary to—they do not use the word "terrorize," but it is aptly descriptive of the method and of their meaning—absolutely necessary to terrorize these men who had just come from the farms and factories by making them believe for the time being that if they batted their eyes, or did this, that, or the other thing, they were up against it. Now, surely it is a perversion of the sacred functions of courts and justice to bluff like that.

But, secondly, is it not bound to be destructive of its own silly purpose? I use the adjective "silly." Will we be permitted to do it in the next war? Will we be permitted to do it now? When will we come to lop off these sentences? Because then the men will know. Is it not like hanging up a scarecrow in a field to scare the birds? If you can not successfully disguise it the birds are soon going to use it as a perch.

Do you believe, can anybody believe, that the whole commissioned personnel of the Army of the United States could have adopted as a policy the imposing of long sentences as a bluff, without the enlisted men at the same time knowing that it was a bluff? But assuredly the sentence will have to be served in such a case, whether it is one year or 99 years—and there have been 99-year sentences—unless somebody with interest enough and power enough and personality enough comes along and sees that they are curtailed.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But there is the stigma of conviction of crime.

Mr. ANSELL. Oh, yes, We are just talking about clemency; because I thought that suggestion was in the Senator's question, that the man was properly convicted.

How about these long sentences that are shocking to our conscience and sense of justice, if they are intended to be served? The War Department says they were never intended to be served; that they were imposed just simply to terrorize these men; that you got discipline and obedience by instilling this great fear.

But if the Army was intent upon handing out these long sentences, for such a purpose, ought not the Acting Judge Advocate General of the Army, I, to have known about it? I never heard that this was the policy, and I would have advised against it if I had so heard. Was it not incumbent upon the general who organized the service with that intent, to see that those sentences should never be served? Was it not his duty after flagrant warfare ceased to institute some sort of procedure whereby these punishments would be curtailed? The man who did institute the procedure was myself, a man who was not aware of any such policy or purpose, if such existed, and a man who had had to fight to get such clemency as we had already.

Senator LENROOT. What I had in mind, General, was this, in my question: It will be admitted. I take it, that punishment is necessary.

Mr. ANSELL. Yes.

Senator LENROOT. To enforce discipline.

Mr. ANSELL. Yes.

Senator LENROOT. Now, what I would like your opinion upon is, in a case of absence without leave, in the general class of cases where there is no question of guilt, whether trial by special court with a maximum sentence of six months would be sufficient for disciplinary purposes?

Mr. ANSELL. Oh, pardon me, sir. My opinion is that ordinarily it would be ample; absence without leave being distinguished, of course, legally and in substance from desertion.

Senator LENROOT. Oh, I understand; yes.

Mr. ANSELL. The absence without leave would have to become very flagrant, and more general than I think could be humanly anticipated, to make that penalty insufficient; there would have to be a disintegration of the Army before that punishment would be insufficient for a man who was gone, under circumstances that would indicate that he was not a deserter, less than 10 days, which is the presumptive period changing absence without leave into desertion. A man under ordinary circumstances goes absent without leave a maximum, say, of 10 days. It seems that our ordinary sense of justice would say that if you took that man and put him in imprisonment, in close confinement at hard labor, for six months, and made him forfeit all his pay for six months, he would pay pretty dearly for his absence.

Senator LENROOT. That might be, so far as the individual was concerned; but a man purposing to absent himself without leave, would a knowledge on his part that the maximum punishment was imprisonment for six months and forfeiture of pay for six months be sufficient to deter him?

Mr. ANSELL. In my judgment, Senator. One man's judgment would be as good as another's; but if I may speak out of what little experience I have had in the Army, I would say ordinarily that an absence without leave of the maximum of 10 days should not bring more than one month's confinement; and I would say that my experience in the Army was probably the result of observing a sensible application of punishment. Nobody has ever heard of adopting anything like six months' imprisonment and forfeiture of six months' pay for an ordinary absence without leave.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. They do not ordinarily give that much?

Mr. ANSELL. Oh, no. Absences without leave are treated very lightly. I do not know what the maximum limit of punishment in time of peace is, but I know that it is very light. I know that I have on some occasions had just some little reason to wonder if a man who wanted to take a little fling would not take it and say, "I am not going to get very much out of it," under the old peace-time maximum limit. We do not have very much absence without leave.

Senator LENROOT. Then is it your opinion—I am not speaking now of excessive punishment, but is it your opinion—that the order sending all these cases before a general court-martial where the punishment would be more than six months had no beneficial effect upon discipline?

Mr. ANSELL. I think it had a very injurious effect.

Senator LENROOT. That would be the extreme sentence, of course. What would have been the result of the fact that six months was the maximum punishment instead of 20, 30, or 40 years?

Mr. ANSELL. It would have been not only the subject of comment, but comment indicative of the general view that it was arbitrary, though not necessarily harmful.

Senator LENROOT. Even though the maximum punishment of a general court-martial for absence without leave had been one year?

Mr. ANSELL. Oh, yes; I will go so far as to say six months, Senator. That is to say, the general sense of the necessity of maintaining discipline in the Army through punishment, determinative of the length of punishment, would have been shocked by saying that they should all have been punished by sentences of six months, or generally punished by a sentence of six months. When you come to consider the span of man's life and the part of it that he usually spends in war—the arms-bearing man—taking three-year enlistments for instance, six months takes a pretty big gouge out of that, and six months is a pretty long time to put a man in confinement and work him at hard labor, and then take away every cent of his pay. The punishment is pretty heavy. If we had that in civil life, it would be considered a pretty heavy punishment. But I have no hesitancy in saying to you, Senator, that I have seen no evidence of such a contagion of absence without leave, or any such reasonably contemplated injurious effect of absence without leave, as would justify any military commander in saying to his court-martial agencies, assuming that he ought to have that power, that all these people now should be punished with more than six months.

I submitted this memorandum to the Secretary of War on January 11, and I would like to read that memorandum into the record. I will put all these memoranda, if I may, in the record, that evidence these administrative phases, as I go along.

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. ANGELL. (Reading):

ANGELL EXHIBIT R.

JANUARY 11, 1918.

Memorandum for the Secretary of War:

1. I have just finished reviewing the general court-martial cases from Camp Dix, under General Orders, No. 7, which has been presented to me to-day by the Chief of the Military Justice Division of this office. Those cases relate, of course, to that command alone, but I fear and have reason to believe that they evidence a situation that is much more general. This condition is directly due to a failure upon the part of the court-martial—a failure which in this case appears to be absolute—to appreciate the high character of their judicial functions and a similar failure upon the part of the convening and reviewing authority. Under the limitations of law, regulations, and orders, as construed in the War Department, this office was limited to advising the reviewing authority as to whether the record of trial was "legally sufficient to sustain the findings and sentence of the court," and was not otherwise concerned with the quantum of punishment; this upon the view, of course, that the jurisdiction of the convening authority is final and beyond review. Nevertheless, impelled by the irrefutable evidence found in the great number of unjust sentences passing through this office, I have presumed, with a hesitation which the delicacy of the situation demands, to invite the attention of convening authorities to the great severity of the punishment in those cases in which the punishment has appeared to be so disproportionate to the offense as to shock the conscience. In the light of what is transpiring at Dix, and doubtless elsewhere, I do not regard that such an administrative course taken in specific instances is sufficient to achieve and establish military justice.

2. The cases to which I now invite your attention have all come to me to-day as a part of the day's work. The officers who have handled them in this office and I are of one mind as to what they reveal and as to the necessity for the application of curative measures. I will give you a brief summary of them:

(a) In the case of Pvt. Sanford B. Every, 40th Company, 15th Battalion, 153d Depot Brigade, the accused was convicted simply of having a pass in his possession unlawfully. He was sentenced to be dishonorably discharged with total forfeitures and to be confined at hard labor for 10 years. The reviewing authority reduced the confinement to 3. We consider this a trivial offense, and this office will doubtless go so far as to suggest to the convening authority that, inasmuch as this soldier has already been in confinement about 2 months, the entire sentence should be remitted.

(b) In the case of Pvt. Clayton H. Cooley, 13th Company, 4th Battalion, 153d Depot Brigade, the accused was found guilty of absence without leave from July 29 to August 28, 1918; failing to report for duty; escaping from confinement September 1, 1918. The court sentenced the accused to be dishonorably discharged the service, to forfeit all pay and allowances, and to be confined at hard labor for 40 years. The reviewing authority reduced the confinement to 10 years. The man has evidently been in confinement since last July. Even as so reduced the sentence is altogether too severe, and this office, in returning the record to the convening authority, will so comment upon it.

(c) In the case of Pvt. Charles Cline, 71st Company, 153d Depot Brigade, the accused was found guilty of disobeying an order "to take his rifle and go out to drill" on November 1, 1918, and on escaping from confinement on November 4. He was sentenced to be dishonorably discharged the service and confined at hard labor for 40 years. During the period of confinement the reviewing authority reduced to 20. In this case the accused claimed that he was sick, and doubtless he was suffering from the effects of venereal trouble. It may be that he was a malingerer. In either event, the sentence, even as reduced, was entirely too severe, and this office will so comment upon it to the convening authority.

(d) In the case of Pvt. Guy W. Harper, Company A, 413th Reserve Labor Battalion, the accused was charged with desertion and convicted of absence without leave from the 17th day of August to the 13th day of November, 1918. He was sentenced to be dishonorably discharged, to forfeit all pay and allowances, and to be confined at hard labor for 20 years, which period of confinement the reviewing authority reduced to 10. The period of confinement, even as reduced, is unreasonably severe, and this office will comment upon it accordingly.

(e) In the case of Pvt. Salvatore Pastoria, Company 36, 9th Training Battalion, 153d Depot Brigade, the accused was convicted of absence without leave from the 17th day of September until the 4th day of November, 1918. The accused testified, and in the absence of Government showing to the contrary I believe, that he went home to a young wife with a sick child, who was having considerable difficulty in keeping body and soul together. This, of course, does not justify, but it does extenuate. The court sentenced the accused to be dishonorably discharged and confined at hard labor for 15 years, which, however, was reduced by the reviewing authority to 3. I think it should be still further reduced, and shall so suggest to the convening authority.

(f) In the case of Pvt. Marlon Williams, 58th Company, 15th Battalion, 153d Depot Brigade, the accused was found guilty of disobeying the order of his lieutenant to "give me those cigarettes"; behaving in an insubordinate manner to one of his sergeants by telling him to "go to hell," and behaving himself with disrespect toward his lieutenant by saying to him that he, the accused, did not "give a God damn for anybody." Of course, there can be no question but that such conduct can not be tolerated, but, after all, it is of a kind that appears far more serious in a set of charges than in actuality. It was a company rumpus which, in my judgment, might have been otherwise dealt with, or, under the circumstances of its commission, merited no very long term of confinement. There was no evidence of previous misconduct. The court sentenced the accused to be dishonorably discharged from the service, to forfeit all pay and allowances due or to become due, and to be confined at hard labor for 40 years, which period of confinement the convening authority reduced to 10. This office will invite his attention to the severity of the sentence.

(g) In the case of Pvt. Lawrence W. Sims, 49th Company, 14th Battalion, 153d Depot Brigade, the accused was convicted of absence without leave from August 8, 1918, to November 20, 1918, and was sentenced to be dishonorably discharged, and to be confined at hard labor for 25 years, which period of confinement the reviewing authority reduced to 10. Inasmuch as the record suggests that this case was something worse than absence without leave, this office does not feel justified in commenting upon it to the reviewing authority. However, the long term of imprisonment is cited to show the constitutional tendency of the court to award shockingly severe sentences.

(h) Another case has just been handed me, that of Pvt. Fred J. Muhlke, Medical Corps, base hospital, tried at Camp Grant for insubordinate conduct, which, at worst, could not merit confinement for more than a year or so in the disciplinary barracks. The court sentenced the accused to dishonorable discharge, total forfeiture, and confinement at hard labor for 50 years. The convening authority consumed some 10 pages of his review to show that such punishment was well merited.

3. If these were isolated examples, they could be corrected, of course, without raising any serious question. But they are not. I am convinced that courts-martial and approving authorities are abusing their judicial powers in awarding and approving such sentences. Such sentences are extremely harsh and cruel. Surely no person having an ordinary sense of human justice can intend that any substantial proportion of such sentences shall ever be served. If they are awarded to be served they will bring disgrace by their shocking cruelty; if they are awarded as a sort of "bluff" they will bring sacred functions into disrepute both in and out of the Army. From every point of view they are a travesty upon justice.

4. If the courts are blameworthy, the convening and reviewing authorities are no less so. They do not instruct their courts; they approve of such sentences and permit them to stand; they abuse their powers, and decline to apply their judgment and discretion to justice, by referring cases to courts-martial under arbitrary blanket rules and without individualization. I have just been furnished with an example of this, found in a camp order which provides as follows:

"Absence without leave cases in which the offender has been absent more than 24 hours will be submitted to a special court. Cases of more than five days' absence will be submitted to a general court.

"In each instance where a case of absence without leave is referred to a court of superior jurisdiction, the court must realize (italics my own) that it has been referred to such court because it is considered that an inferior court, with limited powers of punishment, can not handle the case with sufficient severity."

I have known of no more flagrant abuse of judicial power than this, and I beg to remind you that such power is judicial. Please see Runkel v. United States (122 U. S., 543), and Grafton v. United States (206 U. S., 333). There are numerous other decisions to this effect. (The Army—I believe I may be permitted to say the War Department also—fails to distinguish between functions which are judicial and functions which are purely administrative.)

This order contains, in effect, and was intended to convey, the following directions:

(a) All absences without leave will be tried by courts-martial.

(b) Those for more than one and less than five days will be punished by six months' confinement and six months' forfeiture of pay (the limit of punishing power of a special court).

(c) Those for more than five days will be tried by a general court and will be punished by dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and from six months' confinement up.

5. Again I have to advise you that these are not, in my judgment, isolated examples but are evidence of more general deficiencies in the administration of military justice which I have observed, at least I believe I have observed, during this war.

S. T. ANSELL,

Acting Judge Advocate General.

The Secretary of War then asked Gen. Crowder, who had returned, what ought to be done, and they recommended the establishment of a special clemency board, which was, of course, clearly suggested in my memorandum.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But rather extra legal, while your proceeding might have been a legal one under your view of the law?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes, sir; still just talking of clemency.

Now, let us see how far clemency has gone to remedy the injustice; see if it has gone as far as it ought to have gone; whether the evidence of the War Department's attitude and their action indicate that the War Department has been in favor of the degree of clemency which I should think would appeal to us all as necessary, upon an examination of the records in these cases, and in view of our experience in the office. It must be remembered that Gen. Crowder had not had much experience in the office during the war; and it must be remembered, furthermore, that the Secretary of War had had none. He refers to the great number of cases that he had reviewed during the war, but obviously the Secretary of War never sees any records but these. The few dismissals of officers from the divisions, not from the department, and a small percentage of the death sentences; that is all. That is, he sees only those records, few in number, that come to the President of the United States as the Commander in Chief of the Army for confirmation. He does not see the rest of them. I should imagine the Secretary of War had probably seen less than 300 records since he has been Secretary of War, and I should say that the Secretary of War had seen less than 100 really important cases that were suggestive of an opinion upon the fate of military discipline, at all.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Will you at some point in your testimony put in the number of the various kinds of courts-martial?

Mr. ANSELL. I will do that now, sir—not accurate. Round numbers are usually inaccurate, but this will be close enough.

For the year immediately preceding the armistice, according to the reports that I have, there were 28,000 general courts-martial out of an Army that averaged perhaps 2,000,000. We know the size of the Army the year before the armistice, and we know the size of the Army at the time of the armistice, and I roughly estimate it at 2,000,000 men.

In the inferior courts during the same period there were between 340,000 and 360,000 cases.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is for the year preceding the armistice?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes, sir.

Senator LENROOT. Do you know, as to those inferior courts, how they were divided as between special courts and summary courts?

Mr. ANSELL. No, I do not, Senator; and we have no way of telling that, as those records do not come to us except in unusual cases. Indeed, the safeguard was created with the view of straining down from the general courts cases that we thought could be properly tried by courts of lesser jurisdiction; but the military commanders have met us with the opposite practice. A commander who believes that a summary court can not hand his man out enough, of course, resorts to a special court; so that while the policy of administration has been to bring the cases within the jurisdiction of a lower and still lower court the practical tendency has ever been to take a case triable in the summary court and send it to the special court, and so this midway court has tried far more cases than any of us had expected it would try; cases that come up that more properly belong to the summary jurisdiction rather than the general jurisdiction.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You have not the number of cases that have been tried since we entered the war?

Mr. ANSELL. No, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Your figures are only for the year preceding the armistice?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; I took that because that became the basis of discussion; and that is all I know.

Mr. ANSELL. Accordingly, the clemency board was organized within two or three weeks—a special clemency board, we will call it—which was to go back and take up cases, however long they had been tried, during this war, for the special purpose of clemency, and I was made the president of that clemency board.

There were conferences between the Secretary of War and the Judge Advocate General and the prison officials, one of which I attended, and the question arose as to whether the prisoners abroad, the number of whom nobody in the War Department knew, were to be given this special consideration also. I could see no reason why they should not be given the same consideration as our men imprisoned here at home, but it was decided that their cases should not be taken up, the reason assigned being that they were over there, in and near the theater of operations where the offenses were committed, and that people would not be so interested in extending clemency to prisoners so circumstanced as here at home; with which I disagreed. So that from the beginning we were not to include in this special dispensation prisoners confined abroad.

I have already said that I was reduced to my Regular Army grade of lieutenant colonel, and there had been put on the board, in the beginning or shortly after it was organized, Col. Wigmore, a very staunch supporter of the view opposing mine, and a man who is not zealous in according clemency. So that when I was reduced they kept him as the senior member of the board.

My relation to the Judge Advocate General had been personally affected. By virtue of this officer's rank he became the point of contact between the Judge Advocate General and the clemency board, and instructions governing the clemency board were issued to him and not to me. Indeed, except so far as whatever personality I could put back of my position, it could be said that he was largely the clemency board.

Now, clemency is not a matter that can be accurately measured. After all, it is a matter of the heart and of the conscience; and I was very anxious to have a board, of course, that shared what I conceived to be liberal views and the proper attitude toward clemency. That board, of course, I did not get when the senior officer on it was a man ardently supporting the Crowder view and bitterly opposed to mine.

Some time in early March I observed that the clemency examiners, the officers who made the records, evidently did not understand the considerations that would have governed me in examining the records for purposes of clemency. They were deferring too much to the record. They were approaching it as they would review a record for determining errors of law, and were not taking into account what the record reflected of the human situation; not governed by those aspects, but simply by the legal determinations of the record. We were not getting very far. So far the situation between my clemency board and me had been such that I had not been in position to instruct it. They sat in one room and I sat in another, and the channel of instruction from the Judge Advocate General's office to this superior officer was not through me.

Senator LENROOT. Do I understand by that, General, that the policy was that if they found what would have been in a civil court a reversible error, they would recommend clemency, but otherwise not?

Mr. ANSELL. It was largely that; and they were pretty strict about the reversible-error proposition also. Yes, Senator; that probably expresses it as accurately as it could be expressed.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Wigmore was a civilian. How long had he been in the service?

Mr. ANSELL. From near the beginning of the war; but he had been in the Provost Marshal General's office. Col. Wigmore had had absolutely no experience, which he confesses in the letter he got out to the American bar as its Nestor, advising them what to do on the subject. He confesses that he had never examined but two court-martial records, which had incidentally come to him; yet he assumed to speak with Nestorian authority.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He was your superior on this board?

Mr. ANSELL. Oh, yes, sir; after I was reduced; so that, seeing this situation, on March 21 I asked the Acting Judge Advocate General, Gen. Kreger, that I might be permitted to instruct the clemency board, and the examining officers who made the reports to the clemency board, or at least might be permitted to present to this clemency board my views of the general principles that should govern the granting of clemency. I was moved further to do this by the fact that recently the commandants of the prisoners had been brought on here, and they were very potential factors in the granting of clemency, because they make a recommendation in each case; and the tendency of the War Department is, of course, to support the recommendation of the prison commandant rather than, perhaps, what might be described as the more humane view of the clemency officers.

These gentlemen had been brought here, Col. Rice and others, and they and the Acting Judge Advocate General all conferred with the Clemency Board and the examiner and agreed upon some principles governing the award of clemency. I was not there, although sitting right in my room, nor was I notified of the meeting.

I wish to submit at this point in the record a memorandum for the Acting Judge Advocate General which contains my views with respect to the principles that ought to govern clemency, views which I think nobody could disagree with unless they were apprehensive because of their conception that I was extremely liberal, or there was something in the views themselves that was hidden.

Senator LENROOT. That will be inserted.

(The memorandum referred to is here printed in the record, as follows:)

ANSELL EXHIBIT S.

MARCH 21, 1919.

Memorandum for Gen. Kreger:

Here are my views, briefly and roughly stated, respecting the considerations which I think should govern the Clemency Examiners and the Clemency Board itself:

1. Clemency is not a matter to be governed by technical rules of law. It is a matter of conscience rather than strict professional judgment. It is a matter which requires us to see the human being, his motives, circumstances, and condition, and our vision in this regard must not be limited by what the record, legally considered, strictly shows.

2. Too much legal deference must not be paid to any record for purposes of clemency, and this is especially true of courts-martial records. They frequently show, what is only too frequently true, that however closely the forms of trial may have been adhered to, the trial itself was not a fair, full, and impartial presentation of the case. Speaking more specifically, I think we must ask ourselves, among many others, the following questions:

(a) Were the facts, as revealed on the record and as they may be fairly inferred, such as to indicate a state of mind that is really criminal or immoral, or chronically perverted, or intolerably reckless of the military obligation? Or, especially in purely military offenses, was not the delinquency due to thoughtlessness, or ignorance, or a lack of understanding of the military environment, or was it not provoked, as is frequently the case, by an unsympathetic, if not an oppressive attitude upon the part of those in authority? Frequently the two serious charges, desertion and disobedience of orders, can be so resolved, in the light of the human facts, as to indicate that there was no intention to commit the offense at all. While every charge of disobedience of orders sounds bad upon paper, very frequently the order itself was one given in a light or improper manner, or was not a necessary one, or involved some inconsequential thing not sounding in those necessitous circumstances where disobedience of orders becomes a most serious, even a capital offense.

(b) Accused may have counsel, but too frequently counsel is so limited by reason of his lack of legal qualification or a lack of that rank which gives him standing before the court, or a general lack of those inclinations and appreciations which zealous and competent counsel must have in order to make a good defense, that it can be said, as a matter of fact if not a matter of law, that the accused did not have the substantial assistance of counsel which every accused should have. And frequently the court will permit a man to go to trial without counsel when any man of legal appreciations knows such a course to be unwise. What is true of counsel is frequently true of other incidents of the trial.

(c) There is nothing that courts-martial are more inclined to do than follow a natural inquisitiveness to admit masses of hearsay testimony, and at the same time so limit the counsel as to prevent proper cross-examination where, as is none too frequently the case, the counsel is inclined to indulge in one. Military counsel often hesitate to cross-examine superior officers, and courts-martial as a rule seem to think that it is improper to test a witness, especially if he is a superior officer, for bias, prejudice, or credibility.

(d) Special attention must be paid to improvident pleas of guilty. Frequently the entire case is given away by such a plea made by an accused without counsel, or advised by incompetent counsel; and very frequently, after such a plea, the accused makes statements in his own defense inconsistent with the plea, which courts as frequently disregard. Pleas of guilty of serious offenses should be most carefully scrutinized. Court-martial duty is uncongenial, and a plea of guilty is acceptable as a brief method of ending the trial.

(e) Of course, as a technical matter, every presumption should be made in favor of the action of the court, but frequently the action of the court, however it may appear in mere form, is not fair and its conclusion is prejudiced thereby.

(f) We should be on our guard against confessions or statements of any kind against interest, when made by a soldier to a military superior. The military relation is such as to induce confessions in such a way as to render them incompetent.

(g) I do not regard that the thirty-seventh article of war changes the rule with respect of the effect of prejudicial error, but simply redeclares it. Substantial error, in my judgment, must be presumed to affect the finding and sentence. As between evidence of the same degree of credibility, it may be that the effect of evidence erroneously admitted may be overcome by an overwhelming volume of evidence of such a nature as to compel the mind. But, for instance, take a confession which when worthy of belief is the most convincing of all evidence, if it should be improperly admitted, I should conclusively presume error.

(h) I observe that it is frequently said in the clemency memoranda that the evidence is sufficient to sustain the conviction. Evidence may be sufficient to sustain the conviction when tested by an appellate court for its purposes, and yet be so weak and unsatisfactory as to justify clemency. The tests and purposes of the tests of the evidence in two cases are entirely different.

3. I believe that the great principles fundamentally established in our civil jurisprudence, designed for the purpose of securing a fair trial, are equally applicable, except where clearly withheld, to trials before courts-martial. A military accused is entitled to the same full, fair, and impartial trial; to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to have the facts against him determined by the usual rules of evidence; to have witnesses in his favor; to be confronted with witnesses against him, except in those cases where the rules of evidence reasonably prescribe otherwise; and, above all, he is entitled to the assistance of counsel for his defense, counsel that should represent him and his cause, and not simply appear in the trial to satisfy a form of law. And a military accused is fully entitled to protection against self-incrimination, as much so as an accused in a civil court.

4. The Articles of War and the military statutes are not the sole source to be sought in determining whether or not a man has had a full, fair, and impartial trial. The fundamental principles of law which are a part of the common law and now a part of our Constitution must be resorted to and applied, except where by their very nature they are inapplicable to military proceeding.

5. I think our tendency should be, wherever we can justify it, to get rid of that kind of punishment which is continuing and damns a man forever, such as a dishonorable discharge. Such a punishment as that should be given only in extreme cases. It has been given altogether too frequently and we should lean toward finding a way to reduce that kind of punishment. In the ordinary case we should try to restore a man to the colors or return him to civil life without marking him so he can never rehabilitate himself.

If you should approve of these views, I think you should instruct the examiners and the board accordingly, or authorize me to do so.

S. T. ANSELL.

Mr. ANSELL. I heard nothing from that, though I had really thought I would hear almost immediately. I knew there were conferences between the Acting Judge Advocate General and the new senior officer of the board, Col. Easby-Smith. Col. Wigmore had been relieved and reassigned to duty at the Provost Marshal General's office. But an officer of equal rank and my superior, a new officer, incompatible with me and my views, was assigned, vice Wigmore, relieved. That officer was Col. Easby-Smith, who, if possible, is even more pronounced in opposition to my views, both in regard to the system of justice and the clemency that we were undertaking to award, so ardent a champion is he of the Judge Advocate General.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He was a civilian also?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He was a lawyer here in the District of Columbia?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes. He had not been on duty in the Judge Advocate General's office and he knew nothing about this matter. So that I addressed on March 24 another memorandum to Col. Kreger, which I would like to read. It is brief, and I would like to have that inserted in the record [reading]:

ANSELL EXHIBIT T.

MARCH 24, 1919.

Confidential memorandum for Gen. Kreger:
Subject: Clemency.

1. I request that I be given full authority to direct the Clemency Board and the examiners in the matter of the proper methods to be used in examining the records—those matters of record or omissions from the record which may properly be considered as indicia of clemency, the general principles that should govern clemency, and, equally important, that I be consulted in the selection of the personnel engaged in clemency work. Otherwise I must advise you that I must disclaim all responsibility for results and you and others must assume it.

2. My name has gone to the public in such a way as to indicate that I am in charge of the examiners and the board and that my views in general govern. This is far from accurate. The administration of this office in respect of this most important matter has been laid down so as to hold me responsible and yet to deny me the necessary freedom and authority.

3. Because Col. Easby-Smith is my senior by one grade, which in itself is embarrassing, because his views as to clemency and his attitude to the subject generally so differ from mine as to result in obstruction, and because I lack for him the official regard which I should for the senior member of the board, I ask that he be relieved from duty with it.

4. I also believe that the special board of review exercises such a restraint upon a fair examination of the records as to be obstructive of proper clemency. I request that you direct the special board of review, the Clemency Board, and all clemency examiners to report to me for instruction, and that I be consulted hereafter in assignments of officers to duty in connection with clemency work.

5. I would have you know that nothing is farther from my desire than to embarrass you, but my own protection and a proper regard for my duty require me to say to you this much.

S. T. ANSELL.

I referred there to a special board of review over clemency. The system of examining records for clemency consisted in having an officer examine the record and then report to the clemency board, consisting usually of four or six officers, divided into two or three divisions, each division of two officers, of which I was nominally the president, and obviously, at least from my viewpoint, one great element making for clemency was the poor quality of the trials. A man may have had counsel, nominally, but when you look over the record, its poverty speaks louder than words. You may find that the counsel sat there, and everybody sat there, and saw the case poorly developed; so that the record, however technically dependable, was as a human document unreliable. That was an indication for clemency, especially, when it would appear that the omissions or the particular slant given by the method of presentation was operating against the accused.

The War Department did not wish to impeach or impugn the integrity of these records; but I insisted that there should be printed on the clemency examiner's report certain questions: "What do you think of the trial in this case, and why? Who represented the accused? What kind of defense did he put up? What do you think of the case in general?" Now, these were young officers, militarily ambitious; properly so, doubtless. If they reported a case "poorly tried," that suggested clemency. Of course if the case were reported "well tried," there was lacking in the case the element of clemency; but quite the contrary, if it had been poorly tried. A case poorly tried, so far as the trial is concerned, does suggest clemency.

The Judge Advocate General organized this special board of clemency review consisting of three lawyers chosen, as I say, especially because they reflected absolutely the views of the department and the Judge Advocate General. Seldom or never could that board find a case poorly tried. They were all well tried. So that every case that the clemency examiner reported as poorly tried went to this clemency board, when they would report back to the Judge Advocate General, frequently in language characterized by brusqueness and unjudicial temper. They would say "It is absurd to say that this case was poorly tried. The examiner who made that statement evidently did not make a thorough examination of the record. No court in the land would say that that case was poorly tried. It should be sent back to this officer with instructions to look over his work again." Now, to a civilian that may not appear to be more than a mere difference of opinion as to the quality of a record; but to the military man, here are all these men in what we call the pit, working as hard as they could, getting out thousands of records. When a man put "poorly tried" on a record he knew that was going to be visé by a set of men who did not want to see the "poorly tried" maintained. If he reported "well tried," of course that went through.

Now, I say that one of the principal obstacles to getting a fair estimate of the record was to be found in that fact that the Judge Advocate General organized this separate board of review, of high ranking officers, with special authority to supervise the work of the clemency examiners, whenever there was found an element in the records that made for clemency, but never to supervise when there was found a record not making for clemency.

Senator LENROOT. Was there ever a difference in the treatment of the records of trials of men and officers?

Mr. ANSELL. A world-wide difference, Senator. You let an officer be tried, and there is a straining of energy from the time the original investigation begins. You let a charge be made against an officer, and the whole system lines up really to see that there is an absolute necessity of trial or there will be none.

The Inspector General's Department goes to work and inspects, and inspects, and inspects; and reports, and reports; and then the judge advocate of the convening officer's staff investigates with the utmost care, and the commanding general really is only too glad to find a way of letting the officer out; and when you come to the court every presumption in the world is in favor of this officer, if he has been an officer in good standing; and so it is throughout the entire procedure. And when it gets to our office there never has been a time, no matter what the personnel was, when there was not the most thoroughgoing, careful review of every officer's case, with a distinct, palpable disposition to find all fault possible, and to reduce as much as possible the importance of everything against him. I say here, with the keenest sense of my responsibility in making the statement, that an officer and an enlisted man in our establishment do not at all get the same kind of justice. I say that they stand at opposite poles. Every presumption is made in favor of the officer. There is a thoroughness of trial that we do not find elsewhere. Our treatment of the enlisted men is to run them through the mill.

Senator LENROOT. In the case of proven guilt of an officer and enlisted man for the same offense, is there a different degree of punishment?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes, Senator. Let us take the Army estimate of dismissal for an officer and dishonorable discharge for an enlisted man. There may be some difference in the two punishments, but they are so nearly analogous that I think we can discuss them and, by way of contrast, answer your question.

You are an enlisted man. You do not belong, as a rule, to the same class—if we are ever justified in talking of classes; and you talk it in the Army, the Lord knows! An officer is apt to be a better educated man, and better circumstanced, with more influence. We all know that the enlisted man is apt to be of the humbler type; not always, but apt to be. Both are found guilty. The trials differ as I have indicated. Let us suppose that the officer gets dismissal. The corresponding punishment in the case of the enlisted man is dishonorable discharge. I say to the committee that both of those punishments are ruinous; they are destructive of all capacity in a human being to rehabilitate himself. I have known of few men in this world who have left the Army with a dishonorable discharge or dismissal that they did not go down and out, and never come back. Few, if any of them, ever get back. One such officer was in my office in the last few days. That man was a fine officer. He made what I should conceive to be only a slight mistake, but the powers had lined up against that man to railroad him out of the Army. That man has striven and striven and striven until he has come back in civil life; but, though a young man, younger than I am, he shows what has happened to him. His hair is white as snow and his face is filled with the wrinkles that belong to 80 years of age. If this man had not had great stamina, he never would have come back.

Take an enlisted man in his situation. He is less apt, still, to come back. When the enlisted man is tried we in the Army try to make his punishment as severe as possible. We follow a man who has gotten a dishonorable discharge wherever we can, and we give him this yellow sheet, and then we try to prevent his employment anywhere in this world.

Senator LENROOT. Just elaborate on that, will you, a little?

Mr. ANSELL. One came to me the other day. He had gotten employment, I think, on a trolley line—something—in southern California. An officer of the Army, hearing that this man was there, notwithstanding the fact that the man was doing well as a conductor or motorman, reported to the company, to the management of the company and said, "This man has been fired out of the Army as a bad egg. You do not want him. It is our policy in the Army to try to see that those men are known for what they are—unfit to serve their country in uniform." I do not believe the manager wanted to do this, but nevertheless we all know business management. That man was fired—dismissed.

These punishments, Mr. Chairman, are lifelong. They last, and the department intends to make them last as long as the victim draws the breath of life. He is tagged; he has the yellow sheet; he is followed, and wherever the Army is known he is apt to be known, and the influence of the Army will be used to prevent his successful efforts at rehabilitation.

Senator LENROOT. Do I understand that the action of the officer you refer to was in line of duty?

Mr. ANSELL. Common understanding; yes. Not in the line of official duty, in a strict sense, no; but common understanding, yes. I say that emphatically. Why, an officer of the Army dismissed, as I say, for a mighty slight offense—at some more convenient moment, if I can find the time, I am going to try to present that man's case to this Congress and show this Congress that the man was unjustly treated and he ought never to have been dismissed from the Army. Yet that man, when we got into the war, wanted to supply a post with some commodity, maybe fish or vegetables, which he was able to supply, and which he was supplying through a contractor. The commanding officer of that post, observing this poor fellow dragging a load of fish, or cabbage, or what not, into that post for the supply of the troops, recognized that he was this military pariah. The commanding officer made inquiry and found out that the victim was supplying this contractor with this provender, and the post commander called up the contractor and told him that he would have to fire this man. The man was brought up in the presence of the contractor, that the post commander might identify him with assurance; and the post commander, in that authoritative way that men with great power have, just simply said, "That is the man;" and then the contractor took the man outside and said, "I am sorry; you have been a good man; you have worked hard; you have done well for me; but I will lose my job if I do not fire you." Of course, you have got some suggestion of that in the Articles of War themselves. At least one article forbids any association with convicted men. But I am referring to a common understanding—a tradition, if you please; an element of esprit de corps. Obviously you would not expect officers and men of the Army to exist on terms of social and official equality with men convicted; but the point I am making is that there is an affirmative effort to do injury that is lifelong.

Now, dishonorable discharge, if you are an enlisted man, means just as much to you as dismissal from the Army means to me if I am an officer. But I want to assure you that the Army does not so regard it. The Army takes into consideration the social standing of the officer—what it means to be an officer with the badge of sovereign authority on you. It is a wonderful thing, really, to be an officer of the Army. They say that if you destroy that man's tenure of office and throw him out into the world in disgrace in a material way you have destroyed a lifetime vocation and livelihood. You have thrown him from a place of honor than which none is higher, because, no matter what the attitude of our people may be to the Army as such, there is no people in the world who hold an Army officer in higher esteem as an individual than the American people.

"And see what the man has suffered," they say. "Here upon this very pinnacle of pride and popular appreciation, and cast out. Therefore, we are not going to give the punishment of dismissal except in the most flagrant case." And that is generally true. But dishonorable discharge—I do not want to criticize our Army unfairly, and I will not do it, but I must speak truthfully as I know the truth to be—dishonorable discharge is regarded as a sort of perfunctory thing. It is but part of a formula. The language runs, "dishonorable discharge from the service of the United States Government and confinement for four years with forfeiture of all pay and allowances." It goes right along. In fact, when you give a man more than six months' punishment you must give him dishonorable discharge. It is an easy thing. Now, they say that dishonorable discharges may be remitted. May I say to you, sir, that in all convictions in the year immediately preceding the armistice—or, I will give you some statistics. Statistics are devitalizing, as a rule, but they are interesting in this case.

Out of every 100 sets of charges drafted by an officer against an enlisted man between 96 and 97 were tried.

Of every 100 trials by general court-martial the year before the war, just a little less than 90 per cent were convicted; and in the old Regular Army before the war 96 were convicted year after year and year after year.

Get the full import of that! An officer here, under no special obligation, acting simply upon his responsibility as an officer, prefers a set of charges against a man, and 96 out of a hundred are tried, regardless of all this talk of investigation by the War Department; and of every 100 tried 96 are convicted; and out of every 100 convicted, 64 of them are given the sentence of dishonorable discharge.

Now, they say, "Oh, we suspend the sentence." But in the last statistics, the year before the armistice, those statistics showed that 48 out of every 100 men tried by general court-martial did get dishonorable discharge, notwithstanding all their talk.

SENATOR CHAMBERLAIN. They do not suspend them?

MR. ANSELL. Yes; they do now.

SENATOR CHAMBERLAIN. Do they now?

MR. ANSELL. Yes; under your act. Yes, they do; but many are not suspended. But I will tell you something else about the suspended dishonorable discharge that so much is made of. In connection with this power of review that we have under General Orders, No. 7, if a commanding general does not wish a sentence of dishonorable discharge to be reviewed, all he has got to do is to suspend the sentence for the time being, because under the terms of General Orders, No. 7, it is only an executed sentence of dishonorable discharge or a sentence of death that is reviewed; so he can suspend it to-day and thereby obviate any review of the case, and then come along to-morrow and vacate the suspension, and that is the end.

Now, Mr. Chairman, these statistics, I hate them, but they are interesting; and they are interesting when you look at the old Regular Army. They are trying to say this is a new thing, all these terrible punishments. Why, Mr. Chairman, the condition of things in the Regular Army with respect to the injustice done through courts-martial was far worse than it has been in this Army; far worse. There were fewer charges and fewer convictions and fewer dishonorable discharges in the new Army. Why, do you know, if we had preferred as many charges in this new Army, per capita, as we preferred in the old Regular Army we would have had this appalling result: If we had applied the ratio of Regular Army trials to the new establishment we would have had 125,000 general courts-martial and 1,300,000 inferior courts-martial, surely a number that would have destroyed any army. Every year that I have been in the Army of the United States the number of men convicted by general courts-martial every year out of every 100 was not less than 5, and usually 6. Think of it! Six men out of every hundred every year are tried, and more than half of them discharged dishonorably from this Army. Three-year enlistments, 18 out of every 100. Four-year enlistments, 24 out of every 100.

Now, they have argued that these deficiencies have been demonstrated in the new Army, and that they have been due to the fact that the new officer is an inexperienced officer, and that he has been oppressive; clad with a little brief authority. How is that reconcilable with the fact that there has been such a smaller proportion of courts-martial in this war army; that there has been a preceptible smaller percentage of convictions?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. How do you account for it?

Mr. ANSELL. From the fact, largely, that the new officer had not become completely divested of his civil sense of justice. He endeavored to put up with these men without resorting to the Regular Army method of preferring a charge every time a man did something. I speak out of my experience as Acting Judge Advocate General during this war and say to you, sir, that the harshest courts during this war in this Army were courts presided over or controlled by Regular Army officers.

Senator LENROOT. Do you not think that while we were at war there was a higher spirit among the men—a better morale?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And there was a better class of citizens in the Army.

Senator LENROOT. Yes; a better class of men.

Mr. ANSELL. That you had a better class of men, I think we must concede. After all, it was a segment of our citizenship, not all the best, but of very high character; the highest grade of personnel that I think any army in the world ever had, and I profess to be something of a student of military history. But let us not get the idea that the old-time regular was a sort of roustabout. He may have been once. But any man that has ever served with regular troops is conscious of the great loyalty of those men, of their great zeal in the performance of their duty, and their capacity to render blind obedience to the Regular Army.

We did have a better type of men in this army; but, on the other hand, you want to remember that there were immeasurably greater opportunities for violating the regulations. Take a boy brought up at home—take me, for instance. I think they have never regarded me down home as a general. I am still what I was to them. They do not understand these new shoulder straps. They have never seen me in my shoulder straps. If I had spoken to one of those men from my home a little sharply it would have been an extremely likely thing for him at first to hand it back to me as he got it. Take a boy taken right off the farm and put him into that army, without the regular preliminary course of training we give to an enlisted man in the Regular Army. We put the new men right into it. They were civilians yesterday. Take a man that came from my home, a rather rural, backwoods place, who never saw a rifle before and knew nothing about the Army; they took those “tar heels” and put them right into camp, absolutely green men. Then you have an officer come around among those men and begin to talk to them in this ultra-authoritative way; it is a wonder that there had not been more derelictions than there were. These new men needed not punishment at that stage of the game; they needed but instruction and sympathy. There was time in the days of peace to instruct the Regular Army men, but there was no time to instruct these men, and you should not hold them up to this high exaction.

I think, Mr. Chairman, it is an unworthy argument to place the blame on the new officers; first, because it is untrue. It is untrue, and I say this speaking from the record; and I have no reason to hold a brief for any new officer. The new officer is not responsible for the harsh punishments. And here is a clinching argument to show that that argument is not true. You can count up on the fingers of these hands every National Guard officer and every National Army officer who exercised general court-martial jurisdiction. You know that, sir. You know your army commanders and division commanders and department commanders were Regular Army officers, naturally. They were the professional soldiers and they went to the top. But nothing less than, nothing of lower rank than, a division commander can convene a court-martial, and pass upon its judgment, except in some special case where the President of the United States specifically endows a junior officer with authority for a special purpose.

Who, then, in the last analysis, was responsible for the great number of trials—there were too many—and the harsh punishments resulting from those trials, if it was not the man who took the charges and ordered them tried; and then who approved the punishment, and who at any moment of the proceeding could have cut it down? How do they escape that? How can anybody escape it?

The Regular Army is a wonderful institution. We all know its history. But, in heaven's name, let it appreciate one fact, that is, regular armies are not going to fight the battles of this country. We are going to fight the battles of this country with armies just exactly like the ones we have just had. We are always going to do it, unless it is some opera-bouffe affair.

Now, if it were true that the deficiencies of or evils of the administration were due entirely to these new officers, is it not up to us to protect the institution and the men of the institution from a situation that is as inevitable as that? Must we not restrain the man clad with a little brief authority? Of course we must. We get nowhere by saying that it is due to the fault of these people, when we must inevitably have them. If it is due to the fault of those people, then by law we must restrain them.

ESTABLISHMENT OF MILITARY JUSTICE—PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF THE ARTICLES OF WAR.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 29, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to adjournment, in the room of the Committee on Appropriations in the Capitol, at 10 o'clock a. m., Senator Irvine L. Lenroot presiding.

Present: Senators Lenroot (acting chairman) and Chamberlain.

STATEMENT OF MR. SAMUEL T. ANSELL—Resumed.

Mr. ANSELL. If the committee please, in the first place this morning I wish to read into the record this self-explanatory correspondence, consisting of a letter from me to Gen. March, dated yesterday, and a letter from Gen. March to me, in reply thereto, also dated yesterday [reading]:

AUGUST 28, 1919.

MY DEAR GENERAL MARCH: The press reports me this morning as having stated to the Senate Military Committee yesterday that you were one of the officers who obstructed the administration of clemency, through the special clemency board, of which I was the president.

I did not say this for the simple reason that you were not one of the obstructing officers. Those officers were the Secretary of War, Gen. Crowder, Gen. Kreger, and some others who were subject to Gen. Crowder's and Gen. Kreger's direction.

At my appearance before the committee to-morrow, I shall take occasion to say that in no way, directly or indirectly, so far as I ever knew, did you interfere with the administration of the special clemency board.

Very truly, yours,

Gen. P. C. MARCH,
Chief of Staff, United States Army, Washington, D. C.

---

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
Washington, August 28, 1919.

MY DEAR ANSELL: I have your letter of August 28, in which you inform me that you did not state to the Senate Military Committee what appeared in the newspapers this morning concerning my being one of the officers who were obstructing clemency.

I have noticed the statement in the paper and was amazed at your being quoted as saying what was accredited to you, as, of course, the statement was entirely false, and I am glad to find, as I expected, that you were misquoted.

The same statement appears in the New York papers which have Associated Press service, indicating that the false statement was sent out by the Associated Press. I would be very glad if you would inform the president of the Associated Press that the matter accredited to you was false, as it not only places me in an entirely false and objectionable light before the country at large, but it is not fair to you, as many of your old associates in the War Department know the facts of the case.

Very truly, yours,

P. C. MARCH,
General, Chief of Staff.

Gen. S. T. ANSELL,
*Suite 710-712 Riggs Building,

I received that reply from Gen. March only a few minutes ago. Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I did not understand you to charge Gen. March with that.

Mr. ANSELL. No; but if it were possible for anybody to make that inference, I desire to disclaim it here.

I was discussing, when we took the adjournment day before yesterday, the administration of clemency, and I had reached the point where I had requested to read into the record the efforts that I had made to see that the special clemency board was given the instructions that I thought they ought to be given, and I had, I think, the permission of the committee to read the memorandum of instructions that I had addressed to the Acting Judge Advocate General. I wish to say that the instructions, though obviously correct—and I think the committee could not do otherwise than find them so—were held by the Acting Judge Advocate General for three or four weeks. In the meantime other instructions were given, which I did not hear, and with which, from what I have heard of them since, I did not disagree; and the results of those instructions were reflected in the work of the special clemency board.

On March 24 I asked the relief of certain members of the special clemency board, but this was ignored. (See Exhibit T.)

On May 17 I was advised by the Acting Judge Advocate General that the work of the special clemency board was nearing its completion, and that the board would be disbanded and that the officers would be distributed to other divisions of work. I protested to him that the board ought not to be disbanded. He said that we were about to finish the exigent cases of prisoners in the United States. I reminded him that we still had the prisoners in Europe. Their cases had never been touched. The War Department at that time did not know how many prisoners there were in Europe, but believed that there were but very few. I asked that the question of how many prisoners there were in Europe be taken up with the authorities there, as obviously, for every reason, the War Department ought to be cognizant of the number of prisoners we had in Europe, and I also filed a memorandum with the Acting Judge Advocate General which I wish to read. It is brief [reading:]

ANSELL EXHIBIT U.

MAY 17, 1919.

Memorandum for the Secretary of War.

(Through the Acting Judge Advocate General.)

I recommend:

1. That the special clemency work which is now limited in its considerations to prisoners confined in the United States be extended to prisoners in our Army serving sentence in Europe.

2. That a more thorough review now be made of all doubtful cases here of prisoners still having more than three months to serve; this in recognition of the fact that the work of special clemency examination has been done so hastily as to preclude assurance of satisfactory results.

3. That a thorough review now be made of all cases here and abroad in which the record of the proceedings would indicate the advisability of extending a full pardon.

4. That if I should be intrusted with this work as president of the special clemency board, I be permitted to select, as far as possible, the personnel of the board, in order that it may be in general sympathy with my views at to clemency.

S. T. ANSELL,

Lieutenant Colonel, Judge Advocate.

The purpose of this memorandum, of course, was to give us general consideration of all the prisoners in Europe, of whom I apprehended there were many, and also to go over again many of these cases; because the committee can understand that when you undertake to handle some 5,000 or 6,000 cases and examine that many records within a period of less than three months, you are necessarily acting very hastily and not thoroughly, and I thought that the matter was of such supreme importance that we ought again to go over all serious cases thoroughly. I also thought, and I still think, that the pardoning power ought not to be strained in its exercise, especially in cases of this sort, and that we ourselves ought to take the initiative in the extension of full pardon where we were convinced that justice required that course, not leaving it to some humble man to present his case here to the pardon power, through attorneys, and all that kind of thing. I was particularly anxious about this, for the reason that, as the committee may know, there are certain offenses—desertion, for instance—which carry with them incidental punishments in the way of civil disabilities. A man convicted of desertion is outlawed. He loses his right to citizenship and his right to hold office, etc.; and, obviously, no conviction of desertion or any conviction that carries such civil disabilities as that, ought to be had except upon most thorough trial and thorough consideration after trial. Whether pardon will restore the status ante culpam and remove the disabilities is questionable, nevertheless, if it would remove some disabilities, and a man not justly convicted ought to have his disabilities removed. At all events, we know as the result of the history of the Civil War that we have been correcting the records of that war, or endeavoring to correct them, by legislation, by the removal of charges of desertion and trials for desertion, in order that those men might have their rights restored.

On June 24, 1919, nothing having been done so far as I knew in this direction, I addressed another memorandum to the Acting Judge Advocate General, which I hope I may be permitted to read into the record.

Senator LENROOT. Proceed.

Mr. ANSELL. I will read it [reading]:

ANSELL EXHIBIT V.

JUNE 24, 1919.

Memorandum for the Acting Judge Advocate General:

1. On May 17 I addressed to the Secretary of War, through you, a memorandum in which I recommended in effect that (1) clemency consideration be given our prisoners in France, as well as those in this country, which has not heretofore been done; (2) that in view of the haste with which the first review was necessarily made, a more thorough review be made of doubtful cases, looking to still further clemency; (3) that another and thorough review be made with a view to granting in proper cases full pardon; and (4) that if I should be intrusted with the work I be permitted to select as far as possible a personnel in sympathy with my views as to clemency.

Yesterday you indicated to me that you would approve my recommendation that the prisoners in France be given the same clemency consideration as the prisoners here, but that you were of a mind to disapprove the other recommendations.

2. With the greatest earnestness I urge you to reconsider, in the hope that you may be brought to that state of mind enabling you to view the situation as I do. The work has been hastily done. More than 5,000 records, each with its accompanying papers, have been examined. It is not humanly possible to give to that number of cases, their records and the facts and information de hors the record the consideration which justice to the enlisted man requires. The clemency examiner, upon whom so much depends, has been at times inexperienced in the work and at all times almost intolerably pressed. I have observed evidence and have been conscious of hasty action in all departments of the work, including my own. It has not been done with that accuracy, deliberation, and assurance which should characterize judicial action.

A second examination would not require the most thorough examination of every record, but only those in which there were some outstanding indicia of the necessity of reexamination. To indicate one class of cases, I myself believe that many of those in which clemency has been flatly denied ought now to be more thoroughly reexamined.

3. According to your view, the application for pardon should be initiated by the individuals who deem themselves so aggrieved as to justify that course. In view of all the circumstances surrounding the administration of military justice this, in my judgment, would be an unjust as well as an unwise course. As long as clemency was permitted to be given consideration only upon the application of the individual, little clemency was had. It is the right of the individual to seek clemency; it is the duty of authority to give it. That duty carries with it, when there has been so much injustice as there has recently been, the duty of taking the initiative, and not waiting upon individual application. We took the initiative in the granting of clemency, and why should we not for the same reason take the same initiative in granting pardons? Taking such initiative would, in my judgment, be to the great credit of the pardoning power. Pardon ordinarily is a matter of mercy and as such should not be strained out just to those who may be advised to seek it, and it never should be deferred for mere convenience's sake. In many of these cases in which we can say with fair assurance that the man ought not to have been tried, or was not lawfully tried, or that the record as it stands can not fairly sustain the conviction, pardon becomes a matter not of mercy but of partial justice. In such a case we should act, not as a matter of grace, but in recognition of a high sense of justice. In such cases our sense of justice and our sense of duty should compel us to act. Furthermore, the military relation is such and the condition of the prisoner is frequently such that he has not the ability, nor the liberty, to make out the case that ought to be made for him.

We ought frankly to acknowledge and act upon the fact that courts-martial ran riot during this war and now do all we can to correct their unjust results.

4. If you still adhere to your views of yesterday and report upon my previous memorandum accordingly, after you have considered this memorandum, permit me to request that you forward it with the other papers for the consideration of the Secretary of War.

S. T. ANSELL,

Lieutenant Colonel, Judge Advocate.

I have received no written reply to those memoranda. I have been told by the Acting Judge Advocate General, orally, that the Secretary of War disapproved of all of them except the one that extended the clemency consideration to the prisoners in Europe; and I observed that the Secretary made a statement to the press to the effect that consideration was not extended in the first instance to the prisoners in Europe for the reason that they were going to be brought home soon any way, and that we would wait until they got here.

I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the reason assigned at the outset for not granting clemency consideration to the prisoners in Europe was that there was a different relation between those prisoners and their offenses because of the fact that the offenses were committed in the actual theater of war, or at least abroad, and that there was less popular interest in their cases than in those here at home. I was also advised orally, but with some uncertainty upon the part of my adviser, that the Acting Judge Advocate General at the time I made this memorandum thought that Gen. Pershing had instituted some sort of clemency over there that they relied upon, and that it would not require a second examination over here. I did not believe that Gen. Pershing had instituted the kind of machinery that would give proper clemency, or even the degree of clemency that we were giving here. I observe that the press reports state that now, six months afterwards, these European prisoners are having their cases considered.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Here?

Mr. ANSELL. Here.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I know there are a great many of them.

Mr. ANSELL. I advert again to the fact, however, that the president of the special clemency board who succeeded me and who shared my views as to clemency, after or about the time that he had entered upon the examination of these European cases, was relieved.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is Col. Weeks?

Mr. ANSELL. Col. Weeks.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Who is acting now as president of that board?

Mr. ANSELL. I have not heard, sir. So much for the administration of justice through clemency. I had taken, along collaterally with the administration of clemency, the investigation that the War Department was carrying on with relation to the administration of military justice, and I think that the results of the War Department activities, as known to the public, must indicate to every fair-minded man that the War Department has at last, through a statement made to the press through the Secretary of War, declared its real state of mind and its adherence to the reactionary policies of the regular establishment, a thing that evidently it was apprehensive of doing in the early stages of the controversy. Though the Secretary at first stated there had been no injustice, he later stated that he agreed in large part with those principles which I enunciated, which were predicated upon the assumption that the system in and of itself inevitably led to injustice; and, second, its administration had not helped it out much. He said he agreed largely with my views and principles.

I was invited to draft a bill. The public generally thought that the War Department was going to take a more liberal attitude.

The Inspector General of the Army was then directed to investigate the subject of military justice in some of its aspects—doubtless, the relation that I had to it.

This Inspector General of the Army was the very same bureau chief whom I had called reactionary in the early days of the war, and who had joined strongly with the other bureaus of the War Department to protest and resist the establishment of any revisory power in the War Department. I was called on by him to state my side of the case, and I declined to do it. I was not going to be put in the position of the gentleman who admits the jurisdiction and fairness of the court, and then has to console himself by adjourning to the nearest corner grocery store and cussing out the court. This officer, I said, was not competent to make an investigation, first, because he was the Secretary's minion; secondly, because he was not legally qualified; and thirdly, because he was a prejudiced party. He was deeply prejudiced. I stated that to the Secretary of War and I stated it to him in a memorandum of March 10, and I wish that that memorandum may be included in the record here. It is probably brief. I do not have it now, but I will get it later.

Senator LENROOT. It may be inserted.

The paper referred to is here printed in full, as follows:

ANSELL EXHIBIT W.

The Inspector General:

1. You state no specific controversy or issue which you are to investigate or to which I could intelligently address a statement if I deemed it advisable so to do.

2. If, as seems to be the case, the investigation has to do with my statement before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, that statement for which, of course, I am responsible speaks for itself.

3. Above all, however, it is my judgment that any adequate and helpful investigation of the existing system of military justice and the administration of it during this war falls beyond your province. That subject, my attitude toward it, and my connection with it, are not, when fairly considered, particular incidents to which your special capacity of inquiry can be properly applied; they are extradepartmental; they involve fundamental and general considerations of law and justice, the scope of which can not justly be confined to the War Department or any bureau of it, and which are entirely beyond your legal competency.

4. Besides, whatever of controversy has arisen upon these fundamental considerations, concerning which I have given expression to my views, directly involves the Secretary of War, whose subordinate you are. Even more; it directly involves you and your office as well. I beg to remind you what the record will show, that in my original endeavor made near the beginning of the war to subject courts-martial to departmental supervision and control, the Secretary of War, the Assistant Chief of Staff, the Judge Advocate General, and the Inspector General opposed. I had occasion then, in a brief filed with the Secretary of War and read into my recent statement before the committee, to comment upon the views of these military advisers of the Secretary of War and to pronounce them professional absolutists upon this question of military justice. They and you stood upon the one side of this so-called controversy and I upon the other. I can not, therefore, but regard you and your office as disqualified to make a full, fair, and impartial investigation.

5. Knowing nothing specific of the subject, scope, and purpose of your investigation and excepting, as I do and for the reason given, to your jurisdictional competency, and likewise to your fair qualifications, to make such an investigation as that which you contemplate, affecting me, I am not inclined to have aught to do with it, voluntarily.

S. T. ANSELL.

Mr. ANSELL. There was a so-called investigation by Gen. Chamberlain. I have no hesitancy in saying to this committee that the methods pursued in that investigation were such as to show clearly that it could not have been fair, and it was not fair. This investigation is an instance illustrative of something besides the mere personality involved. It illustrates the basic theory with which the Inspector General's Department makes preliminary investigations of suspected dereliction of duty.

The Inspector General, whom I had long known, after I had in the beginning declined in writing to participate in any investigation—that is, voluntarily to participate in any investigation—conducted by him, and when he was about to close his investigation, called me officially to his office and put me under oath and began to question me. I declined to proceed, upon the grounds previously indicated. He then advised me in a fraternal, paternal sort of way, to take part in this investigation, but I still declined to do so, repeating to him the reasons that I had formerly expressed on paper. And then the Inspector General, in my judgment forgetting whatever quasi-judicial character belongs to his position—and there ought to be a great deal to it—said, “You know, I am making a report on this subject by order of the Secretary of War. This thing is in Congress, and my report will go to Congress; and, Ansell, when it goes to Congress it will be very detrimental to you;” and I said, “Well, General, I would rather meet you in Congress than deal with you here.”

That statement was made with all the influence that office can put back of it. Now, that was of sinister significance; it is symptomatic of a general condition. When the Inspector General or the Inspector General's Department goes out to investigate a case, the evidence is that all too frequently a man less able than I, perhaps, to stand that test and protect himself, is imposed upon and induced to act in response to such a statement as that, which was a mild third degree; in my case it was a menace, a threat that unless I played the departmental rôle the report was going in against me, would be published broadcast to the world, and would be very detrimental to me, notwithstanding the fact that, as I said, the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff, the very people whom I had opposed in this controversy from the very beginning and whom I was still opposing, were not in any position to make any investigation of me that could be fair or helpful.

A very interesting little thing came out during the investigation of the American Bar Association. Maj. Copp, a member of this special clemency board of review, put there by Gen. Crowder because he shared Gen. Crowder's views with respect to the administration of military justice and clemency, testified before the American Bar Association to the effect that the Inspector General's Department did habitually in the camp and division in which he served compel testimony out of the suspect or the accused, and then used it against him.

Maj. Copp, speaking out of what he described as his experience as a judge advocate in a division during this war, said that it was customary for the Inspector General's Department to compel, by virtue of the power of office, a man to incriminate himself. When the committee asked him time and time again, “Do you know this to be true?” he said, “Yes; because I not only observed it, but the representatives of the Inspector General's Department at the camp where I was stationed admitted that to be a fact.”

That promptly brought a denial from the Inspector General, who appeared on the stand the next day and explained and denied; but any man who knows the Army, and any man who knows the great gulf between the officer and the enlisted man, and any man who knows the great power that an inspector has in conducting these investigations and what little legal appreciation he has, knows that there ought to be some law against permitting the Inspector General's Department of the Army to use these third-degree methods of menaces and threats, and taking advantage of the innocence or ignorance or the unhappy lot of the enlisted man.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. These are the inspections which precede of the charge?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And the charge is based on these investigations?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; in certain cases. Of course, there is not an Inspector General's investigation made in every case. But, again, I get back to the theory that such an investigation should be quasi-judicial, and ought to be conducted by officials who know some law and who have some respect for what our civilization has prescribed for the protection of a man suspected of crime. And such is not so. The methods pursued by the War Department with respect to this bar examination, and the investigation made by the committee of the American Bar Association here, foreshadowed what is now seen to be the department's true and revealed attitude. They were going to support the existing system. They believed in it. That committee of the American Bar Association came here, got into touch with the War Department and the Judge Advocate General of the Army, got a list of witnesses from them, and called those witnesses and no other witnesses until just about four days before their hearings, which had extended over four or five weeks, were about to close. They then, condescendingly, gave me an opportunity to appear, and called one other officer voicing my views; and then they asked me if I had a list of names of gentlemen who might appear, presumably in advocacy of my side of the matter, and when I had handed in that list, they left the next day or the second day following—within 48 hours—before any but one of those gentlemen could get here, even at their own expense. They did hear one man who happened to be in New York. But that investigation had been proclaimed abroad as an investigation conducted by the American Bar Association committee. I think this committee ought to know the kind of investigation it conducted, because the report of that Bar Association committee is going to be used, of course, by the War Department to influence legislation. That investigation was never a fair investigation, and I appeared before the committee and charged them with that fact then and there.

Take first of all the witnesses. The witnesses who were called to appear before that investigating body were called by the War Department, denominated by the War Department; their expenses were paid, and it was called official duty necessary in the military service. These major generals, with the great title and power of office, who came here, told the committee that if you disturbed this system the discipline of the Army would be ruined, were on official business; and the War Department said at the time to one of these major generals here, "We are calling as witnesses before that committee those who can present the ultra-military view"; and so that Bar Association committee sat there and heard and drank in the ultra-military view, and they heard nothing else except as I, single handed, aided by one other officer, could present.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did you not, as a matter of fact, charge the committee itself with being a packed committee?

Mr. ANSELL. I did; and if this committee will permit me, I would like to put that in the record here, because I know you are going to have the report of that bar association committee here. I have not got my statement here, but I have got it. I presented it to the president of the American Bar Association, who is, by the way, president of the executive committee; and I believe I have proved the case, too. With your permission, I will insert that letter.

The letter referred to is here printed in full, as follows:

ANSELL EXHIBIT X.

JULY 17, 1919.

HON. GEORGE T. PAGE,

President American Bar Association.

SIR: In March last, pursuant to the resolution of the executive committee of the association, you appointed a special committee, consisting of Hon. S. S. Gregory, chairman, Chicago, Ill.; Judge W. P. Bynum, Greensboro, N. C.; Mr. Martin Conboy, New York City; Prof. Andrew A. Bruce, Minneapolis, Minn.; and Mr. John Hinckley, Baltimore, Md., to inquire into the status of our military law relating to courts martial, directing that they report the results of their investigations, together with their recommendations, to the executive committee.

This special inquiry was brought about by the many complaints made during the war against the existing system of military justice, and its purpose was, of course, to acquaint the association with the actual situation with respect to the administration of military justice and to put it in a position to make an effort and exert its influence toward a reform of the existing system of military justice if the investigation should reveal deficiencies calling for remedial legislation and if the association should see fit to take action. Such a purpose required that the personnel of the investigating committee should be generally well qualified to conduct an investigation and should be capable of appreciating the place that military justice should have in our institutions, the great interest our people have in it, and, above all, the necessity that not only must justice be done in our Army, but that our people and our soldiery should have the assurance that justice is done therein. Every member of that committee should have entered upon and pursued his duties with the loftiest conception of them and their importance, and while every member should have been free from, and kept himself free from, any influence of the partisanship and personal controversy that unfortunately have been injected into this discussion, even to the point where the real issue has been obscured, still the committee, if its investigation was worth the making at all, should have heard all sides of the question fully, fairly, and impartially. This, in my judgment, the committee has not done.

The minutes show that the committee immediately got in touch and conferred with the authorities who have proclaimed the perfection of the present system and decreed the punishment of those who opposed it, but they did not confer with any who disagreed with those authorities, so far as known. The minutes show that they conferred with the Secretary of War, the Chief of Staff, the Judge Advocate General of the Army, and the Acting Judge Advocate General of the Army, who had just been brought here from France to supersede me, so that the departmental view might be impregably maintained. All these officials are uncompromising advocates of the existing system, and two of them—the Secretary of War and the Judge Advocate General of the Army—are bitterly and personally resentful of the criticism which I made of the existing system in testifying before the Senate Military Committee and for which I was promptly punished by the Secretary of War by demotion and removal from my office. Notwithstanding this, notwithstanding the fact that I had made the criticism as a result of my experience as Acting Judge Advocate General during the war, and notwithstanding my professional reputation and well-known record in the Army, I was avoided and ignored by the committee until they were, according to the announcement of the chairman, on the eve of closing their hearings.

When I appeared before the committee I deemed it my duty to say to them, and though it was disagreeable to me I did say to them, that the committee had clearly manifested a disposition to hear but one side of the case; that they had conferred only with those who were intent upon retaining the existing system; and that, with a single exception, they had heard only those officials who voiced the view of military authority that the existing system is satisfactory and had resulted in no unnecessary injustice during the war. I also said to them that I believed, and I gave them my reasons for so believing, that one member of the committee was such a close associate of that official who had been foremost in his exertions to maintain the existing system (the Judge Advocate General of the Army) and such a pronounced partisan of him and his views that such member was disqualified to sit upon the committee. Notwithstanding that the chairman of the committee announced to me just before I began my statement that the hearings were about to close, he subsequently advised me that there might be further hearings in Chicago, and such hearings were had.

I have just read all the minutes of the investigation. Now, more than ever, I am convinced of my duty. As a lawyer, as a member of the association, and, above all, as an officer of the Army intensely interested in the establishment of a system of law that will enable and, if possible, require justice to be done in the Army to the enlisted man no less than to the officer, I protest anew against the fairness of some of the members of the committee and the partiality of its proceedings. And I request that the entire record of the proceedings of this special committee be placed before the executive committee in order that they may learn the kind of hearing that was actually had and see upon what the special committee has based its report and recommendation. In my judgment the one-sided character of the investigation must destroy all reliance upon the report and recommendations, whether they are favorable or unfavorable to a liberalization of the existing code. If favorable, they must have been affected by influences de hors the record; if unfavorable, they will but be in accord with the unfair and biased character of the investigation.

The record will show that the conduct of the member whom I asked to disqualify himself was, throughout the hearing, one of oppugnance to any criticism of the existing system. The record will show that he failed to appreciate that his was a position requiring judicial conduct and fairness, and that, instead he adopted the attitude of a resourceful attorney advocating the retention of the system and laboring to secure the vindication of those who insist that the system has resulted in no injustice and not only ought to be retained but must be retained if the iron discipline assumed by them to be necessary to American military efficiency is to be retained. Witnesses who supported the system, who hailed it as superior to any civil system of justice, or who admitting its harshness condoned it on the ground that military discipline and military justice can not exist together, were led on by him and supplied with better statements than they themselves were able to make in so bad a cause.

The few witnesses—pitiably few and generally of inferior rank and humbler station in life—who expressed opposition to the system he treated with an apparent inconsideration. His questions touching the views of those opposing the present system were of a character not to elicit the truth but rather to suppress it, and his participation in the hearings succeeded, more than anything else, in establishing upon the record these propositions so orthodox and current in highest military circles: That any system of military discipline must be arbitrary, must be governed not by law but by the will of military commanders, and that our system during the war while necessarily a tyranny was a most benevolent tyranny. Notwithstanding the record facts that there have been some 30,000 general courts-martial and 340,000 inferior courts-martial within the period of a year, in which our Army could have averaged little more than 2,000,000 men, one must have believed, if one could have believed the witnesses appearing before the committee, that courts-martial were all but unknown in our Army.

I insist also that the record will show that another member of the committee was not fairly fitted for his duty. He bears the military title of colonel, and I infer from statements made by him designed to exhibit a familiarity with military administration that he was once in the National Guard and as such saw active service in the Spanish War and in more recent mobilizations on the Mexican border. Both gentlemen came to the investigation with minds foreclosed. The former supported the system because of his regard for its chief sponsor; the latter supported it out of his professional regard for the system itself. This latter member is an example of that rigid adherence to professionalism sometimes found in those who have a commendable interest in, but do not practice, the profession itself. An examination of the record will reveal that the mind of this member, like that of the other mentioned, was foreclosed and that his appreciations were impervious to any suggestion of needed reform.

These gentlemen and the course pursued by them have not been without their influence upon the other members of the committee. All the members who sat in Chicago (Judge Bynum, of North Carolina, did not sit, most unfortunately for the cause of military justice, I think) expressed themselves toward the close of the hearing in such a way as to clearly indicate that the course pursued and the great weight of statement elicited had inclined if not persuaded them to an acceptance of the militaristic arguments relied upon to sustain the present system. These arguments were used with telling effect against the bill drafted by me and embodying the principle that military justice should be regulated by law and not be dependent upon the will of the military commander. Notwithstanding that that bill is the only affirmative proposal that has ever been made toward an amelioration of the soldiers' present disciplinary condition, the committee had it subjected to hostile and uninformed analysis in the office of the Judge Advocate General and then had the officer who had made the analysis ordered by the War Department to appear before them and present his criticisms of the bill. These views, prejudiced and uncomprehending, served to convey the most unfair impression to the committee and, in the absence of any better understanding by the committee, served as the basis of much adverse expression from them. Members of the committee, when nearing the close of the hearings, reiterated the military orthodoxies that it was one of the purposes and would be the legal effect of that bill to transfer the discipline of the Army out of the hands of the military commander into those of the Judge Advocate General, whereas the slightest understanding of the bill would have shown that the bill did nothing more in this respect than require the military commander to administer discipline in accordance with law, and lodged in the law officer the power to determine questions of pure law only.

Of course, if the hearings were to be fair and impartial, the committee should have been equally desirous of hearing witnesses on both sides and should have, if possible, secured equal facilities for their appearance. Many high ranking officers of the Regular Army appeared before the committee, either at their request or suggestion made to the War Department, or upon the initiative of the department itself. These men supported the existing system, some ardently and some less so. I have made inquiry of several of them and find in every case that their appearance was regarded by the department as a military duty found by it to be necessary in the military service, and that appearing on duty in accordance with the directions of the department, they received their pay and traveling allowances therefor. The committee did not ask the department, so far as I am advised, to direct any officer of the Army whose name was cited by me, to appear before it, and consequently any officer or other person whom I desired called in opposition to the system could appear only by taking leave, if he were entitled to leave, and at his own expense. In other words, the Government procured for the committee the military witnesses to defend the system but none to oppose it. It is known here in the department, whether the committee knew it or not, that while the committee was sitting here in Washington the highest military authority in the department said that they were "ordering before the committee those who could give the military view"; that is, the departmental view, and the committee got little else.

Take one example: The committee might well have heard my exposition of the bill drafted by me, might have heard my statement in favorable explanation of it, as well as the views of the office of the Judge Advocate General in condemnation of it. The committee requested that the department have Col. West, the officer of the Judge Advocate General's Department, who had made a careless and unfavorable study of the bill, to appear before them in Chicago, and he did appear by order of the department, in Government time and at Government expense, and did condemn the bill, condemned it really with only the slightest comprehension of it. The committee also notified me that they would hear me at Chicago, if I chose to appear, but did not request the department to send me to Chicago. My appearance, of course, would have had to be in my own time and at my own expense.

These matters, while they may appear to be relatively unimportant, at least to the affluent and those who are indifferent to the subject, are nevertheless not only significant of the attitude of the committee and the department but were very real obstacles to a fair presentation of the question as well. In my own case, having nothing of this world's goods, and having expended already too much of my meager salary in behalf of the advancement of the cause of military justice, it would have been a hardship for me to go to Chicago at my own expense. Besides, a sense of propriety forbade me to ask others to appear there in my own behalf. Was it not the plain duty of the committee to request the War Department to furnish at its own expense the witnesses against the system, as well as those in favor of it?

The hearing has not been thorough, and it has not been fair. It has not been helpful. Indeed, it has been very harmful. I ask that the executive committee of the American Bar Association themselves consider carefully this important question, that they study the record of the proceedings conducted by said committee, and that they give consideration to the statement of protest made by me to that committee here in Washington, and also to this letter which I ask you kindly to forward them.

Hoping you will do me the favor to comply with my request, I have the honor to be, sir,

Yours, very respectfully,

S. T. ANSELL.

Mr. ANSELL. I said that two of the members were committed from the beginning to the other side, and had so declared themselves, and they were chosen as the result, whether they knew it or not, of strenuous efforts being made by the War Department to bolster up their cause. It is true. And not only that, but I say that the action of that committee is proof positive to the mind of any man in calling and hearing those witnesses and having the War Department pay their expenses and their mileage, and giving no man on the other side the right to be heard, except by coming here at his own expense, except as to any who happened already to be here.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did the War Department pay, or offer to pay, the expenses of witnesses against the system?

Mr. ANSELL. No, sir; nor did the War Department go so far as to ask to be furnished witnesses on the other side. I did suggest witnesses to the committee of the American Bar Association, but in their telegrams or letters sent out, about which some of the witnesses have told me, they put the cautionary statement, "We have no funds to pay for your attendance here, and if you do so, you will do so at your own expense;" and the witnesses had no time to come here, because my side of the case, so-called, was not even given the opportunity to be heard until just a day or two before the committee was to go.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. How long had they been in session then?

Mr. ANSELL. Four or five weeks. I had no knowledge of it, except the knowledge of the street, although they were in frequent contact with the Secretary of War and the Acting Judge Advocate General and the Inspector General. Whatever respect anybody else may have for such a committee, I for one, as long as I live, will not express any respect for any such committee, no matter how high it may be, or whatever association it may be a part of.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Have you finished with that branch? Because I want to ask you this question: Before that committee had an opportunity to make any report, there seems to have been an uneasiness somewhere along the line that induced the Secretary of War to appoint a strictly military tribunal.

Mr. ANSELL. Oh, yes; I am coming to that. It was thought—that was in the air—that this bar committee report might be unfavorable to the department. That was not so obvious to me, because two of the members were stacked, and the personnel had been picked; the committee had been hand picked and personally conducted by the department satellites.

But the chairman of the committee, during the hearings, came right out and declared himself as a reformer of this system while I was appearing before the committee. He said that he could hardly speak for the committee, but that he was going to say that he was going to recommend that the evils of this system should be torn up by the roots and another substituted. The old gentleman spoke more rabidly on the subject, probably, while he was talking, than he spoke in his report. Is of that type.

Another committee was appointed by the Secretary immediately upon his return from France. That committee consisted of Maj. Gen. Kernan, who has been advertised not only as a most distinguished soldier but a most distinguished lawyer, a quality that was unknown in him theretofore; Maj. Gen. O'Ryan, a major general of the New York National Guard, in high favor with the present administration; Lieut. Col. Ogden, of The Adjutant General's Department; and one Lieut. Col. Barrows, of the Regular Army. Of course, I know these gentlemen. I know these gentlemen rather well—their personalities, their habits of thought, and something of their views with respect to the Military Establishment. If the Secretary of War had gone out designedly to appoint the most reactionary set of men in the United States he could not have improved upon his selection—Maj. Gen. Kernan, Maj. Gen. O'Ryan, Lieut. Col. Barrows, and Lieut. Col. Ogden.

Senator LENROOT. How many of these are Regular Army officers?

Mr. ANSELL. I have that report here. Two are Regulars, one a National Guardsman, and the other is a National Army man. Lieut. Col. Ogden is a Boston lawyer of the Judge Advocate General's Department, who shares strenuously the view that is expressed in this report, that courts-martial have got to be the right arm of the Executive, controlled and guided by him at every point.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is the so-called Kernan report, which is on file?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt you there for just a moment? Were you called before that board?

Mr. ANSELL. We all got a circular letter to express our views in writing. I do not mind saying that I knew what the report of this board would be, and I was not going to waste any time in arguing before a prejudiced forum. There is no need of it. And I will say to you that many another man of rank greater than mine shared my views on that and did not put in a report. It was a foregone conclusion what that report would say.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Even that report recommends some 20,000 alterations.

Mr. ANSELL. Oh, yes. Not systemic; not substantial. I think, while we had all anticipated that this report would be a reactionary one, largely sustaining the existing system, nobody, even on the other side, anticipated that it would be so reactionary as it is. I have just one bit of respect for it. It is a frank, fearless statement of the opposite view, and the War Department had been afraid to make any such statement as that before; but this report—and it is well written, concisely written, and it is a good exposition of the reactionary view—the Secretary of War has approved in toto.

Senator LENROOT. At some point in your testimony I would like to have you go through that report in detail.

Mr. ANSELL. I want to do it, sir. I mention this here to show you the extent to which the gentlemen on the other side are driven to support this view against the creation of some tribunal—appellate tribunal, if you want to call it that—to keep courts-martial in check. The committee had only one lawyer, really, on it, because Maj. Gen. O’Ryan should not any more be called a lawyer, and though he once practiced, he has been a soldier now these many years. But here is this ultra-military committee taking up 7 pages of its not long report—only 18 pages altogether—with a discussion of the legal proposition that it is not within the power of the Congress of the United States to create any such tribunal, an argument that, from a legal viewpoint, is nothing less than absurd.

I promised this committee the other day to put in the record at the proper place the record I had of at least one of the death cases from France, one that was really typical of the four, as the committee may remember, which I will do, and the incidental papers connected with that—that is, the views of the Judge Advocate General and the Chief of Staff and Gen. Pershing—and I have done so.

Senator LENROOT. That is the complete record?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes, sir.

Senator LENROOT. Let it be inserted.

Mr. ANSELL. I also was requested—or asked permission of the committee, I have forgotten which, it does not make any difference—to put into the record a letter mentioned by the press, from the Secretary of War, and the President’s reply, which is entirely congratulatory of the results of the pardons that the President has issued in two of the cases. Of course, the article fails to mention what happened to the other two, and when I last heard of them in the War Department they were serving terms in the penitentiary.

They proceeded, of course, on the theory that these young men were properly convicted—one of them now dead and the other discharged, badly wounded—that they were convicted, and that the pardon was an act of wonderful grace; whereas I will say to you gentlemen as lawyers that if you ever get the time to look at this record you will find, and can not help finding, that pardon came in this case not as an act of grace but as an effort to correct, as far as he could, the illegality of the judgment itself.

Now, going back and taking up the vices of the existing system—

Senator LENROOT. Let me understand you. As I recollect those two cases, they plead guilty to the charge of being asleep on post?

Mr. ANSELL. They pleaded not guilty. The drill people pleaded guilty.

I have a little memorandum here which I hope will explain such differences as there are between the four cases; but, taking them by and large, the four cases are really illustrative of the same points of illegality. Of course, the plea of guilty might be held to be conclusive, and it would be if the plea of guilty were taken providently, with a court that saw it was taken providently, and with counsel there to guard the making of the plea. Of course, we know what that means in the usual civil forum. But it is not so here.

Now, coming to discuss as briefly as my interest in these propositions will permit me, the proposition illustrative of the views of this system.

I had intended to add, day before yesterday, the statement I made replying to the statement of the Secretary of War and the Judge Advocate General, heretofore referred to in the record, as presenting my side of that question. It was this document that the Secretary of War declined to give publicity to.

Senator LENROOT. It may be inserted.

The communication referred to is here printed in the record, as follows:

ANSELL EXHIBIT Y.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 11, 1919.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF WAR,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: The press yesterday morning carried statements made by you and by Gen. Crowder, Judge Advocate General of the Army, in defense of the criticisms now being made against the existing system of military justice and the departmental methods of administering it. A representative of the press has just supplied me with an authorized statement. It is dated March 8, marked for release for the morning newspapers of Monday, March 10, and consists of a letter under date of March 1, signed by the Secretary of War, but evidently prepared in the office of the Judge Advocate General, in which the Judge Advocate General is requested to respond with a statement "which will permit ready perusal by the intelligent men and women who are so deeply interested in this subject." The letter of the Secretary is one voicing general support of the system, a declaration of his faith in the justice of the system and of confidence in the Judge Advocate General and in condemnation of my own attitude and view with respect to that momentous subject. The statement of the Judge Advocate General is one that speaks in warm support of the system and in justification of his own responsibility for it, and in considerable part consists of severe personal criticism and accusation of me because of my efforts, in the face of his opposition, to modify the existing system so that a fair meed of justice to our enlisted men might be assured. The letter of the Secretary was designed as a vehicle for placing before the public Gen. Crowder's statement in reply, which contains imputations upon my personal and official conduct which in justice and honor I can not permit to go unchallenged. Since the Secretary himself chose this means to give to the public a bitter attack upon me, it is but common fairness and justice, and I, therefore, accordingly request that the same office should give to the public this statement of mine which is designed to show the same intelligent men and women, the only forum now left to me, the character of the issues made by those who are opposed to me and my views, the extent to which they go and the methods which they employ to support and maintain a system which well-advised opinion pronounces bad, and which those most familiar with it know has necessarily and inevitably led to injustice in the Army.

The Secretary of War says:

"My own acquaintance with the course of military justice (gathered, as it is, from the large number of cases which in the regular routine come to me for final action), convinces me that the conditions implied by these recent complaints do not exist and had not existed."

This is the Secretary of War's opinion. It is based upon inadequate evidence, very limited observation, and the statements of biased witnesses. It is enough to say that under the existing system the Secretary of War sees and takes action only upon that relatively insignificant number of cases which are required under existing law to go to the President for confirmation. These few cases consist for the most part of sentences of dismissal of commissioned officers. These are not the class of cases in which appear the injustice of which I complain. The court-martial system is such and the regard for rank in the Army is such that a commissioned officer appears before a court-martial to far better advantage than does a private soldier. The Secretary of War believes that conditions of injustice do not exist. When he denied this department the revisory power over all courts-martial cases, he denied himself the opportunity to keep in touch with the administration of justice throughout the Army, and he speaks from the knowledge obtained from only a part of the cases of commissioned officers tried, and from those alone who are interested in supporting the existing system. I say the system does not do justice. It does injustice—gross, terrible, spirit-crushing injustice. Evidence of it is on every hand to those who will but see. The records of this office reek with it. The organization of the clemency board now sitting daily and daily recommending clemency in a hundred cases is a confession of it. Clemency, however, can never efface the injustice done. In my judgment the Army will never hold the place it ought to hold in the faith and affections of our people, until the machinery for doing military justice be humanized.

The statement of the Judge Advocate General is a dexterous effort to divert public attention from the system of injustice, which he defends, and the pater-nity, of which he proudly proclaims, to mere personal differences which are not, or must soon cease to be, of public moment. When, in so far as it is necessary for his purpose for him to do so, he discusses the system, he becomes involved in inextricable confusion and patent inconsistencies. In one and the same breath he declares the system unusually excellent and then complains that Congress has failed to impose upon and above it a needed organ empowered to subject it to legal control; he declares that the military law can best be administered in the field and with virtual finality, and yet he now admits that the system would be much improved by the establishment of a departmental appellate power; he contends that courts-martial should be subject, not to legal control, but only to the power of military command, but at the same time objects to assuming the responsibility for the outrageously excessive sentences awarded when courts and commanding officers go wrong without legal restraint; he admits that our soldiery must be hurriedly drawn from civilian life and from the liberal operations of the civil code, but assumes that for such reason the military code must be the more concentratedly applied; he argues that since the soldier must on occasion yield up his life on the battle field, he should not be heard to complain if it be taken away by these "courts of chivalry and honor," applying not the modern rules of right, but the mediæval principles that governed over lord and armed retainer; he says that the officers who sit in judgment upon the private soldiery can not be considered military zealots, since the civilian clothes they doffed are not yet out of style, but in the next paragraph asserts that they are steeped in military appreciations and are more competent in their place to do justice than am I, denominated a humane critic, inexperienced in military requirements; disagreeing with the Secretary of War who asserted the contrary, he says that my briefs were not addressed primarily to the desirability of the power of departmental review, but to the question whether such power had actually been granted, and then elsewhere he accuses me of endeavoring to meet the exigent necessity of review by an earnest plea based on expediency, rather than on reason or the language of the statute.

He misstates the issue by asserting that, according to my views, Gen. Pershing in the battle of the Argonne could not have subjected one of his men to court-martial without the concurrence of his judge advocate, whereas such a question is clearly not involved; all that is involved—and that much is fundamentally involved—is that the charges should not be ordered to trial until the judge advocate could say that as a matter of law the charges sufficiently allege an offense known to the law, and that there is reasonable ground to believe they can be sustained. The issue is whether the convening authority, the court, and the officer ordering the execution shall be a law unto themselves, or whether they shall be restrained by and required to keep within the limits prescribed by established principles of law; whether military justice shall be governed by the power of military command or whether it shall be the result of the application of legal principles. Asserting at one moment there is but a small margin of controversy between us, he concedes at the next that we are separated by a world-wide gulf of principles. He insists that courts-martial shall be subjected from beginning to end to the power of military command, and I declare that military justice can never be done with assurance, unless they be made responsible to applied principles of law alone, and answerable to no commander.

In his statement the Judge Advocate General recognizes some deficiencies to which he has been peculiarly blind ever before, and concurs, verbally at least, in remedies which he has ever hitherto opposed. He says that I contend that the great fault with the system is to be found in the lack of departmental power to review courts-martial proceedings and to modify or reverse unlawful judgments. I have ever contended that this was one great fault, but not the only one. As to that one fault, he now says that he agrees with me and that there is no controversy about it. But when did he become of that mind? In November, 1917, he went out of his way to reverse the opinion rendered by this office, and insisted upon misconstruing out of existing law that very power which this office had fairly found there; in doing so he not only denied that the power was to be found in existing law but contended there was nothing wrong with the absence of such a power, and also not only that there was not but, in effect, that there ought not to be in this department any such power of review. He has constantly voiced that view and acted accordingly. In his instant statement he argues that a commanding officer, in subjecting his men to courts-martial, should suffer no legal restraint, and argues as a practicality that such legal restraint would work the destruction of all discipline. In his instant statement he contends that the purpose of the Army is not to maintain justice, but to procure victory, as though the one can be achieved only at the sacrifice of the other; I say that there can be no discipline in any army without justice, and that the efficiency of our arms will ever be dependent upon the sense of our soldiery that they can expect justice.

The Judge Advocate General says that he was so much in favor of establishing an appellate power over these unjust judgments that in January, 1918, he submitted a draft of legislation for that purpose, which the committees of Congress permitted to die. It would be well for those who are interested to look up that bill. It is well that that bill was not taken seriously. That bill would have virtually put this appellate power, not in the hands of the President, but in the hands of the Chief of Staff, the highest military official, whose every instinct and element of training is ultramilitary, an official who can not be actuated by the more lenient views which characterize those familiar with legal principles or skilled in the administration of justice. It would have authorized the setting aside of an acquittal, the changing of a finding of innocence to one of guilt, and the substitution of a heavier penalty for a lighter one awarded by a court. All this is consonant with the prevailing tendency of military practice.

But did the Judge Advocate General make a bona fide effort toward the establishment of such an appellate power? Not only did he go out of his way to misconstrue that power out of the existing statutes, not only did he voice the view that the military code was one that could be most fittingly administered in the field, but there is another evidentiary circumstance that brings to my mind the absolute conviction that his efforts were not in good faith and were simply designed to allay public apprehension and inquiry. Shortly after he submitted this legislation to the committees of Congress, he took occasion to address a letter to the senior officer of the Judge Advocate General's Department in France, in which he said, with reference to an administrative palliative which he had adopted as a remedy, that it was necessary to do something to head off a threatened congressional investigation, to silence criticism, and to prevent talk about the establishment of courts of appeal, and to make it appear to the soldier that he did get some kind of revision of his proceedings other than the revision at field headquarters. It is significant also that his interest was not such as to produce subsequent effort to secure the enactment of this legislation.

It may well be that, now the constraint is removed which seemed to him to oblige him to take an opposite course, the Judge Advocate General reverts to his first view which he on one occasion expressed as one of honest intellectual approval of the effort that our office was making to establish such an appellate power in the department. That effort was made near the beginning of the war in the latter days of October, 1917, and, with the concurrence of every officer serving at that time in this department, we deduced out of 1199, Revised Statutes, that power. These views of this office were embodied in an office opinion to the Secretary of War dated November 10, 1917. It is of this opinion that Gen. Crowder in his statement says:

"Indeed, the first time I was advised of such a view was in November, 1917, on the occasion of his presenting to you—not through me and entirely without consulting me--the first of the elaborate briefs of which so much has been made."

And it is of this same brief that he later refers to in the statement as one "urging a revolution in the military system and his circulation of a document of such grave consequences among every officer in my office without giving me the slightest information of his efforts." The statements are at variance with the facts. When I came to be the head of this office in the latter days of August, 1917, Gen. Crowder at that time, doubtless placing in me the utmost confidence, came to me and said that he never intended to return to this office again; that he had always aspired to a line command and that he intended to use his office of Provost Marshal General in the raising of this new Army to secure for himself a field command. He told me to manage the office in my own way and without further reference to him.

I particularly asked whether I should consult him upon matters of general policy, and especially upon appointments, of which many would have to be made. He said, "No," but added, "If I should wish the appointment of any particular judge advocate for my special purposes, I will let you know." The study and preparation for the opinion establishing the revisory power were participated in by all the officers, covered a period of two or three weeks, and required many office conferences. One day while I was at one of the conferences Gen. Crowder appeared in the adjacent room and took up with me some matter of common interest. I took that occasion to tell him what the office was then engaged upon and the subject of the conference in the next room. I explained to him the necessity of discovering some means for correcting the grave injustice done to a large number of noncommissioned officers who had been very unjustly tried and convicted in Texas, the record of which trial had just reached the office. I told him my view that with the new Army it was absolutely essential to establish some such revisory power and that I was delighted to find that the office was about to agree unanimously that section 1199, Revised Statutes, was designed for that very purpose. His reply to me, in words that are impressed upon my memory, was:

He then adverted to the fact that he himself had drafted and had had enacted that particular article, and added that, of course, it was never designed to prevent any such power. I then returned to the conference and announced to my associates that Gen. Crowder had spoken with approval of our course. Under my instructions, I did not have to consult him, and did so only because it was convenient and appropriate for me to do so on this occasion.

I knew of no change of attitude in him until shortly thereafter I was advised in the department that he was preparing a brief in opposition to the office view, and two or three days thereafter he resumed charge of the office and filed the brief. When I found this to be so, I went to Gen. Crowder and accosted him about his change of attitude. In explanation thereof he said:

"Ansell, I had to go back on you. I am sorry, but it was necessary to do it in order to save my official reputation."

He then added that he was nearing the end of his service; that he could not afford to be held responsible for the injustice that had gone on, if the existing law could have been construed to prevent it. He further adverted to the fact that fixing such a responsibility upon him would injure his career in this war. Upon my having told him that I was unable to see how he was responsible for a practice that had continued for nearly 40 years, he went on to say that the Secretary of War held him personally responsible; that the Secretary of War had seen him at the Army and Navy Club shortly after I had filed my opinion and had "upbraided" him for sitting by during the time that he had been Judge Advocate General and permitting this injustice to go uncorrected; that the Secretary had particularly asked him how long he had been Judge Advocate General and charged him with his failure to seek a remedy for the situation which I had presented. Gen. Crowder then said that, humiliated by such imputation, he had gone back to the Provost Marshal General's office, had consulted some of his friends there, and had decided that it was necessary for his self-protection to oppose the opinion this office had written and the effort it had made to establish this power, and that two of the officers there had helped him to prepare the counter memorandum.

It is obvious that Gen. Crowder committed himself to the opposing view, a view which he has ever thereafter maintained, out of a mistaken notion of the necessity of self-protection and a desire to soothe his wounded pride.

Gen. Crowder further says that the order appointing me Acting Judge Advocate General, and subsequently revoked, had never been published, but was obtained by me from the Chief of Staff without consulting the Secretary of War and without his knowledge. With respect to this order, he says:

"Gen. Ansell asked me in a formal written memorandum to help him secure an order appointing him Acting Judge Advocate General in charge of my functions. I did not wish to be relieved but did not wish to embarrass you. I therefore replied in writing that he could take the matter up directly with the Secretary of War in his own way. He did not take the matter up with the Secretary of War in his own way. He did with the Acting Chief of Staff, with the remark that I concurred. Upon this showing the Chief of Staff marked the draft of an order that Gen. Ansell had prepared for suspended publication. By accident I learned of this order."

This statement reproduces a story far different from what actually occurred. The facts are these: Col. White, the executive officer of the department, called my attention to the fact that I was directing the policy of the office and exercising sole power, but had never been designated so to do under section 1132, Revised Statutes, and that for my protection I should place the matter before the department and suggest that I be designated in accordance with the statute. I told him that I ought to confer with Gen. Crowder, called up his office on the telephone and found that he was out, and then wrote a memorandum, the purpose of which was not to help me secure an order for my own benefit but to present an official situation to him as it had been presented to me. I recommended for purely official reasons that such an order should issue, and asked whether or not he concurred. He replied by memorandum, saying:

"It will be entirely agreeable to me to have you take up directly and in your own way with the Secretary of War the subject matter of your letter of yesterday."

It never occurred to me that this language was not other than frank and candid, and that his agreement was conditioned upon personal presentation to the Secretary of War. I took it up, as I took up all other official business, except when the Secretary of War had manifested a desire for personal conference; that is, I filed a memorandum with the Chief of Staff, in which I used the language of Gen. Crowder, and in due course I was furnished with a typewritten copy of the order, signed by the Chief of Staff, by order of the Secretary of War. I know nothing about any mark on the order for suspended publication, nor do I know what that term means. I only know that I got the usual typewritten copy of the order. I saw nobody in person on the subject. Everything was done officially and by written memorandum. Surely Gen. Crowder will not now deny that he concurred in the step taken—namely, that I should be designated by order to control the policy of the office, since I was responsible for all the work—and he can not deny that in such matters the Chief of Staff acts for the Secretary of War, and that regulations require that normal transaction of business through him.

A reference to the order itself will show that it is not in the form in which I recommended it, but that it proceeds to confirm the verbal directions which it was assumed the Secretary of War had previously given. The language of the order is this:

"By direction of the President and in accordance with section 32 of the Revised Statutes, the verbal orders of the Secretary of War of the date of August 11, 1917, designating Brig. Gen. Samuel T. Ansell, Judge Advocate, National Army, as Acting Judge Advocate General of the Army are hereby confirmed and made of record, and he will continue to take charge of the office and perform the duties of the Judge Advocate General of the Army until further orders and during the absence of the chief of that bureau upon other duty."

Gen. Crowder says nothing from the truth than that I was relieved from duty in connection with the administration of military justice when I filed the original brief. He surely can not mean this. He returned at that time, took over the duties of the office, and sent all matters to my desk for my views and supervision before presentation to him, except matters affecting military justice. He established for the officer in charge of that division of work a direct relation and channel of intercourse whereby the work of the Division of Military Justice was not subjected to my supervision or to that of

Col. Mayes, my immediate assistant. Both Col. Mayes and I believed that this method of office administration of military justice was bad, and on April 15, just before sailing for France, having been invited by Gen. Crowder to express my views upon the management of the office, I frankly told him so. The fact is, from the middle of November, 1917, until the 19th day of April, 1918, when I left for Europe, I had nothing to do with the administration of military justice and, of course, nothing to do with it until after my return.

I have not shared the view that the department has done all it could under existing law. I so organized this office as to achieve much in spite of the law as the department has construed it and in spite of the departmental practice and orders. I have at all times insisted upon the location of revisory power in this department, and I have said, and said in the beginning, that while I prefer that that power be located in the highest law officer of the Army, I was content to have it located in the department somewhere. This was not done. From the time of Gen. Crowder's return to the office in November, 1917, to the time I left for Europe in April, 1918, I urged in several memoranda the necessity of closer supervision of courts-martial procedure.

I filed a report upon returning from Europe that indicated to my mind what I once said to the Secretary of War, that the enlisted man in our Army receives less protection before a court-martial than an enlisted man in any other army with which we were associated. I organized two boards of review in this office, but they were limited by orders of the War Department to giving advice. I instructed the reviewing officers of this department themselves to submit cases for clemency upon their initiative, notwithstanding the fact that by general orders of the War Department this department was limited to advising simply upon the question of legality and clemency, consideration could be had only upon application, and application could be had only once in six months.

If responsibility for such maladministration as has existed in this office is to be located, it must be located first upon the Secretary of War. He specially instructed me in November that no matters of particular importance, no matter concerning the policies of the office, and no matters concerning appointments should be dealt with by me, except with the approval of the Judge Advocate General himself. The difficulties of administration have been due to the fact that I have been in fact responsible for the output, but have had no authority of direction or choice of help and means. That authority was reserved for Gen. Crowder, who had but little time and attention for this office. He knew little or nothing about the administration of this office during this war and was entirely absorbed and consumed in his other duties. Though charged by the Secretary of War with the policies of this office, he was at the same time the provost marshal general, member of the war council, and, as it was termed in the department for a while, legislative liaison officer. It was impossible for one man to be both provost marshal general, judge advocate general of the Army, and war counsellor and do his duty by either place, and this I clearly showed him when in November, 1917, I asked for the issuance of an order under section 1132 designating me, the senior officer in the office, as in charge of the policies of this office. It was a case in which Gen. Crowder desired and the Secretary of War permitted him to assume more duties, duties that were in no sense related, than a man of greater capacity than Gen. Crowder could carry. This was bad administration, operated to the great injury of this department. It proved an insuperable obstacle.

Gen. Crowder takes credit that the existing clemency board, upon which I am still held as the president, was established by him upon his return to this office, as though he discovered the situation necessitating it. As a matter of fact that board came about from a report that I filed with the Secretary of War during Gen. Crowder's absence—a report showing that the situation was fast growing intolerable, due to the more strenuous efforts that were being made to maintain a certain rigid standard of discipline after the signing of the armistice.

I am charged with being a new convert to these views, and that during the revision of the Articles of War and before I contributed no constructive ideas. The views I now hold I have held since my cadet days. I held them and expressed them throughout my seven years of instructorship at West Point. I held them and practiced them, so far as able, in my company, as those who served with me would testify. In 1906, in the celebrated case of Grafton against the United States, then pending in the Supreme Court, Grafton, the soldier appellant, having no money for the employment of counsel, I asked the permission of the War Department to represent him as counsel, inasmuch as I desired to establish in that case what I think the court did establish, that courts-martial are subject to the great principles of the bill of rights. Gen. Crowder himself must remember my correspondence with him in 1911, in which I expressed the opinion that the revision proposed by him was not sufficiently liberal, and he must remember also—and if he does not others will—that upon the few occasions when I had an opportunity on evenings to assist in the revision of the manual I always insisted upon a liberalization. I recall one instance well. The old rule of the manual was that the court, upon sustaining a plea in bar of trial, would submit their ruling to the convening authority and take his orders thereon, and I contended that the court should not be thus interfered with, and that a court, upon a final sustaining of a plea in bar of trial should not be ordered to proceed, but that their judgment should dispose of the proceeding and operate like an acquittal as against double jeopardy, and this view after much resistance was but partially adopted in the present manual. It ought to be said, however, that at no time, until I came to the command of the office, were courts-martial matters a part of my duty. I was assigned to an entirely different and unrelated class of work.

I think a comparison of the military code in its present form with the form in which it existed prior to 1916 will show that the so-called amendment of the code, for which Gen. Crowder claims great credit, introduced not one single systemic change and not one single liberal feature, but, on the other hand, imported more of the old idea that a court-martial is a court of chivalry and honor, not governed by ordinary rules of law.

Gen. Crowder says that all the facts concerning this subject are now to be ascertained upon the investigation by the Inspector General. I have already notified the Inspector General that I would take no part in that investigation unless compelled to for the reason that such matter is entirely beyond his jurisdiction, and for the further reason that he himself is absolutely disqualified. It was of him and his office that I spoke when I said in my brief to the Secretary of War in November, 1917, that the views of the Inspector General of the Army, together with those of others of your military advisers, are reactionary and savor of professional absolutism. I stand upon one side of this question and he stands upon the other, and thus we have stood since the beginning. I will submit to no such unfair, partial, and unjust investigation, and I have so expressed myself to him in a communication of the 10th instant, which is as follows:

1. You state no specific controversy or issue which you are to investigate or to which I could intelligently address a statement if I deemed it advisable so to do.

2. If, as seems to be the case, the investigation has to do with my statement before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, that statement for which of course I am responsible, speaks for itself.

3. Above all, however, it is my judgment that any adequate and helpful investigation of the existing system of military justice and the administration of it during this war falls beyond your province. That subject, my attitude toward it, and my connection with it, are not, when fairly considered, particular incidents to which your special capacity of inquiry can be properly applied, they are extra-departmental; they involve fundamental and general considerations of law and justice, the scope of which can not justly be confined to the War Department or any bureau of it, and which are entirely beyond your legal competency.

4. Besides, whatever of controversy has arisen upon these fundamental considerations, concerning which I have given expression to my views, directly involves the Secretary of War whose subordinate you are. Even more; it directly involves you and your office as well. I beg to remind you what the record will show, that in my original endeavor made near the beginning of the war to subject courts-martial to departmental supervision and control, the Secretary of War, the Assistant Chief of Staff, the Judge Advocate General and the Inspector General opposed. I had occasion then, in a brief filed with the Secretary of War and read into my recent statement before the committee, to comment upon the views of these military advisers of the Secretary of War and to pronounce them professional absolutists upon this question of military justice. They and you stood upon the one side of this so-called controversy and I upon the other. I can not, therefore, but regard you and your office as disqualified to make a full, fair, and impartial investigation.

5. Knowing nothing specific of the subject, scope, and purpose of your investigation and excepting, as I do and for the reasons given, to your jurisdictional competency, and likewise to your fair qualifications, to make such an investigation as that which you contemplate, affecting me, I am not inclined to have aught to do with it, voluntarily.

Of course, this subject ought to be investigated. The part that the Secretary of War has played in it ought to be investigated. The part that the Judge Advocate General has played should be investigated; and I myself do not ask to be excused from such an investigation; on the other hand, I welcome any fair and impartial and helpful investigation, but such an investigation, to be helpful, and impartial, must come from without the War Department.

There is a great principle in the issue here, and I have preferred that the discussion be confined to a discussion of principle, but it is obvious to me now that I am under attack because I stood for a principle, because I opposed the existing system, and because I have expressed my opinion of it, that it is unjust, un-American, and ought to be destroyed.

S. T. ANSELL.

Mr. ANSELL. I also request that Senator Chamberlain's statement made upon the denial of his request that my statement be published be put in the record. Also that my statement made in reply to a second and more broadly published statement of the Judge Advocate General and Col. Wignore, made to Senator Chamberlain publicly and formally, be also put in the record.

Senator LENROOT. Those statements may be inserted in the record.

The statements above referred to are here printed in full, as follows:

MARCH 19, 1919.

HON. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

SIR: On the 16th instant I addressed you a telegram in which I asked that you give to the public a statement made by Lieut. Col. (formerly Gen.) Samuel T. Ansell, in reply to statements made by you yourself and by Gen. Crowder, the Judge Advocate General of the Army, in which you both gave warm support and approval to the present court-martial system, and in which Gen. Crowder besides indulged in severe personal criticism and accusation against Gen. Ansell, who in testimony recently given before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs had condemned the existing system of military justice and the administration under it. I asked you to make the statement public, primarily because it was a clarifying contribution to the subject now agitating the people, to which the people are entitled, and, secondarily, because it was only fair and just to this officer that you should do so. I believed that you would make this statement public, and do so immediately, in order that the people might have the opportunity of considering it as nearly contemporaneously as possible with the opposing views publicly expressed by you and the Judge Advocate General. In that I am disappointed.

I have just received from you the following telegram:

"Your telegram received. More than a year ago I asked of the Military Committees of both the Senate and House legislation to correct the evils in the present court-martial system. I shall renew the request when Congress re-assembles. There would seem to be, therefore, no controversy on the merits of the subject. Have not yet seen the letter in question, and can not imagine any reason why my consideration of it on my return will not be time enough.

"(Signed)

NEWTON D. BAKER,

"Secretary of War."

It is painful to me, Mr. Secretary, to find you fencing upon a question which means so much to the tens of thousands of enlisted men who have suffered injustice under the present system, a question which means so much to you, the Army, the Nation. In the instant telegram you say that more than a year ago you recognized the evils of the present court-martial system and requested legislation to correct them, and that inasmuch as you intend to renew that request, there can be no controversy on the merits of the subject.

Your present recognition of existing evils of the court-martial system is strangely irreconcilable with your published statement no more remote than March 10. In that statement of warm approval of the existing system, you seemed blind to any deficiency. You say therein:

"I have not been made to believe by a perusal of these complaints that justice is not done to-day under the present law, or has not been done during the War period, and my acquaintance with the course of military justice (gathered as it is from the large number of cases which in the regular routine come to me for final action) convinces me that the conditions implied by these recent complaints do not exist and had not existed."

You further say that you are "absolutely confident that the public apprehensions which have been created are groundless." And then you put the capstone upon your monumental confidence in the system by further saying:

"I wish to convey to you here the assurance of my entire faith that the system of military justice, both in its structure as organized by the statutes of Congress and the President's regulations, and in its operation as administered during the war, is essentially sound."

And finally you call upon the Judge Advocate General to make a statement for the purpose of reassuring the people who "must not be left to believe that their men were subjected to a system that did not fully deserve the terms of law and justice"; and then you conclude, rather lightly, that after all, it is but "a simple question of furnishing the facts, for when they are furnished, I am positive that they will contain the most ample reassurances." On March 10 you were blind to any deficiencies in the existing system; as, indeed, the evidence abundantly shows you have been deaf throughout the war to complaints about the injustice of this system, complaints which should at least have challenged your earnest attention, rather than provoked your undisguised irritation.

But, as you say, you did propose certain legislation to the committees which they did not see fit to recommend for enactment and which, very fortunately, did not become law. I can hardly believe that that bill, prepared by the Judge Advocate General of the Army and submitted by you, was a bona fide effort to reform the existing system, and the slightest consideration of the bill will show that had it been enacted into law, it would have made the system even more reactionary, if possible, than it is now. I can hardly believe that this was a bona fide effort at reform, because you already had had an opportunity to establish in your department a legitimate and necessary revisory power over, and supervision of, courts-martial procedure. Gen. Ansell was at that time Acting Judge Advocate General of the Army, and his opinions were entitled to be respected as such, and in all other matters they were so respected.

In order to keep courts-martial procedure within just and legal limitations, he wrote an office opinion, in which he clearly demonstrated that this power of supervision was to be found in existing law, and in that opinion all the officers of the department, among whom were many most distinguished lawyers from civil life, concurred. And yet, in order that that opinion might be overruled and that you might rely upon the theory that you were entirely without power, you either ordered or permitted Gen. Crowder himself, who was not at that time connected with the office, to return thereto and write for you an overruling opinion, which you approved, and in doing so voluntarily denied that it was your right and duty under existing law to supervise the system. You approved the opinion of the Judge Advocate General, which was to the effect that this supervisory power did not exist, and, furthermore, ought not to exist, inasmuch as the law military is the kind of law that should be left to be executed at the will of the camp commander. If you had really desired to establish a legitimate legal supervision of courts-martial, you could have done so simply by approving the opinion of the Acting Judge Advocate General, which was not a personal opinion, but was an office opinion, which in ordinary course of administration would have been adopted. Advised to do the proper thing by your chief law officer, and having been shown by him the way to do it, you declined to do so upon some slight legal technicality. This is evidence to me that you did not desire to do so.

You supplanted the officer who had seen fit to call to your attention at the beginning of the war the necessity of keeping the strictest supervision over courts-martial procedure by an officer who contended that such supervision was not necessary and that such supervision would derogate from the power of the commanding officer and destroy discipline. You elbowed aside the one officer who even then had the courage to condemn the system and the provision to point out its terrible results, Gen. Ansell, and took into the bosom of your confidence a trio of men who are pronounced reactionaries—Gen. Crowder, the then Acting Chief of Staff, and the Inspector General—the last named of whom is even this day engaged, by your order, in a so-called "investigation" designed, in my judgment, to destroy the man who exposed the injustice of the present system. You accepted those views. But, in order that any future responsibility might be shifted from your shoulders to Congress, you presented a bill which, even if you did not your advisers did know, could not be passed. Your advisers did not wish any modification of the existing system. They and you declined to accept the views of the Acting Judge Advocate General that would have gone far toward alleviating the situation on the ground that those views were not fully justified by the letter of the statute. You were thus solicitous that your power be found in the letter of the statute. And yet in the very bill proposed you asked for the power of suspension of sentences, when you were already suspending sentences by administrative order without one word of legal authority therefor.

There is another evidentiary circumstance that indicates the effort was not made in good faith, but was simply designed to allay public apprehension and inquiry by the appearance of doing something. It is shown by the records of your department that the Judge Advocate General of the Army, in correspondence with the senior officer of his department in France shortly thereafter, said, with respect to an administrative makeshift which he had proposed for adoption, and which you did adopt, that it was necessary to do something to head off a threatened congressional investigation, to silence criticism, to prevent talk about the establishment of courts of appeal, and to make it appear to the soldier that he did get some kind of revision of his proceedings other than the revision at field headquarters. How can it be said that such an attitude of mind is consistent with an honest desire to alleviate the situation? It is significant also that your interest upon this subject was not such as to produce that active participation of the department which characterizes its efforts when it desires to secure legislation.

The bill to which you refer and the nonenactment of which you plead as shifting the responsibility for the maladministration of military justice from you to Congress, if honestly submitted, is conclusive evidence that you yourself are entirely reactionary or that you have been imposed upon and deceived by advisers who are. That bill is Senate 3692, and provides, so far as immediately pertinent to this discussion, that section 1199, Revised Statutes, be amended to read as follows:

"The Judge Advocate General shall receive, revise and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions, and report thereon to the President, who shall have power to disapprove, vacate or set aside any finding, in whole or in part, to modify, vacate, or set aside any sentence, in whole or in part, and to direct the execution of such part only of any sentence as has not been vacated or set aside."

Do you really know, Mr. Secretary, the purpose and legal effect of that bill? In the first place, it would have to be construed together with that statute which makes the Chief of Staff the trusted military adviser of the President and Secretary of War, whose authority he habitually exercises, on the one hand, and places him in supervision and control of all bureau officers, including the Judge Advocate General of the Army, upon the other hand. The President's power, therefore, as a matter of law, over the control of courts-martial cases would under that bill be habitually exercised by the Chief of Staff, an ultramilitary official, without the slightest competency to pass upon those errors of law which prejudice the rights of the accused and thereby render it necessary to modify the judgment, and with a disposition to disregard such rights. And, also, the Chief of Staff, and not the President, would be the one to exercise this power, in fact. There were some 350,000 courts-martial from the time we raised the new Army until July 1, last. Nobody would expect the President to review such a number or any appreciable part of them. Nobody, indeed, could expect the Chief of Staff himself to do so. The work would have to be entrusted to some military minion, inexperienced in law and the administration of justice, and whose training had disqualified him for such functions.

The Judge Advocate General, when he appeared representing you before the Military Committee, admitted that this would be the course of administration and contended that the Chief of Staff ought to have that power. He said that that was necessary in order to maintain discipline.

But worse than this, that bill would authorize the Chief of Staff to disapprove, vacate, and set aside a finding of "not guilty" and substitute upon his view of the evidence a finding of his own. Notice, the language is that he shall have the power to disapprove, vacate, or set aside "any finding," and also to modify, vacate, or set aside "any sentence." This is a power which ought not to be granted to any man, and I feel safe in saying will never be granted by Congress. This alone was sufficient not only to condemn the bill in the mind of Congress, but to show the attitude of those who proposed it. Do you believe, Mr. Secretary, that the President of the United States, the Secretary of War, the Chief of Staff, or any other official, should have the power to set aside an acquittal and substitute for it a conviction or to set aside one sentence and substitute for it a harsher one, or to set aside a finding of guilty of a greater one? That is what the bill which you proposed authorizes.

But the bill further provides "that the President may return any record through the reviewing authority to the court for consideration and correction." This power is on a par with and supplemental to the absolute power which I have just referred to. If the Chief of Staff were not satisfied with a finding of "not guilty," he could return the record to the court-martial with instructions to make a finding of guilty. If not satisfied with a light sentence he could instruct the court to award a heavier one. If not satisfied with a finding of guilty of a minor offense, he could instruct the court to find the accused guilty of a more serious one. Do you believe that the President, the Secretary of War, or the Chief of Staff, or any other official, should have such power? If you stand for that bill you evidently do.

The Judge Advocate General who appeared before the committee in representation of your views testified:

"I want the President authorized to return the record which we get here, back through the convening authority to the trial court, and ask a reconsideration of their action so that he may proceed, if he desires, upon the revised findings of the court, and thus make the court participate with him in the final judgment."

When asked the question whether a commanding general could disapprove a finding of not guilty and send it back, he said:

"Yes, when in his opinion the finding is not sustained by the evidence"; and he argued that that power was necessary to the maintenance of discipline, was now possessed by all commanding officers and ought to be possessed by the President and Chief of Staff. In further argument sustaining that view he said with respect to cases in which very small sentences had been awarded:

"I do not know anything that could attack discipline more if the commanding general, who is also the reviewing authority, or the Secretary of War, or the President, who will become the reviewing authority of that class of cases under this legislation, could not invite the attention of the court to the effect of such a sentence upon the discipline of the Army generally. I do not think this power would have survived throughout the centuries if it were intrinsically wrong."

Obviously he was unaware that this is one of the few countries in which such a barbaric practice has survived. These views you doubtless approved inasmuch as in your letter to the committee you invited it to hear the views of the Judge Advocate General in explanation and support of the proposed legislation.

For the moment, at least, you now conceive that there should be a power of revision. That, to use your language, is "structural," "organic." The lack of a proper revisory power is a lack of legal control at the top. There are many other deficiencies of the same character. There is an absolute lack of legal control at the bottom and throughout the proceedings. You have said that the cases that come to you in regular routine convince you that the complaints against the system are groundless. Unfortunately, Mr. Secretary, you are not in touch, and apparently do not desire to get in touch, with the administration of military justice. You must know that under the existing system the Secretary of War sees and takes action only upon that relatively insignificant number of cases which are required under existing law to go to the President for confirmation. He sees none others. These few cases consist in the far greater part of a few sentences of dismissal of commissioned officers. These are not the class of cases in which appears the injustice of which I have complained. The courts-martial system is such, and the regard for rank in the Army is such, that a commissioned officer appears before a court-martial to far better advantage than does a private soldier. You do not see the system in operation. You do not see its tragic results. When you denied the department the right to review court-martial cases, you denied yourself the opportunity to help the Army.

the administration of justice throughout the Army. Your knowledge is obtained from this insignificant number of cases of commissioned officers and from those persons surrounding you who are interested in supporting the existing reactionary system.

The existing system does injustice—gross, terrible, spirit-crushing injustice. evidence of it is on every hand. The records of the Judge Advocate General's Department reek with it, and upon proper occasion I shall show the people that this is true. The organization of the Clemency Board, now sitting daily and grinding out thousands of cases, is a confession of it. Clemency, however, can never correct the injustice done.

You have, of course, adopted the statement of the Judge Advocate General, which you invited and published. That statement is involved in as inextricable confusion and patent inconsistencies as your own pronouncements upon this subject. In one and the same breath it declares the system unusually excellent, and then blames Congress because it has failed to enact the bill which you proposed and has heretofore been referred to; it declares that military law can best be administered finally in the field, but at the same time argues that the system would be much improved by the establishment of a departmental appellate power; it contends that courts-martial should be subject, not to legal control, but only to the power of military command, and at the same time objects to assuming responsibility for the outrageously excessive sentences awarded when courts and commanding officers go wrong, without legal restraint. It admits that our soldiery must be hurriedly drawn from civilian life and from the operations of the more liberal civil code, but assumes that for that very reason the military law ought to be more harshly applied in order to obtain discipline. It argues that courts-martial are not courts of justice, but "courts of chivalry and honor," and concludes that since the soldier must on occasion yield up his life on the battle field, he should not be heard to complain if it be taken away by these courts of chivalry; it places courts-martial in high esteem, though admitting that they apply not the modern rules of right, but medieval principles that govern over lord and armed retainer. It says that the officers who sit in judgment upon the private soldier can not be military zealots, because it was only yesterday that they got out of their civilian clothes, but in the next paragraph asserts that they are most competent to award military punishments, because of their military appreciations. It argues that the primary purpose of a court-martial is to maintain discipline, as though discipline in any real sense could be maintained in our Army without doing justice.

I beg to assure you that there is controversy on the merits of the subject. There is great difference between you and me. That would be relatively unimportant. But there is great difference between you and Congress, and there is great difference between you and the American people. I do not believe that a court-martial should be controlled from beginning to end by the fiat of military command. I do not believe that a commanding officer should order the trial of an enlisted man on a charge that is legally insufficient. I do not believe that he should order a court to overrule pleas made in behalf of an accused which upon established principles of law would bar the trial. I do not believe that the court and the commanding officer can cast established rules of evidence to the winds and insist upon the conviction of a man upon evidence that no court for a moment would entertain. I do not believe that the court and the commanding officer should be permitted to deprive an accused of the substantial right of counsel and railroad him, unheard and unrepresented, to a conviction. It was only yesterday that I was shown a record in which the counsel for the accused was intimidated from examining his superior officer as a witness by a threat made in open court by the superior officer, that any question asked him, reflecting upon his credibility, would promptly bring charges against the youthful counsel. I do not believe that the conduct of a court should be controlled by a commanding officer. I do not believe that a court should be directed or instructed to reverse its finding of innocence or to impose a harsher punishment than that originally awarded. On the other hand, I believe, and I insist that the courts-martial having in their care and keeping the lives and liberties of every single one of our soldiers shall be courts of justice, acting as judges, controlled by and responsible to no man controlled by and responsible to their own oaths, and to the great principles of law which have been established by our civilization to protect an accused wherever he is placed on trial.

Surely you have been misled. Officers of your department who have supported the iniquitous system and who have imposed upon you, or most unfortunately persuaded you, have been busy preparing their defense. You have been presented lengthy reports designed to controvert the speech which I made in the Senate on this subject, which reports I have shown you to be misleading and utterly unreliable. Volumes of statistics are being prepared to show that, after all, the system is not so bad. Whether you do or not, the American people see and have the evidence; Members of Congress have the evidence. You have taken a terrible stand upon a subject which lies close to a thousand American hearthstones. The American people will not be deceived by such self-serving, misleading reports and statistics. Too many American families have made a Pentecostal sacrifice of their sons upon the altar of organized injustice.

Very sincerely.

GEO. E. CHAMBERLAIN.

MILITARY JUSTICE.

RIGGS BUILDING,
Washington, August 16, 1919,

Hon. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SENATOR: At a recent interview you referred to the defense made by the Judge Advocate General of the Army and the Secretary of War on "Military Justice During this War," as contained in the document so entitled, consisting of a letter from the Secretary of War to the Judge Advocate General, and of a letter from the Judge Advocate General in reply, published and distributed throughout the country at public expense as official business.

You expressed yourself at the time as of the opinion that the presentation made by these public officials was not helpful to the true interests of the public or of the Army. I said to you then that that presentation could be shown to be of such character that it could but misinform and mislead the public mind. I shall endeavor to show you now that such is its real character.

In the very beginning we are made to see that—

THE SECRETARY OF WAR BLINDLY SUPPORTS THE EXISTING SYSTEM.

Military justice is a subject in which the people should have deepest interest and the Secretary of War keenest concern. It involves in a very direct way our national safety. It affects the morale of our soldiery, and influences the attitude of our people toward military service. Like all matters of justice, it should be the object of sustained solicitude upon the part of the people and a highly sensitive regard upon the part of their officials who have immediately to do with its administration. Thereby alone may imperfections in justice be seasonably revealed and remedial action taken. Hardly could it be denied that the maintenance of justice in the Army requires that the Secretary of War be receptive to all complaints of injustice to our soldiery, alert to discover imperfections in the system of its administration, quick to take or recommend the amplest remedies. Throughout the war his attitude has been the very opposite.

At the beginning of the war, in the actual absence of Gen. Crowder, who had been appointed Provost Marshal General, I, by virtue of seniority, came to be the acting head of the office of the Judge Advocate General, which includes the Bureau of Military Justice, just when the mobilization of the National Army began. The instances of palpable and unquestioned injustice through courts-martial soon became so numerous, so gross, and of such a tendency to aggravation as to seem to me to call imperatively for legal check. More than ever before it was becoming apparent to me, and to my office associates as well, that we could not apply the existing system of military justice to the new Army, as it had been applied to the old, without doing great injustice to the soldiery. Some of the gravest deficiencies of our system, as applied to the old Regular Army, became perfectly apparent. It was more clearly revealed than ever before that that system belonged to other institutions and to another age. It is one in which military justice is to be achieved, as it was achieved in England and on the Continent 150 or more years ago, through the arbitrary power of military command rather than through the application of principles of law; a system governed by man—and a military commander at that—instead of by law. Designed to govern a medieval army of mercenaries, it is utterly unsuited to a national army composed of our citizens called to the performance of the highest duty of citizenship. Designed to govern military serfs obligated by personal fealty and impelled by fear, it is utterly unsuited to American freemen serving the State as soldiers, acting under the impulse and inspiration of patriotism. All this was borne in upon us and impelled us to contemplate remedial methods. It is regrettable that it should not have been seen and appreciated by our professional officers charged with the making of this new Army, whom, unfortunately, the department insisted upon chaining to the medieval system under which they had been trained.

Confronted immediately by a case of shocking injustice, conceded to be such by the department, and still conceded to be such by the Judge Advocate General in his defense (p. 50), in which eight or ten old and experienced non-commissioned officers of the Army had been arbitrarily and unlawfully charged with and tried and convicted of mutiny, we in the office of the Judge Advocate General set to work to reexamine our authority to review the judgment of a court-martial for errors of law, with a view to setting this judgment aside by reason of its illegality. In a unanimous opinion, having for the moment the concurrence of the Judge Advocate General himself, we found this power conferred by section 1199, Revised Statutes, which in terms enjoins the Judge Advocate General of the Army to "revise" the proceedings of courts-martial, a Civil War statute designed, in our judgment, for the very purpose. We conceived that this power of revision of the judgments of courts-martial would largely answer the necessity for the legal supervision of the procedure and judgments of courts-martial, for the establishment of legal principles and appreciations in the administration of military justice, and for giving legal guidance to the power of military command over such judicial functions. That necessity was thus early apparent to the office of the Judge Advocate General, the office that was in daily contact with the administration of military justice and charged with such legal supervision over it as War Department administration would permit; but it was not apparent to the military officials of the War Department insistent upon the view that a military commander must be absolute and unrestrained by law. In control of the Secretary of War they, led by the Judge Advocate General, who had been induced to change his views, won and had their way throughout the war. The old system, applied without legal restraint, was maintained in its full flower throughout the war. The commanding officer was to have full and final power beyond all review. Thereafter the best we could do was to appeal to the natural sense of justice of those who wielded the power of military command.

Throughout the war, upon every proper occasion, I strove with all the power within me, with such reason, argument, and persuasion as I could command, first, to establish legal regulation of the power of military command in its relation to the administration of military justice, and, when I had failed in that, to induce military authority of its own accord to act justly. The records of the War Department will show that this was my insistent attitude throughout, an attitude with which the department disagreed consistently, except when coerced by expediency into the adoption of some administrative palliative. The department would not stand for the legal supervision of court-martial procedure, but insisted that it should be controlled from beginning to end, and finally, by the power of military command. Surely beyond departmental circles and departmental influence, fairminded men who know aught of this subject know that the administration of military justice during this war has resulted in injustice, tyranny, and terrorization. The evidence is on every hand. Tens of thousands of our men have been unjustly tried and unjustly punished by courts-martial, and large numbers of them, not tried, have been arbitrarily placed in prison pens and subjected therein to barbarous cruelty, physical violence, and torture. If there be those not willing yet to concede so much, they will be overwhelmed by evidence later on. With our system of military justice, as it was considered and decided upon by the Secretary of War and the military authorities, the results could not have been otherwise. Those who are responsible for that decision, namely, the Secretary of War, the Judge Advocate General of the Army, the Acting Chief of Staff, and the Inspector General of the Army, must assume the responsibility for the gross injustice done.

Such injustices can not be concealed, however, even during war. Members of Congress became apprised of them from many sources. They became, and properly they ought to have become, a matter of congressional consideration. Bills were introduced for their correction. You were the leader in this remedial movement. In the middle of February last I was summoned before the Senate Military Committee, of which you then were the chairman, and, without having had any previous conference with you upon the subject, to testify out of my experience as Acting Judge Advocate General during the war, and I did testify to the effect that our existing system and the administration of it had resulted in the most cruel injustices. I should have been false to my duty and to my oath had I done otherwise. There had been outcries against the system while war was flagrant. Complaints were everywhere to be heard by all who had not closed their ears. To the extent of my ability, I lost no opportunity to acquaint both the Secretary of War and the Judge Advocate General of the Army with them. But the Secretary, as many another stronger man has done, exhibited unusual strength in adhering to his original commitment.

WAR DEPARTMENT METHODS OF DEFENSE.

The matter was now before the public, and the department had to act. The Secretary immediately set about not to inquire, not to investigate, but to make a defense. Therein he was guided, as upon this subject he has ever been guided, by his Judge Advocate General. They appreciated and acknowledged that they were responsible for the injustice, if injustice there had been. They denied that there had been any injustice, and prepared to support and make plausible that denial. Within 10 days after I had testified before the Senate Military Committee the Judge Advocate General and the chief exponent of his view had a conference with the Secretary of War, at which they formulated a plan for the defense of the existing system and their administration under it. The system was to be maintained at all costs. The authority of the department was to be used to reassure the people as to the merits of the existing system, to deny or condone its results, and to destroy the force of all criticism or condemnation of it. Power of government was to be liberally used to this end. Bureaus of the department were set to work to prepare a defense, public funds generously used, and a campaign of propaganda initiated. Officers of high rank, under Col. John H. Wigmore, in charge, and an adequate clerical force were assigned to the task. Much since then has been said and done in the execution of the plan. The methods employed were such as when employed in private affairs habitually receive the condemnation of honest men and discredit any cause; public funds have been improperly used; official favors have been lavishly bestowed upon those in the office of the Judge Advocate General who would actively support the system, and official power has been used to suppress, discredit, menace, demote, and discipline those who oppose it; clemency boards have been "packed" with friends of the system, and simplest mercy denied in order to vindicate the system and those involved in its defense.

Speaking now to the document under discussion: First, the chief of the propaganda section prepared for the signature of the Secretary of War the letter standing first in the document discussed, in which the Secretary of War was made to convey to the Judge Advocate General an assurance of his entire faith in the system and of his confidence in the Judge Advocate General, and to declare that injustice had not been done during this war. And especially did he call upon the Judge Advocate General to prepare for publication a statement to the end that the public mind should receive ample reassurance on the subject. The chief propagandist then prepared a responsive statement for the signature of the Judge Advocate General, under date of March 8, which consisted of a general defense of the system and largely of a personal attack upon me. The Secretary of War gave this statement to the press, having arranged in the meantime for the fullest publicity. With all possible patience I prepared a statement pointing out the deficiencies of the system and my own attitude toward it, and asked the Secretary of War to give my communication the same publicity he had given his and that of the Judge Advocate General. This he declined to do, though this communication of mine afterwards appeared in the New York Times, but without any knowledge or connivance upon my part. In that communication I pointed out conduct upon the part of the Secretary of War and the Judge Advocate General in their relation to this subject that was clearly inconsistent with official or personal integrity, notwithstanding which both have ever since kept silent and taken no action, although I remained in the Army for nearly four months thereafter in order that I might continue amenable to such disciplinary action as they might choose to take. However, there was not one word in the communication that I had not previously spoken to the Secretary of War in person, and without denial from him, on the last night of February last.

Not content with this first statement which was given to the press, the chief of the propaganda section prepared the far more comprehensive defense contained in the letter signed by the Judge Advocate General in the document under discussion, between seventy and one hundred thousand copies of which were published and distributed to the lawyers and others throughout the country at public expense. The circumstances attending the publication of this document, when contrasted with contemporaneous representations of the Secretary of War, will mildly illustrate the character of the official methods employed throughout this controversy. This communication, though bearing date of March 10, was not authorized by the Secretary of War until March 26, and was not given to the public until April 9. In the meantime, on April 5, the Secretary of War had assured me in writing that he deprecated the public controversy and that it ought to stop on both sides, and cordially invited my cooperation in remedying the existing system. This assurance I accepted in good faith, only to find four days later this comprehensive publication launched against me and sent broadcast throughout the country.

An artful incident of the common authorship of the three communications is to be found in the fact that the author has the Secretary, in his letter of March 1, give strong and unqualified approval to the system of military justice and its results. But after reflection he has the Judge Advocate General, in his defense, concede many deficiencies and admit much injustice. He might also have taken the Secretary from such an exposed position. This letter, or defense, of the Judge Advocate General is designed to be the last word, the final avouchment, upon the subject, the complete vindication of the system, its supporters, and the department, and to bring about the utter discomfiture of those who have criticized the existing system and have sought and are still seeking a better one.

The system can scarcely be stronger than this skillful representation of it would have it appear. If this representation is weak, the system may be presumed to be weaker still. I would have you first look into the strength of that representation for the moment, not as though it were factitious, but regarding it as of face value and indulging the presumption that it is an expression honestly arrived at and honestly entertained.

THE SECRETARY'S LETTER.

Please look at it. It is from the highest authority, from the chief guardian of the soldier's rights, who should have been watchful for any weaknesses in the system and sympathetic for all who suffered by them. It was his supreme duty to discover its deficiencies and to exert his power for progress and improvement. His letter, saved of its inconsistencies, consists entirely of prejudice and expressions of satisfaction. This was his state of mind toward the code and the criticism made of it, and he would so express himself without making the slightest investigation. In his letter he first affects surprise at the complaints and resolutely expresses the "firmest determination that justice shall be done." But at once he says he does not believe the complaints and is convinced that injustice has not been done. He arrives at this conviction, he confesses, through the confidence he has in his Judge Advocate General and the faith that he has in the system. Then, observing that, though entirely satisfied himself, "it is highly important that the public mind should receive ample reassurance on the subject," he directs the Judge Advocate General to prepare a statement for that purpose. He does not withhold judgment upon the specific complaints and have them investigated; he does not direct an inquiry; he resents the complaints, sees in them an attack upon "the department and its representatives, who have not been in a position to make any public defense or explanation and have refrained from doing so." His proclaimed purpose is not to determine the facts, but to assume them to be what he wants to believe them to be, and he calls for a statement, based upon that assumption, in order "to reassure the families of all these young men who had a place in our magnificent Army." You can understand his predicament, the necessity for loud asseveration to impress public opinion by assuring it and himself that all was well. It was necessary that he continue to repeat the unreasoned assertions that led to his commitment to the system in the early days of the war. Having committed himself to the views of those intent upon maintaining that system, it was necessary that ever afterwards he soothe his conscience by closing his ears to the cries of justice. Never thereafter would he hear me, an officer of rank, experience, and some repute, with a responsibility that placed me in immediate contact with the unjust results of that system. Holding their hands, he had taken the plunge, and to them he must look for safety. They told him that the department as a matter of law did not have, and as a matter of policy ought not to have, general supervisory power over courts-martial in questions of law, but that the views of the commander in the field should be final. When he denied the department that supervisory power he shut his eyes to his responsibility, he denied himself the opportunity to keep in touch with the administration of justice in the Army, and, relying upon a mere convention which had no basis in law, he turned his back upon the demands of justice and screened himself from its sufferings. He stands or falls with the system.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL'S DEFENSE.

His defense consists of blind professions of faith in the system, unreasonable assertions of its excellence, and a sympathetic appeal that they be believed in even as you would believe in him. It does him less than justice; it would have you believe that sheer cruelty of the system made him happier than Caligula's minion, whereas he is only blind to its cruelty. The statement does reveal his immovable mental attitude upon the subject, which was not to be unexpected. Trained to the line of the Army and not to the law, finding the work of his own department uncongenial, ever ambitious for a line command, orthodox in every military appreciation, he has, throughout his long years of service, taken not the judicial but the professional soldier's "rough-and-ready justice" point of view. He regards the system as so organically perfect and vital to military efficiency that even its form is to be touched only lightly. His mind has repelled all criticism of the system and is incapable of contemplating that it might be fundamentally and structurally wrong. This fixed mental attitude obtrudes throughout the statement. So addicted to regard the system with blind veneration he can never perceive its wretched incongruity as an American institution. He refers to his "firm belief in the merits and high standards of our system of military law." He asserts his vital interest "in vindicating the honor of the Army and War Department as involved in the maintenance of that system." At every point he declares the inherent superiority of courts-martial to the civil system. He resents even those criticisms based upon specific instances of injustice since "they are calculated to undermine unjustly and needlessly the public confidence in that system." He would have the people "know confidently and take pride in the fact that we possess a genuine and adequate system of military justice." He takes "consolation in believing that if the public at large and particularly the families of those men who have been subjected to military discipline during the past two years could realize the thoroughness of this system they would feel entirely satisfied that the system is calculated in its methods to secure ultimate justice for every man." He refers to some futile proposals of his affecting military justice as tending to show that his attitude "has been an advanced one, at least in comparison to others whose authority was superior to mine at the time." He refers to his own career as Judge Advocate General "as demonstrating that it is inherently improbable that any state of things, even remotely justifying some of the extreme epithets recently used in public criticism, could have existed in our Army during the last two years." These expressions alone reflect a stagnant mental pool.

HIS STANDARDS OF JUSTICE.

The Judge Advocate General asserts that he was actuated by the spirit of justice throughout this war, and that he has not been satisfied with anything less than the highest standards of justice. Doubtless swayed by the demands of discipline as he understood them, he did not deliberately do what he knew to be unjust. It is simply a matter of standard of appreciation. He insisted, however, upon maintaining the system unmodified, and the system has led, was leading, and might have been expected to lead, to the grossest injustice. Let us examine his standards as illustrated by the very cases used by him.

(a) The case of the Texas "mutineers." In that case certain old noncommissioned officers of the Regular Army had been subjected to the tyrannous and lawless conduct of a superior officer. Their innocence is conceded. They acted well within their rights in quietly refusing to submit to a palpably unlawful command, and for that refusal they were tried and found guilty of mutiny and sentenced to dishonorable discharge and imprisonment for terms from 10 to 25 years. In this case officers, not men, should have been tried. The trial in its entirety was illegal; the substantial rights of the men were at no point protected; and yet this procedure received the approval of the entire military hierarchy, capped by a major general who approved the sentence and dismissed the men. The Judge Advocate General protected the officers over my protest and denied justice to the men. That was the first case of gross injustice to come to the office after I became its head in August, 1917. I and my associates in the office knew that there would be many like it during the war. The Judge Advocate General admits that this was a "genuine case of injustice" and that it "illustrates the occasional possibility of the military spirit of discipline overshadowing the sense of law and justice." The military minds of the War Department conceded the injustice, conceded the illegality of the proceeding if it could be reviewed for error, but contended that the approval of the major general in command was final and placed the judgment of the court, whether legal or illegal, beyond all power of review. This case presents the crux of the entire difficulty and reveals the fundamental deficiency of the entire system. Courts-martial are controlled not by law but by the power of military command. I held that this could not be, and deduced the authority to review the judgments of courts-martial for errors of law out of existing statutes enacted during the Civil War for the very purpose, statutes which the War Department and compliant Judge Advocate Generals had permitted to become obsolete. The present Judge Advocate General, though he had relinquished all control of his office to become Provost Marshal General, returned to the department and filed an overruling opinion which the Secretary of War was induced to approve. That opinion established the law for the department that the judgments of courts-martial once approved by the convening authority, however erroneous they may be when tested by legal principles, are beyond all power of legal review and correction. This case presented no more illegality than thousands of others that have since been tried. Clemency was resorted to in that case and the unexecuted punishment remitted, though the men themselves, excellent soldiers of long service, had been branded as mutineers and expelled from the Army in disgrace. Clemency has been resorted to in all such cases as a means of curing, as best it can, the injustice resulting from illegal trials that must go uncorrected. Mercy is given for offenses never committed, and pardon is used where judgments are illegal and should be reversed. This accounts for the wholesale clemency in which the department is indulging. The Judge Advocate General, in order to protect the power of military command, opened the gates to all the injustice of this war. His view was injected into the question. He overruled the opinion of the entire department, consisting of 12 eminent lawyers from civil life, but he succeeded in maintaining supreme the power of military command over military judicial functions. It was under such ruling that the same commanding general in Texas was permitted to hang a half score of negro soldiers immediately upon the completion of the trial and before the records had been reviewed or had been dispatched from his headquarters to the Judge Advocate General of the Army for whatever revision the statute might be thought by him to require. In those cases the Judge Advocate General, as a result of his construction, engaged in the futile task of "reviewing" the proceedings four months after the accused men had been hanged.

(b) "Burglary" case, No. 110595. This is another case used to illustrate the beneficence of the system. This accused was charged with burglary, and at the end of the trial the court acquitted him. But the commanding general disagreed. He ordered the court to reconvene, and told it that the evidence, to say the least, looked "very incriminatory." The court upon reconsideration as ordered found the accused guilty and sentenced him to be dishonorably discharged and to confinement at hard labor for five years. The Judge Advocate General, in his statement, says: "His (the accused) story was disbelieved and he was found guilty." That is not true; his story was believed and he was acquitted, and it was not until the camp commander ordered a reconsideration that the court convicted him. The Judge Advocate General further says:

"This office reached the opinion that though there was sufficient evidence to sustain the finding, the evidence did not go so far as to show his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt."

A lawyer would be expected to suppose that in a criminal case the evidence in order to be sufficient must be such as to convince the court beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused. However, the record shows that the office of the Judge Advocate General said in the review of this case:

"After careful consideration of the evidence, this office is firmly convinced of the absolute innocence of the accused."

As indicating a lack of power in the Judge Advocate General's office to give effect to a conclusion of this sort, a copy of the review was addressed to the camp commander "in order that the reviewing authority may have the benefit of the study referred to."

The Judge Advocate General's report also says:

"In such a situation no supreme court in the United States would interfere and set aside a jury's verdict. Nevertheless this office recommended a reconsideration of the verdict by the reviewing authority."

The great fact to be noted is that such a case as this would never have come to any appellate court, because the original acquittal could never have been set aside. And if the case could have gone to any appellate court upon evidence as weak as this after a fair jury had once found an acquittal, there could never be any doubt about what action the court would take. However, the office of the Judge Advocate General did not recommend the reconsideration of the verdict by the reviewing authority. It only expressed its own serious doubt and referred its "study" to the reviewing authority "for such consideration as he may deem advisable to give it." This case well represents the whole difficulty due to the lack of authority in the office of the Judge Advocate General to do more than present "studies."

Gen. Crowder's defense says:

"It (the verdict) was, in fact, reconsidered; but the court adhered to its findings."

This is not true. After the Judge Advocate General's office had "studied" the case it never went back to the court. The "study" was simply sent to the reviewing authority and the court never had any opportunity to see that "study."

The Judge Advocate General's report says:

"But the feature for emphatic notice is that reconsideration was given, not by exercising the 'arbitrary discretion of a military commander' but by referring the case to the judge advocate of the command as legal adviser."

The judge advocate wrote an elaborate review of the evidence, disagreeing with the view of the Judge Advocate General. This illustrates the necessity for final power in the office of the Judge Advocate General. It is to be noted here (1) that the judge advocate who made the elaborate review was the same judge advocate that recommended trial in the first instance; (2) he was the officer on the staff of the camp commander who ordered the trial and who insisted on a conviction instead of an acquittal; (3) to show his bias, he undertakes to say in his review that the court could not have been influenced by the camp commander when it was instructed by him to change its findings from not guilty to guilty; (4) he himself says that he believed that the court was impressed with the "ring of sincerity" of the case when it first voted his acquittal of the charges, and added that he himself was so impressed when he first preliminarily examined the case; (5) the judge advocate's review consists of a belabored argument of 18 pages and is supplemented by a semipersonal note to the Judge Advocate General insisting upon the guilt of the accused. This is a good example of the fact that under the present law judge advocates do not consider themselves as judicial officers at all, but simply as staff officers supporting the views of the camp commander; nor do they consider the office of the Judge Advocate General as a judicial office, for such a relation would bar such semipersonal correspondence. Moreover, this review speaks many times, in what amounts to a slurring manner of the "study" made by the Judge Advocate General.

The Judge Advocate General's report further says that this reconsideration on the point of proof beyond a reasonable doubt "was a measure of protection which the law does not provide in any civil court for the control of a jury's verdict." As indicated before, the verdict of the jury would have promptly acquitted this man. There would have been no occasion to review it. If a case should get to an appellate court in which the evidence was so weak as to result first in an acquittal, and then required military direction to change it to a conviction, and then two superior reviewing judge advocates pronounced the evidence insufficient to sustain the finding, nobody can have any doubt what a court of appeals would do.

The Judge Advocate General's defense says:

"The case is a good illustration of the feature in which the system of military justice sometimes does even more for the accused than a system of civil justice."

This should be admitted. It does do more. It does it hard and plenty.

It may be well to add that since the Chamberlain speech was made the justice of the sentence in this case has been reexamined in the office of the Judge Advocate General upon an application for clemency, and as a result Gen. Crowder, on February 12, 1919, recommended that the unexecuted portion of the sentence be remitted and that the prisoner be released and restored to duty. This recommendation contains the ironical statement that the accused had served nearly one year of his sentence. Here is also a strange admission in the general's memorandum:

"This office is strongly of the opinion that injustice may have been done to this man, and that it should be righted now, so far as possible."

It is a remarkable coincidence that Gen. Crowder signed this memorandum on the same day that he signed his defense in which he vigorously contends for the rightful results of the case.

(c) The four death cases from France: The next cases cited by the Judge Advocate General as illustrating the justice with which the system meets "the stern necessities of war discipline" were four death sentences from France in the cases of four 18-year-old boys, who had volunteered at the beginning of the war—Nos. 110753, 110754, and the companion cases, 110751 and 110752. These were the first death sentences received from France. In the first two the death penalty was awarded for a charge of sleeping upon post, and in the last two for refusal to go to drill. The trials were legal farces, as any lawyer who will look at the records will see. In each of two of the cases the trial consumed about three-quarters of an hour, and the record occupies less than four loosely typewritten pages. The other two consumed slightly more time, and resulted in a slightly larger record. The courts were not properly composed and in two of the cases were clearly disqualified. The accused were virtually denied the assistance of counsel and the right of defense. A second lieutenant as counsel made no effort to assist. That they were hindered rather than helped in their defense by counsel is demonstrated by the fact that in the case where a plea of guilty was entered the sole effort of counsel consisted of his calling a witness and asking him this question:

"Q. Was the accused's record good up to this time?—A. It was not. It is one of the worst in the company."

Two pleaded guilty to a capital offense and the other two made not the slightest fight for their lives. Even if the men had been properly tried and convicted, no just judge could have awarded the death penalty. These young soldiers had been driven to the point of extreme exhaustion. At the time of commission of the offenses, the military authorities evidently regarded them lightly. The two who were charged with sleeping on post were not relieved from post nor were they arrested or accused for 10 days thereafter, and the two who were charged with refusal to go to drill were not arrested or charged for a month thereafter. But at this juncture the authorities abruptly changed their policy, and decided to make an example of these men. Gen. Pershing, who under the law had nothing whatever to do with these cases, injected his power and authority into the course of justice, clamored for the death-penalty, and asked that the cable be used to transmit to him the mandate of death.

According to the Judge Advocate General, Gen. Pershing urged the adoption of the inexorable policy of awarding the death penalty in all cases of sleeping on post, and he insists that no one should be criticized for agreeing with this policy or acceding to Gen. Pershing's urgent request. And then the Judge Advocate General makes this surprising statement:

"I myself, as you know, was at first disposed to defer to the urgent recommendation of Gen. Pershing, but continued reflection caused me to withdraw from that extreme view, and some days before the case was presented for your final action the record contained a recommendation from me pointing in the direction of clemency."

The record shows an entirely different attitude. It shows that on March 29 to April 4 Gen. Crowder wrote the reviews in these cases, but did not as yet conclude them with his recommendation. On April 5 he sent them to Gen. March in this unfinished state, accompanied by a letter in which, while indicating that by right and justice these boys ought not to die, he suggested, nevertheless, that since Gen. Pershing insisted upon the death penalty the department should uphold him and present a united front to the President. He asked for a conference with the Chief of Staff in order that there might be unanimity in the department to that end. Here is his language:

"You will notice that I have not finished the review by embodying a definite recommendation.

"It would be unfortunate indeed if the War Department did not have one mind about these cases. There is no question that the records were legally sufficient to sustain the findings and sentence. There is a very large question in my mind as to whether clemency should be extended. Undoubtedly Gen. Pershing will think if we extend clemency that we have not sustained him in a matter in which he has made a very explicit recommendation.

"May we have a conference at an early date?"

He did confer with Gen. March, and they agreed to present the united front, to uphold the hands of Gen. Pershing, and to recommend the execution of the sentence of death. On April 6 Gen. Crowder brought back from his conference with the Chief of Staff the unfinished reviews and immediately concluded them by adding to them the following recommendation:

"I recommend that the sentences be confirmed and carried into execution. With this in view there is herewith inclosed for your signature a letter transmitting the record to the President for his action thereon, together with an Executive order designed to carry this recommendation into effect should such action meet with your approval.

" (Signed) E. H. CROWDER,
"Judge Advocate General."

Gen. Crowder says that he was "disposed to defer" to the urgent recommendation of Gen. Pershing, but the record shows that he did defer.

The record also contradicts his statement that—

"continued reflection caused me to withdraw from that extreme view, and some days before the case was presented for your final action the record contained a recommendation from me pointing in the direction of clemency."

And the record also disproves his statement that after an examination by several of the most experienced judge advocates of his staff "no reversible error was found, and there was no doubt of the facts in either case, the only issue in the cases being the severity of the sentences." The record shows that on April 15 I, accidentally hearing about these cases, filed a memorandum in which I pointed out with all the power within me not only reversible error, but annihilating error, and urged that these sentences be set aside and these young soldiers be not executed. And three other judge advocates expressed full concurrence in my views. The record further shows that on April 10 still another judge advocate of high rank, whom Gen. Crowder esteems as a splendid lawyer and who supports the general's views on military justice, filed with him a long memorandum to the effect that these trials were a tragic farce and concluded that—

"It will be difficult to defend or justify the execution of these death sentences by way of punishment or upon any ground other than that as a matter of pure military expediency someone should be executed for the moral effect such action shall have upon the other soldiers."

These memoranda the general did not forward to superior authority, but the record shows that upon reading them and "upon continued reflection" the next day, April 16, he addressed a memorandum to Gen. March, which began as follows:

"Since our interview on the four cases from France, involving the death sentences, at which interview we agreed that we would submit the cases with the recommendation that the sentences be carried into execution, my attention has been invited to certain facts of which I had no knowledge at the time of the interview and to which I think your attention should have been invited."

He then sets out some, but by no means all, of the facts of these memoranda, simply passing them on to the Chief of Staff "for his information." He did not deem them sufficient to modify his own conclusion or his agreement with the Chief of Staff, for near the close of the memorandum he expressly declared that he submits them without any desire "to reopen the case," and he then concludes as follows:

"It will not have escaped your notice that Gen. Pershing has no office of review in these cases. He seems to have required that these cases be sent to him for the purpose of putting on the record an expression of his views that all four men should be placed before the firing squad. I do not make this statement for the purpose of criticizing his action—indeed, I sympathize with it—but it is fair in the consideration of the action to be taken here to bear in mind the fact that Gen. Pershing was not functioning as a reviewing officer with any official relation to the prosecution, but as commanding general, anxious to maintain the discipline of his command.

" (Signed) E. H. CROWDER,
" Judge Advocate General."

No case could furnish better evidence of what happens when the chief judicial officer of the Army is subject to the power of military command, is "supervised" by it, and must rely upon it for his appointment to and retention in office; and the fact that these men did not die, as the military hierarchy would have had them die, was not due to the Judge Advocate General of the Army, and the fact that they came perilously close to an unlawful death and were deprived of protection for themselves, and have been unlawfully subjected to penitentiary servitude, was due to the Judge Advocate General of the Army.

When Gen. Crowder first replied to the Chamberlain criticism and my own, he made reference to other cases, which he deemed to be beyond criticism and illustrative of the justice of the system, which he now significantly omits. I will supply them:

(d) John Schroeder, Machine Gun Company, One hundred and fifty-sixth Infantry, was convicted of absenting himself without leave from May 9 to 15, when his command was about to embark for overseas service. The gravamen of this offense is obviously the intention to avoid overseas service, as pointed out in the Crowder report, by the division judge advocate, and by Gen. Hodges, who, in his review of June 19, 1918, congratulated the court "in adjudging an adequate sentence and thereby demonstrating its disapproval of an act of a soldier's absenting himself" without permission immediately following his designation for overseas service. This, of course, is one of the most serious offenses, notwithstanding which the accused, represented by an inexperienced first lieutenant as counsel, pleaded guilty; and it is also shown that while without counsel he was approached by an investigating officer, who reported that "the accused declines to make a statement, but says that he will plead guilty," indicating that there was some inducement for the plea. The accused, however, at the trial and after his plea of guilty, stated under oath that he went home for the purpose of seeing a sick mother, and, besides, that he did not know that the company was going abroad and had never been informed of that fact. This statement, absolutely inconsistent with his plea, required the entry of a plea of "not guilty" and a trial of the general issue. There being no evidence whatever to show that the accused was informed that his company was going abroad, the court should have taken the statement of the accused as true and acquitted him. This is an excellent example of a meaningless trial. The accused had no counsel worthy of the name; he did not appreciate nor was he advised of the gist of the offense; he made an ill-advised and uncomprehending plea of guilty, and then made statements absolutely inconsistent with his plea, all of which went unnoticed and resulted in his being sentenced to be dishonorably discharged and to be confined at hard labor for 25 years.

(e) No. 106800 is a sort of companion case to the immediately preceding one. The gist of the offense, here as there, is to be found in the intention to escape overseas service. This accused was also defended by worse than no counsel. The whole proceeding is invalid for the reason that the court disposed of it as though the accused had entered a plea of guilty, whereas he pleaded "to the specification, not guilty; to the charge, guilty." The important part of the plea is, of course, the plea to the specification, the plea to the charge being mere form and may be ignored.

This being a plea of not guilty, the accused should have been tried accordingly. As showing the lax method of the court, even on an assumption of a valid plea of guilty, the accused made a sworn statement absolutely inconsistent with his plea, saying that he did not know and had not been informed that he was ordered to overseas service. He was sentenced to 15 years' confinement and the court was commended as in the previous case.

(f) No. 114717 was a charge of sleeping on post, in this country, and a plea of guilty. The accused, referred to as "but a little kid," was said to have been found asleep by a lieutenant. This was a capital crime in which the accused, but 17 years old, was permitted by inexperienced counsel to plead guilty, for which he was sentenced to 10 years. The whole proceeding occupies seven pages of loosely typewritten matter double spaced. The court submitted a recommendation for clemency, asking for a reduction of the sentence on the ground that inasmuch as the accused had pleaded guilty they had been reluctant but compelled to give him a sentence commensurate with the offense, and also on the ground of his youth.

(g) No. 113076. This is a case in which Gen. Crowder contended that the sentinel had been drinking whisky before going on guard and that, having been found asleep thereafter, the case was plainly one for severest exemplary punishment. It is passing strange how justice can hurdle the salient point that an example ought to have been made not so much of the man as of an officer who in violation of regulations and common sense will post as a sentinel a man who had obviously been drinking.

These cases—and there are thousands like them in point of illegality and injustice—are sufficient to show what the Judge Advocate General terms “the general state of things in the administration of military justice.”

HIS SPECIFIC CONTENTIONS.

(1) He contends that courts-martial procedure is in accordance with the “rigid limitations of the criminal code” and not according to the arbitrary discretion of the commanding officer.

There are no “rigid limitations” of the code. That is the trouble. The military code is worthy of the name of law only in the sense that any absolute and unregulated power established by law is worthy of it. Congress has authorized military power to do as it pleases in the exercise of this highly penal jurisdiction. Look at the articles from first to last. Is there a word to regulate the preferring of the charge, the arrest, the sufficiency of the charge, the rights of the accused before, at, and after trial? Is there any standard of law to which the court-martial procedure must conform? Is there a single provision for the legal ascertainment of errors and the correction of them? None. All this is committed not to law but to the power of military command. The power of military command determines whether or not there is reasonable ground to believe that the offense has been committed and that the accused committed it. Military power determines whether there is a prima facie case. Military power selects the judges. Military power selects such counsel as the accused may have. Military power determines the legal sufficiency of the charge. Military power determines the kind and competency and sufficiency of proof. Military power passes finally upon every question of law that can arise in the progress of the trial. And military power finally passes upon the legality of the judgment and the entire proceedings. This is one code, criminal in character, that does not recognize principles of law and does not contemplate the services of a single man skilled in the law. Thus there is no standard by which error may be determined, except the view of the commanding general. Whatever he determines is right is right, and whatever he determines is wrong is wrong, by virtue of his determination alone. Under such a system, of course, there can be no such thing as error of law; there can only be a variation from whatever the commanding general believes to be right. And from his decision there is no appeal. There is no power on earth to review his decision with authority to say that it is wrong as a matter of law.

And should not a criminal code define the offenses and prescribe the penalties if it is worthy of the name of law? Look at the code. There are 29 punitive articles. Not one of them defines any offense. The definition is to be found in the common law military or what military men conceive to be the customs of the service. Not one of them prescribes the penalty.

The court-martial is authorized to award any punishment it please. Twenty-nine of these articles conclude by each declaring that the offense punishable therein shall be punished “as the court-martial may direct,” which means any punishment less than death. Eleven of them authorize any punishment “that a court-martial may direct, including death,” and two of them mandatory prescribe death. Why should there not have been shocking punishments, shocking both because of their harshness and because of their senseless variations, when courts-martial have unlimited authority to punish as they please? I myself can not conceive that lawyers believe in such delegations of legislative power, either on principle or as a matter of policy. True it is that in times of peace Congress has authorized the President, if he sees fit, to prescribe certain maximum punishments, thus limiting the discretion of courts-martial. This is, nevertheless, an unwise if not an unlawful delegation, inasmuch as a matter of practical administration the military authorities, and not the President, prescribe such limits. Its only effect is to transfer the unlimited power of prescribing the punishment from the several courts-martial to a single military authority of the War Department. It is equally an abdication by Congress itself to prescribe the offense and the punishment.

Does the code contemplate the participation of a single lawyer? Of course, lawyers are used in the system. During this war we had a large corps of judge advocates. But they are without authority. They were upon the staff of the commanding general, and like all other staff officers are to do his bidding and be governed by him. No distinction is made between the legal staff and the purely military or administrative staff. It is presumed that the commanding general is as competent in the field of law as he is in the field of tactics, and as a general rule the word of his staff officer means little to him. The authority is the authority of the commanding general. Congress has conferred it upon him, and we may expect a military man, of all men, to exercise it. Lawyers are like other ordinary human beings. They are dependent upon the commanding general for advancement and recognition and professional success in the Army. Having no power and authority of his own a lawyer may not be expected to do other than support the view of his commanding general as best he can, whether right or wrong. Indeed, that he should do so is one of the tenets of the military profession. There is but one will—that is the will of the commanding general. I have seen lawyers placed in this position abase themselves in the face of military authority to the point where one would incline to doubt whether they had not abandoned their professional principles altogether. A member of the Board of Review appearing before the committee of the American Bar Association recently made the following statement:

"While in many cases the trials of enlisted men are not so elaborate as the trials of officers, and in many cases the rules of evidence are not observed and counsel is obviously inadequate, while in a considerable percentage of cases we find that the decision is not sustained by the fact, still I do not recall a single case in which morally we were not convinced that the accused was guilty."

And in this statement other judge advocates concurred. Verily they have received their reward. Such a statement shows to what extent subjection to the power of military command deflects legal judgments, imposes itself upon professional appreciations, and obscures those first principles which are normally regarded as the foundation stones of the temple of justice. The last man in the world to be expected to prefer his personal impression of moral guilt to guilt duly adjudged, his own judgment to the judgment of a court of law, should be the lawyer. Think a moment what it means for a lawyer sitting in a judicial capacity to say:

"We find the soldier has not been well tried; we find that the rules of evidence were transgressed in his case; we find that he had not the substantial assistance of counsel; we even find that the decision was not sustained by the facts of record; yet we are morally convinced that the accused was guilty, so let him be punished."

That means something worse than injustice to the accused; that is the argument of the mob; that is the road to anarchy. I myself prefer the statement made by Warren in answering the same contention in the British Army nearly 90 years ago:

"It concerns the safety of all citizens alike that legal guilt should be made the sole condition for legal punishment; for legal guilt rightly understood is nothing but moral guilt ascertained according to those rules of trial which experience and regulation have combined to suggest for the security of the State at large. * * * They (these fundamental principles of our law) have, nevertheless, been lost sight of and with a disastrous effect by the military authorities conducting and supporting the validity of the proceedings about to be brought before Your Majesty."

And the chief of all judge advocates, the Judge Advocate General himself, is also subject to this military power at its very height. He himself has not one particle of authority; he also may advise and recommend to the Chief of Staff, the highest exponent of military authority. By statute the Judge Advocate General is placed under the "supervision" of the Chief of Staff; by the statute also the Judge Advocate General will hold office for a term of four years unless sooner relieved or unless reappointed. He is subject to the supervision, power, and control of the Chief of Staff just as is the chief of the department that issues the rations, supplies, and matériel, or makes a military plan. His retention of office depends upon the approving judgment of the Chief of Staff. Such a man can not be independent, and in the end must be influenced by what the military authorities would have him do. That this is so is observable daily.

From top to bottom the administration of military justice is not governed by the rigid limitations of the code, but by the rigid powers of military command.

It is to be noted that throughout his defense the Judge Advocate General claims that the punishments have been comparatively light, since the code imposed no limit. The code should limit punishment. The difficulty is, it does not.

(2) He contends that the code is modern and enlightened.

He admits that prior to his "revision" of 1916, it was the British code of 1774, and I say that his "revision" did not revise, and that we still have the British code of 1774, itself of even more ancient origin. The best proof that our present articles are organically the British Articles of 1774 is to be found by comparing the two. The next best evidence is to be had out of the mouths of the highest officials who proposed the so-called revision of 1916, now relied upon as a complete modernization of the old British code. The British code was adopted under the exigency of the Revolution, and John Adams, the chief instrument in securing the adoption, attributed his surprising success to that emergent situation. There were few minor changes made during the Revolution, and up to the so-called code of 1806. In his statement to the Military Committee, the Judge Advocate General on May 14, 1912, said:

"As our code existed, it was substantially the same as the code of 1806."

And he also showed that the code of 1806 was substantially the code of 1774. Of this code of 1806, he said:

"The 1806 code was a reenactment of the articles in force during the Revolutionary War period, with only such modifications as were necessary to adapt them to the Constitution of the United States."

The modifications that were deemed necessary were simply such modifications as were necessary to make the articles fit into the mere machinery of our Government, and introduced the requisite terminology therefor. Speaking of his so-called revision of 1916, the Judge Advocate General said:

"It is thus accurate to say that during the long interval between 1806 and 1912—106 years—our military code has undergone no change except that which has been accomplished by piecemeal amendment. Of the 101 articles which made up the code of 1806, 87 survive in the present code unchanged, and most of the remainder without substantial change. Meanwhile, the British articles from which, as we have seen, these articles were largely taken, has been, mainly through the medium of the Army annual act, revised almost out of recognition, indicating that the Government with which it originated, has recognized its inadaptability to modern service conditions."

The so-called revision of 1916 was only a verbal one and not an organic revision. This, a comparison with the code as it previously existed will demonstrate. The proponents of the revision themselves so stated; they did not contemplate the making of a single fundamental change. This was clearly shown in the letter of the Secretary of War to the Committee on Military Affairs under date of May 18, 1912, and it is equally clearly shown by the letter of the Judge Advocate General, submitting the project in which he described "the more important changes sought to be made" as those of "arrangement and classification." Nobody, either the Judge Advocate General, the Secretary of War, or either committee of Congress, has ever regarded the project of 1916 as a substantial revision. The Judge Advocate General took occasion to deny that it was anything but a restatement of existing law for the sake of convenience and clarity. He himself pledged the committee—

"If Congress enacts this revision, the service will not be cognizant of any material changes in the procedure, and courts will function much the same as heretofore."

Such revision as was made made the structure rest even more firmly upon the principles that courts-martial are absolutely subject to the power of military command.

(3) He contends that the commanding officer may not put a man on trial without a preliminary hearing into the probability of the charge.

Notice, he does not say the code requires such hearing, but that regulations and orders of the War Department do. Therein lies the deficiency. Law is a rule established by a common superior, and as between the man to be tried and the officer ordering his trial such a regulation is not law. It establishes no right. Its only sanction is in the authority that issued it. It may be inadequate, ignored, disobeyed, modified, revoked, or its violation waived without involving the rights of the man to be tried. As a matter of fact, well known in the Army, such preliminary investigation as is prescribed is as a rule perfunctorily made. It must not be presumed to be very thorough when 96 per cent of all charges drawn are ordered for trial. The failure to provide for an investigation whereby it shall be legally determined that there is a prima facie case is at the origin of the great number of trials, and is therefore the source of much of the injustice.

Any officer can prefer charges against any enlisted man by virtue of his official status alone. The Judge Advocate General says that the Army follows the Anglo-American system of filing an information by a prosecuting officer. Of course not. Any officer may prefer charges. He acts under no special requirement or sense of obligation. The Judge Advocate General naively says that "this protection is invariable." Would you call it a protection if every man under the sun standing one degree above you in wealth or social position or official position had the power to indict you or inform against you and subject you to a criminal trial? Would you agree that even every civil officer in the land should have such a power over a civilian? And yet, every Army officer has that power by virtue of his office alone.

(4) He insists that there have not been too many trials; indeed, that there have been comparatively few.

He admits that in the year preceding the armistice there were 28,000 general courts-martial and 340,000 inferior courts. He uses 4,000,000 as the size of the Army during the period, whereas the average for the period was, of course, less than 2,000,000. Applying the ratio of Army trials to the population of the United States, you would have 1,500,000 felonies and 19,000,000 misdemeanors tried annually. Comparison will also show that we tried seven times as many men per thousand per year as either France or England. He takes great consolation in the fact that the percentage of trials was smaller in the war Army than in the old Regular Army. That is true, but a cause for shame, not consolation. The system as applied to the Army in peace was intolerable. General courts-martial in the Regular Army averaged six per hundred men per annum. Applying the Regular Army ratio of trials to the National Army, the result would have been for the year mentioned 120,000 general courts-martial and 1,500,000 inferior courts-martial, surely a number that would have destroyed any army.

The Judge Advocate General and the War Department now say that the injustices revealed during the war have been due largely to the new officer. Quite the contrary. The records show that the new officer, bringing into the Army his civilian sense of justice, has preferred and ordered fewer courts-martial than the regular. It must be remembered also that the old experienced Regular Army officers have been the officers with the authority to convene general courts-martial and approve the punishments awarded by them. They are therefore responsible.

In any event, inasmuch as our wars are to be fought by citizen soldiers, no system ought to be maintained that must inevitably result in injustice by reason of the inexperience of the men.

(5) He contends that our officers are sufficiently grounded in the law to be military judges.

This, again, is a matter of standards. It may be informative to point out the inconsistency between the statement that the new officers are responsible for the deficiencies of the administration of military justice developed during the war and the contention that they are competent military judges. Of course, they are not competent as judges. A case before a court-martial involves the entire criminal law. Courts-martial are judge as well as jury. His regard for the judicial requisites can be properly appreciated in view of his argument that the study of the brief course in the elements of law at West Point or of the course by the new officers, in the three months' training camp is sufficient "to insure an acquaintance with the law by the members of a court-martial."

In any event, he says, the deficiencies of the trial court will find its corrective supplement in the reviewing judge advocate—one system of legal mechanics that stands the pyramid on its pinnacle.

(6) He contends that the judge advocate does not combine the incompatible function of prosecutor, adviser of the court, and defender of the accused.

The law and universal practice are otherwise. The judge advocate shall prosecute in the name of the United States (art. 17). If accused is not represented, the judge advocate shall, throughout the proceedings, advise him of his legal rights (art. 17). This is defined to be the substantial duty of counsel (par. 96, M. C. M.) The judge advocate is the legal adviser of the court (par. 99, M. C. M.). There are cases in which a single officer set a trap for the accused, was the prosecuting witness, was appointed judge advocate to prosecute the case, and, besides, was also specially detailed as counsel for the accused, and performed all functions. For such an instance, see case of Pvt. Claud Bates, in which, when I pointed out these inconsistencies, the commanding general complained I was "trying to break up our court-martial system."

(7) He resents the criticism that second lieutenants, knowing nothing of law and less of court-martial procedure, are assigned to the defense of enlisted men charged with capital or other serious offenses.

He admits, however, that in an examination of 20 cases a lieutenant appeared as counsel in 13 of them. I can go further and say that in an examination of 5,000 cases lieutenants of but few months' experience appeared in 3,871, or 77 per cent of them. This was perfectly natural; under the system of administration the duty of counsel is an irksome one, imposed upon those who have not enough rank and standing to avoid it. He also contends that all officers are properly equipped to perform the duties of counsel, by reason of the fact, already stated, "that graduates of every training camp have studied and passed an examination upon the Manual for Courts-Martial, and therefore the above criticism is upon its face unfounded." He also finds that after officers of rank and experience have been assigned as members of the court and as judge advocate it is not feasible to find legally qualified officers to act as counsel. "No one," he says, "who has any acquaintance at all with conditions in the theater of war would suppose for a moment that this is practicable." He then dismisses the whole subject by saying that, no matter how incompetent is counsel, he finds in the scrutiny subsequently given the cases, "the most satisfactory assurance that such deficiencies as may from time to time occur through the inexperience of officers assigned for the defense have been adequately cured." It might be remarked that it is a rather sad criticism of any judicial system that it regards military rank as the main assurance of efficiency.

(8) He is inclined to resist the view that improvident pleas of guilty are received from those charged with capital crimes.

He says the percentage of such pleas is a small one; and so it should be hoped, although such pleas are known to be surprisingly frequent. As an argument to offset the inference of resultant injustice, he relies upon "the common instincts of fairness and justice of the officers taken recently from civilian life to sit upon the courts as judges." It is interesting to note that shortly before this, in a public address before the bar of Chicago, the Judge Advocate General attributed the harshness of the system to the inexperience of the new officers, as follows:

"Undoubtedly there are things wrong with the administration of military justice. We have brought over 100,000 officers into the Military Establishment of the United States within the brief space of a year. Their commissions are their credentials to sit in the courts and administer justice, and it would be strange, indeed, if there were not a number of cases in which a disproportionate punishment is given."

(9) He admits that commanding generals return acquittals to the courts with directions to reconsider them.

He thinks, however, that "the very object of this institution is to secure the due application of the law," and he adds: "My own experience in the field can recall more than one case in which the verdict of acquittal was notoriously unsound, and in which the action of the commanding general in returning the case furnished a needed opportunity for doing full justice in the case." He finds "that this power is a useful one, and that it is not in fact in any appreciable number of cases so exercised as to amount to abuse of the commanding general's military prestige." He finds that out of 1,000 cases there are only 95 acquittals, anyway, and he says:

"Of these 95 acquittals 39 were returned only for formal correction; of the remaining 56 the court adhered to its original judgment in 38 cases, and in only 18 cases was the judgment of acquittal revoked upon reconsideration and the accused found guilty of any offense."

Though of every 95 acquittals 18 are changed into convictions by the direction of the commanding general, this he considers negligible. This leaves only 77 acquittals out of a thousand tried. Out of deference to unreasonable public opinion, however, he would recommend a change to accord with "the British practice," which he regards as the limit of liberality.

(10) He contends that under all the circumstances the sentences imposed by courts-martial are not, as a rule, excessively severe.

He indicates clearly that we would have profited by "keeping in mind the solemn and terrible warning recorded expressly for our benefit by Brig. Gen. Oakes" in the Civil War, that the inexorable attitude of shooting all deserters would prove merciful in the end, and argues that, inasmuch as we did not adopt that policy, we should not be "reproached for severity." Dealing with the offense of absence without leave, he would have us believe that "this offense is in many cases virtually the offense of an actual desertion," whereas exactly the opposite is true. The records will show that absence without leave is more frequently than otherwise charged as desertion, since in cases of "doubt" the higher offense is always charged; besides, several commanding officers ordered that all absences, even for a few days, be charged and tried as desertion. There has been no greater source of injustice than the indiscriminate treatment of absence without leave as desertion and the procurement of convictions accordingly. Along the same line, the Judge Advocate General argues that disobedience of orders is always to be punished most severely, without regard to the kind or materiality of the order, and he asserts that the disintegration of the Russian Army was due not to age-long tyranny or oppression or reaction, or any other like cause, but entirely to a failure to treat "disobedience in small things and great alike."

Finally, however, after much argument, he concedes that these sentences were long, but justifies them on the ground that "the code prescribes no minimum," and on the further ground "that probably none of these officers (who pronounce sentences) supposed for a moment that these long terms would actually be served"; and he reminds us that there has already been a 90 per cent reduction. He ignores the fact that, whether such sentences were or were not intended to be served, they greatly outraged justice. If intended to be served, they abused justice; if not so intended, they mocked it. He says, "Nobody intended they should be served," which, as one writer has recently put it, is "like hanging up a scarecrow to frighten the birds that does not scare them as soon as they learn that it is a sham, and then use it to rest on."

He delights in the fact, however, that "this very matter of variation in sentences is one of the triumphs of modern criminal law," and finds virtue in a situation that gives courts-martial "full play for the adaptation of the sentences to the individual case." A court should have sufficient latitude to make the sentence fit the offense; but I had not supposed that this "modern triumph" would authorize any court—not even a court-martial possessing the virtue of being untrained, unlettered, and unskilled in the administration of justice—to punish an offense, however trivial, "as it may direct," with life imprisonment or death if it pleases.

(13) He denies that the Judge Advocate General's office partakes in the attitude of severity.

His defense speaks rather loudly for itself. I must be permitted to say this: Every organ of that office designed to secure correctness of court-martial procedure or moderation of sentences—which now he calls so effectively to his aid—was instituted by me and by me alone. Without any authority from or help of the War Department or of the Judge Advocate General I organized the several divisions of the office—the board of review and the first and second divisions thereof—and the clemency board—and it was my effort, taken in his absence, that showed the necessity for the special clemency board, which, though restricted in every covert way by the department and the office of the Judge Advocate General, has done so much recently to reduce sentences. The Judge Advocate General's attitude has been one of absolute recation. He has not approved of such organization; he has not approved of my efforts to secure correctness of court-martial judgments or moderation of them. Twice have I been relieved by him from all participation in matters of military justice and superseded by officers who shared his views. He says:

"On the 20th of January you (the Secretary) approved a recommendation of mine, dated January 18, proposing the institution of a system of review for the purpose of equalizing punishment through recommendations for clemency."

He does not say, however, that this was done at my instance, not his; that when he returned to the office last January he published a written office order relieving me from all connection with administration of military justice.

He does not say that on or about January 8 I went to him and urged that something be done to modify courts-martial sentences, and that he declined to take any action, as "to do so would impeach the military judicial machinery."

He does not say that while he was absent from the office a few days thereafter I filed with the Secretary of War a memorandum, dated January 11, 1919, in which I depicted the shocking severity of courts-martial sentences, and that I was driven to take advantage of Gen. Crowder's absence to bring this to the attention of the Secretary of War. He does not point out that he had me demoted because I did not share his views upon the subject of military justice and had me superseded by an officer who did. He does not point out that notwithstanding he kept me as president of the clemency board, as an assurance to the public that clemency would be granted, he "packed" that board with the officer who wrote this defense of the Judge Advocate General, the chief propagandist for the maintenance of the system, and with other friends of his who shared his reactionary views. He does not point out that the clemency board was given no jurisdiction to recommend clemency for the prisoners in France, since "the people at home were not so interested in the men who had committed offenses in the theater of operations"; that is, the prisoners in France were not in a position to become politically articulate or embarrassing to the department. He does not point out that the dissolution of the clemency board had been determined upon, and I had been notified accordingly, without its having passed upon any of the cases in France, and that those cases were not taken up until recently, and would never have been taken up except for my written official insistence. He does not point out that a special board of review, composed of men sharing his own views, was constituted, with the sole function of reexamined and revising all findings made by the clemency board wherever clemency was to be based on inadequate trial.

(14) He contends that the action taken in the Judge Advocate General's Office has been effectual for justice.

He reaches this conclusion on the ground that seldom or never is the Judge Advocate General's Office overruled. Of course, so long as the Judge Advocate General of the Army does what the military authorities want him to do he will not be overruled. When the Judge Advocate General of the Army does, as he did in the death cases from France and as he habitually does, seeks an agreement with the Chief of Staff as to what his decision ought to be, when he regards himself not as a judge but as an advocate to uphold the hands of the military authorities, he is not likely to be overruled. I, as Acting Judge Advocate General, was overruled. I was told by the highest military authorities, in a certain case in which a half score of men were sentenced to be hanged, and in which the military authorities insisted on the execution, notwithstanding the fact that they had not been lawfully tried, that I was disqualifying myself ever to be Judge Advocate General by my insistence upon their rights. Through my insistence, however, these men were not hanged.

You can not expect the Judge Advocate General of the Army to be a judicial officer when the law does not make him one. He himself is subject to the power of military command. By section 4, act of February 14, 1903 (32 Stat., 831), the Judge Advocate General is placed under the "supervision" of the Chief of Staff in the same way that the Subsistence, Quartermaster, Engineer, Medical, Ordnance, and other departments are. He is appointed for four years, he may be relieved if he incurs the displeasure of the department, and he will not be reappointed except with the recommendation and approval of the department. He holds his office, in effect, at the will of the Chief of Staff, under whose supervision he is. If the highest law officer of the Army is subject to such military "supervision," how much more effective must the same "supervision" be over the subordinate officers of the Judge Advocate General's department assigned to the staff of a military commander?

HIS REMEDIES.

The Judge Advocate General now says he favors vesting the President with power to review courts-martial judgments for errors of law, and therefore recommends the enactment of the bill submitted by him last year—section 3692, H. R. 9164. Please look at that bill. If enacted it would (a) effectually place the power in the hands of the Chief of Staff, the head of the military hierarchy; (b) authorize the reversal of an acquittal; (c) authorize increasing the punishment; (d) authorize increasing the degree of guilt determined by the court.

The truth is, the Judge Advocate General does not believe in revisory power. He has ever insisted that military law is the kind of law that "finds its fittest field of application in the camp," and that such revision would militate against the requisite promptness of punishment. He has not acted in good faith. In correspondence with the senior officer of his department on duty with Gen. Pershing's staff, shortly after his submission of the above bill, he expressed his real views and purposes. In that letter, of April 5, he said something had to be done to head off a "threatened congressional investigation," "to silence criticism," "to prevent talk about the establishment of courts of appeal," and "prove that an accused does get some kind of revision of his proceedings other than the revision at field headquarters."

The other remedies proposed, consisting of a few more orders and changes of the manual and empowering the department to prescribe maximum limits of punishment in peace and war, I deemed unworthy of comment.

The Judge Advocate General assumes that he has reached the limit of liberality when he approaches in a few respects what he conceives to be the British system, not appreciating that, though that system is far more liberal than our own, it, too, has become the subject of criticism throughout Britain. The British Government has appointed a committee of inquiry of civilian barristers to examine "the whole system under which justice is administered in the Army." Differing from our own War Department, that Government gives evidence of a desire to know the facts and to find a remedy.

HIS CRITICISM OF MY PERSONAL CONDUCT.

1. He claims that my efforts to establish a revisory power within the department through the office opinion of November 10 to that end was without his knowledge.

Assuming this to be true, it was well known in the department at that time that he had authorized me to manage the office in my own way and without further reference to him, except for certain appointments having political significance. But, as I heretofore said to the Secretary of War in the paper published in the New York Times, I did take occasion to consult Gen. Crowder upon the subject, and he replied:

"I approve heartily of your effort. Go ahead and put it over. I suspect, however, that you may have some difficulty with the military men arising out of article 37."

I knew of no change of attitude in him until I was advised shortly thereafter that he had prepared a brief in opposition, and two or three days later he resumed charge of the office and filed the brief. When I found this to be so, I went to Gen. Crowder and accosted him about his change of attitude. In explanation thereof he said:

"Ansell, I had to go back on you. I am sorry, but it was necessary to do it in order to save my official reputation."

He then added that he was nearing the end of his service; that he could not afford to be held responsible for the injustice that had gone on, if the existing law could be construed to have prevented it, and adverted to the fact that fixing such responsibility upon him would injure his career in this war. He then told me that the Secretary of War held him personally responsible and had "upbraided" him at the Army and Navy Club for sitting by and permitting this injustice to go uncorrected. The general then said that, humiliated at such imputation, he had gone back to the Provost Marshal General's office and consulted some of his friends there, and they decided that it was necessary for his self-protection to oppose the opinion the office had prepared, and that two of the officers there helped him prepare the countermemorandum.

2. He says that I surreptitiously obtained an order appointing me as Acting Judge Advocate General in his absence.

Please look at his defense, pages 54 and 55. He admits that he said:

"It will be entirely agreeable to me to have you take up directly and in your own way with the Secretary of War the subject matter of your letter of yesterday."

I did take it up in a formal memorandum addressed to the Chief of Staff, the channel of communication prescribed by orders. I never spoke to the Chief of Staff on the subject, and never endeavored in any way to obtain favorable action upon the memorandum. I let it take its course. Under 1132 Revised Statutes it was necessary that I be designated as Acting Judge Advocate General if I was to be charged with the policies and responsibilities of the office. Otherwise, the policies and responsibilities were Gen. Crowder's, who was not in a position to assume them. In furtherance of his ambitions he held three and sometimes four positions during this war, and he was in no position to perform the duties of Judge Advocate General or prescribe the policies of that office.

Therein lies the difficulty. I was held responsible for the output, but for means and power was kept dependent upon an officer who was absent, absorbed in other tasks, and who differed with me on the policy of military justice.

The General bases his charge of surreptition solely on the ground that his approval of my designation as Acting Judge Advocate General was conditioned upon my taking it up "directly" with the Secretary of War. I had assumed that his language was frank and candid and not governed by the quibbling construction he now places upon it.

His other charge of surreptitious method is likewise based solely upon the fact that I made a recommendation on the subject of military justice in France to the Chief of Staff in a written memorandum which spoke for itself and which was never supplemented by any word or action of mine in support of it to secure favorable action. It is quibbling to say, as he does say (p. 58), that my statement to the effect that the commanding general of the American Expeditionary Forces was opposing means for a better supervision of military justice was untrue for the reason that the opposition was officially voiced to the department not by Gen. Pershing in person but by his senior judge advocate and staff officer, Gen. Bethel; the staff officer, of course, representing the views of his chief.

3. He says that I myself had at first approved the death penalty in the cases from France. If I had done so, the record would show it. The record is to the contrary. Neither is it to be expected that I should have once approved them and then have written a strong memorandum against approval without reference to my former position. The truth is, at the time the cases were being studied by Gen. Crowder, so far as he did study them, and his assistants I was away from the office in Canada. Col. Mayes, senior officer in my absence, has recently called my attention to this fact and informs me further that he has recently testified before the Inspector General that he had looked over the cases, but that I had not.

CONCLUSION.

The War Department has indeed undertaken to maintain this vicious system at all costs and by methods which reveal the weakness of both the system and the department.

Very truly, yours,

S. T. ANSELL.

Mr. ANSELL. Now, if the committee please, my first proposition was that our code of military justice—the Articles of War—is absolutely archaic, taken from the British military code of 1774, which was of even more ancient origin.

I have shown that that was true, of course, unless the Crowder revision of 1916 modernized it. I wish to say that was admitted as an argument for changing the code in 1916.

The Judge Advocate General, in proposing that revision, pointed out the fact that the code was the code of 1774, and even after the speech made by Senator Chamberlain in the Senate pointing out the archaic character of this code and the injustice done, had been made, the Judge Advocate General in an address in the city of Chicago, reported in the press, which he has frequently referred to since, is shown as saying that all that the American Bar Association's president, Mr. Page, and Senator Chamberlain and other people who were going after this system, said, was true, except for the revision of 1916 of which he was the author.

So I wish the committee would look at the character of the revision of 1916, which of course constitutes our present Articles of War, and compare the revision with the articles as they existed prior to the revision. That could be rather easily done, though it would be something of a task, by comparing them in the committee print of that year, or both years, 1912 and 1916. In one column you will find the Articles of War as they existed prior to the revision, and in the other column you will find the proposed revision; and I say to you that you can not find a single substantial change; and I say to you that Gen. Crowder and the Secretary of War, then Mr. Stimson, did not contemplate a single substantial change. Such is clearly stated by Secretary Stimson, in his letter of April 18, 1912, to the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, in submitting the proposed legislation.

Mr. Stimson described the broad features of the project as a matter of such draftsmanship as would bring together all this disassociated material and make it accessible and easy of enforcement. He did ask for a new inferior court, which was a rather real improvement, as it took the place of two inferior courts of similar jurisdiction; and certainly, as he says, we undertook this revision in a conservative spirit.

Gen. Crowder in his letter to the Secretary of War of April 12, 1912, submitting his project for revision, describes the more important changes sought to be made as: "Those of arrangement and classification." And that revision did nothing but assemble and classify and render more definite the old articles. It is that kind of revision.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The only real reform in the articles of 1915 was that which admitted the creation of the disciplinary barracks where young men who had been convicted by court-martial might be restored to the colors.

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; of course there had been, in the year before, legislation by your committee that did that also.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; it is very interesting, since you have brought up that subject, and the committee can understand just what respect the War Department paid to liberalizing legislation.

Mr. ANSELL. In 1878 the Congress of the United States, upon rather more thorough than usual consideration, passed an act authorizing the Secretary of War to restore men to the colors who had been dishonorably discharged, and I say to this the committee that up until the time I came to the War Department there had never been a single man restored to the colors of the army under that statute, which was then 40 years old—not one. And I wrote an opinion, soon after I got here, reviving that statute, resurrecting it; and that was one thing, Senator, that we did talk about, as you may remember, since you were intensely interested in such reformation.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. ANSELL. And that opinion, while Mr. Garrison was Secretary of War, was adopted after a great deal of study and after a great deal of opposition in the War Department; and then they thought that there was not machinery, and the proper appropriations, and all that sort of thing, and the barracks were still called a prison, and they came and finally got a redeclaration, a reenactment, of that act, changing the name of the prison and modernizing it, out of your committee in 1915, and it was reenacted in the Articles of War in 1916.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. ANSELL. It shows you that there sat the War Department all these 35 or 40 years with a statute that permitted the reclamation of these men, and not one of them had ever been restored to the colors.

Now I wish, without taking up the time of the committee, to insert in the record the results of a study made by me of just what Gen.

Crowder said, and I have taken it from the hearing, with respect to every one of these Articles of War, and I ask that that be inserted in the record of the hearings. It is taken briefly, but quoted from the hearings, beginning in 1912 and terminating in 1916, with respect to each article.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Stating its purpose, with respect to each article, and defining its purpose?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes, sir; exactly. If I may have permission to do that, I will turn this over to the stenographer, Mr. Chairman.

Senator LENROOT. Certainly.

(The matter referred to is here printed in full, as follows:)

ANSELL EXHIBIT A-2.

-----
The author of the project, discussing it before the committees, article by article, was quick to assure them upon every occasion that the project made no substantial change in the articles, which he truthfully traced to the British articles of 1774 and beyond.

The enacting clause: The enacting clause of the project, he said, defined those who are subject to military law by bringing together related provisions of the statute. He said:

"I invite your attention to the fact that we had to look at the enacting clause of the old law and then at article 64 of that law to ascertain who were subject to the articles and governed by them. An attempt has been made to remedy this in section 1342 on the first page and article 2 on the next page."

Article 1: "The first article is given over wholly to definition, and subdivisions (a) and (b) are a substantial repetition of the enacting law." The other changes "have been done for convenience in drafting subsequent articles to get certain descriptive terms that will avoid the necessity for repetition." (P. 24.)

Article 2: "We now come to article 2 of the revision. There has been such an enumeration here as will make it unnecessary if this code is enacted to look elsewhere to ascertain who are within the military jurisdiction. I have drawn into the domain of this article all the special legislation we have had on this subject of jurisdiction as to persons." (P. 24.)

Article 3: "Article 3 is simply declaratory of the three classes of courts." (P. 24.)

Article 4: "Article 4 will now claim your special attention, because it involves a radical change in the existing law." (The change authorizes Regular officers to sit on the trial of "other forces.") (P. 25.)

Article 5: "Article 5 places the number of officers on a court-martial within the discretion of the convening authority," where it was explained it had ever been by construction. The old article declared that a general court shall not consist of less than 13 when that number can be convened "without manifest injury to the service." In 1810 Attorney General Wirth held that a court was not a legal one if 13 could have been convened without manifest injury to the service. But the theory that the question of "manifest injury" is reviewable by the President or any superior authority ceased to be admissible by virtue of the decision of the Supreme Court in Martin v. Mott (12 Wheaton, 34). (P. 26.)

Article 6: "Article 6 provided a new court taking over the jurisdiction of regimental and garrison courts provided in the eighty-first and eighty-second articles of war." (P. 26.)

Article 7: "In article 7 the summary court is left as it was in the old law." (P. 27.)

Article 8: "I have included the President of the United States (as a convening authority) for the reason that notwithstanding he was the commander in chief of the Army, his authority to convene a general court-martial was denied in one case, or rather questioned because of the fact that the existing law provided that he could appoint only when certain other officers were the accusers. They said that that statute by necessary inference denied his right to act in other cases; but in the Judge Advocate General Swain litigation the Supreme Court of the United States held that the authority is inherent in the President as commander in chief, and that he could always convene a court-martial when necessary. Therefore I have inserted the term 'President of the United States.' Now, when you come to the next—the commander of a territorial division or department—you are repealing existing law." (Pp. 27, 22.)

Article 9: "Article 9 refers to the new special court. While there is a good deal of underscoring in that line, it is simply a restatement of the old law." (P. 27.)

Article 10: "Article 10 is simply a restatement of the summary court act." (P. 27.)

Article 11: "Article 11 carries one change, and that is for the appointment of an Assistant Judge Advocate General and general court-martial." (P. 23.)

Article 12: "Article 12 is a new article. It simply declares the jurisdiction of the existing court-martial (now left to construction). I take it there is no impropriety in making that a matter of express provision." (P. 28.)

Article 13: "Article 13 deals with the jurisdiction of the new special court, and it is substantially identical to the old articles 81 and 82." (P. 28.)

Article 14: "Article 14 fixes the jurisdiction of a summary court-martial both as to persons and offenses and follows the language of the old law, except in one regard (a verbal one)." (P. 28.)

Article 15: "Article 15 was designed to give express recognition to the military commission in our service. The general said:

"While the military commission has not been formerly authorized by statute, its jurisdiction as a war court has been upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States. It is an institution of the greatest importance in a period of war and should be preserved. * * * there will be more instances in the future than in the past when the jurisdiction of courts-martial will overlap that of war courts, and the question will arise whether Congress having vested jurisdiction by statute, the common law of war jurisdiction was not ousted. I wish to make it perfectly clear by the new article that in the subject case the jurisdiction of the war court is concurrent.'" (Pp. 28, 29.)

Article 16: "Article 16 repeats with only slight verbal changes the provision of article 79." (P. 29.)

Article 17: "We now come to article 17, which deals with the duties of the judge advocate. The underscored language in this article introduces a modification respecting the representation of the accused by counsel (the modification was to relieve the judge advocate of his duty to advise accused when the latter is represented by counsel). With respect to the right of the accused to employ counsel, the Judge Advocate General says:

"The authority we have for the employment of counsel is given by an Army regulation which works satisfactorily, and in the experimental stage I would be glad to have it left, and there is no complaint from the service in that regard and the general objection to bringing into the statute the recognition of the practice of employing civil counsel.'" (P. 29.)

Article 18: "We now come to article 18 which deals with challenge. The new article is a departure from the old in but one regard—the Government is given the right of challenge, whereas the old article gave it to the accused only; but the article has been construed from time immemorial as making the right mutual. It is not desirable, however, that this important right should continue to rest upon construction. I have, therefore, made it a matter of express provision. With respect to allowing a few peremptory challenges, the general said: 'It would be an innovation and an unwise one.' The right of peremptory challenge which is common to our civil courts has never had a place in our military jurisprudence. This is a concession of the summary character of the military jurisdiction and is not the only instance where the fact is made manifest that a soldier, when he takes on the obligations of an enlistment contract, surrenders rights which he had as a civilian. Our military jurisprudence is based upon this fact which has constitutional recognition in that the Constitution excepts from the requirement that no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime except upon an indictment from grand jury cases which arise in the land and naval forces. It is likewise held that the constitutional right to be confronted by witnesses and to have a speedy public trial have relation to prosecutions before civil courts of criminal jurisdiction of the United States and do not apply to military courts. While we have extended by legislation many of these constitutional rights to an accused before a military court, this right to peremptory challenge has not been recognized, and I am inclined to think that its introduction would be fraught with grave consequences." (Pp. 30, 31.) The articles from 18 to 37 deal with procedure. None of these changes is fundamental.

Article 19: "New article 19 states the oath of members and judge advocate of the court-martial. There is no change from the old law except in one regard" (minor). "In article 19 the old law is repeated with one omission and one addition" (minor changes). (P. 32.)

Article 20: "Article 20 deals with the subject of continuances and repeats the provision of the existing law" (art. 93). (P. 33.)

Article 21: "In article 21 the word 'accused' is substituted for the word 'prisoner'—a mere verbal change." (P. 33.)

Article 22: "Article 22 is based upon section 1202, Revised Statutes, which was enacted in 1863. That section was in the nature of an article of war, and is properly transferred from the general body of statutes to the new code." (P. 33.)

Article 23: "Article 23 sets forth oaths of witnesses. This is the same as the old law except in one regard the words 'in case of affirmation the closing sentence of adjuration will be omitted,' have been added."

Article 24: "We now come to article 24, which is taken from the act of March 2, 1911, already referred to."

Article 25. "We now come to article 25, which relates to the admissibility of deposition. The existing article (91), which this article substitutes, provides that depositions of witnesses residing beyond the limits of the State, Territory, or District in which any military court may be ordered to sit, may be taken upon reasonable notice. I have preserved this provision, but have given the authority also to take depositions of witnesses residing beyond the 100-mile limit following in this record the Federal statutes."

Article 26: "Article 26 specifies the persons before whom depositions may be taken. The existing law contains no provisions of this character (and has left the subject to regulation)."

Article 27: "Article 27 deals with courts of inquiry. There is no substantial change from the old law." (Art. 121.)

Article 28: "Article 28 simply repeats the provisions of the old law."

Article 29: "Article 29, like article 28, is substantially the rule of evidence and substitutes that part of existing article 50 which is in its character administrative." (Note.—This is an extension of the definition of desertion.)

Article 30: "Article 30 is a new article and prescribes a form of oath for reporters and interpreters (left heretofore to regulation)."

Article 31: "We now come to article 31, which deals with closed sessions of the court. Inasmuch as existing law requires that the judge advocate be excluded, I have also excluded the assistant judge advocate. This is the only new provision."

Article 32: "Article 32, the order of voting, has already been called to your attention. There is no substantial change."

Article 33: "Article 33 deals with contempt. There is no substantial change."

Article 34: "Article 34 relates to the records of general courts-martial. This is a new article. It is nowhere expressly provided in the existing code that a general court-martial shall keep a record, but the statute refers to approving, forwarding, and preserving the court-martial record and therefore evidently contemplates that a record shall be kept. As a general court-martial is a court of general jurisdiction and tries crimes of the gravest character, it seems it should be important that there should be express provision of statute on the subject of the record to be kept. This matter has heretofore been governed by Army regulation."

Article 35: "Article 35 makes a similar provision respecting special and summary court-martial preserving the language of the old law relating to the summary courts."

Article 36: "Article 36 simply provides for the disposition of the records (heretofore governed, as you will notice, in the old article 113)."

Article 37: Not discussed.

Article 38: "I come now to articles which I think will claim the special attention of the committee. They are new. Article 38 deals with rules to be prescribed by the President, regulating the mode of proof and procedure of courts-martial. I have followed section 862, Revised Statutes, in drafting that article which provides that 'the mode of proof in causes of equity and of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction shall be according to rules now or hereafter prescribed by the Supreme Court, except as herein specially provided.' The President is our supreme court in trials by courts-martial, and I have undertaken to paraphrase that and give him the corresponding power in respect to courts-martial." (Note.—This is one of the three real innovations of the Crowder revision. It is entirely reactionary. Therefore, courts-martial have been regarded as bound to apply the rules of evidence as they were recognized and applied by the civil criminal courts of the United States. This article authorizes the President to prescribe rules of evidence which has not been done and in the absence of which courts-martial and revising authorities have deemed themselves authorized to do largely as they pleased. It needs no argument to show that courts-martial try men for the most serious offenses with the most serious penal consequences and should be compelled to abide by the well-established rules of evidence.)

Article 39: "The next article is 39. It will be noticed that article 39 is based upon existing section 1025, Revised Statutes, and goes no further in granting immunity from error to courts-martial than the Congress of the United States has extended to those courts trying criminal cases. But that statute is now about to be amended and apparently the consideration given the new legislation shows substantial unanimity of opinion in its favor." (This is the second of the three innovations made by the Crowder revision. It should be remembered that up to this time there was no authority in the War Department to set aside or reverse or grant new trials, no matter how erroneous the judgment. The convening authority could approve or disapprove for any reason he saw fit. This has been considered as a limitation upon that power. Furthermore, as authorizing the finding of guilty upon a charge for an offense that was not charged, it provides solely for and constitutes an offense made punishable by the Articles of War. No article has given so much trouble as this during this war.

Article 40: "The next, article 40, is our statute of limitations, and it takes the place of article 103."

Article 41: "The purpose of article 41 is to extend to the Military Establishment by statute a substantial guarantee against double jeopardy. There is no change."

Article 42: "Article 42, which is existing article 98, is retained without substantial change."

Article 43: "Article 43 is a substitute for existing article 97, which is defective (in a minor way). We have been doing this by construction right along—but I have been apprehensive that some one would serve a writ of habeas corpus and would say that it was not authorized under the strict letter of the statute which permits confinement in a penitentiary only for offenses so punishable by a civil law. I want a definite rule in the law. I do not want to be taking the risk any longer."

Article 44: "Article 44 contains a charge which illustrates again this point to which I have just referred. (Note.—His reference was to writing in the law what construction alone had sanctioned. His statement was as follows:

"'As I have already pointed out, I hope the committee will give us a law sanctioning the meaning we have had to read into the old articles by construction alone. This is the real argument for this project of revision. I want to get off the uncertain ground where we have been for 106 years.'

"Note further: By this article there was crystallized into the law by statute for the first time the theory that a majority of the court-martial only was necessary to convict in the general case. When the committee called the Judge Advocate General with respect to the advisability of requiring unanimity in the case of death penalties, he said:

"'To require a unanimous vote for the infliction of the death penalty in time of war would be going a long way, I think, toward impairing the success of the field operations of an army.'

"And again:

"'I request that the committee consider very carefully the question of introducing into our military jurisprudence the principles of the civil law, which requires, in addition to these safeguards, a unanimous verdict.'

"But in the same connection, he said:

"'I am asking you further on in this revision to sanction trial by court-martial for murder in time of peace, committed by a person subject to military law outside the geographical limits of the United States and the District of Columbia; that is, in our foreign possessions. It is one of the more important provisions of this revision.'

Article 45: "Article 45 is a revision of article 100 of the old code, and certain language has been omitted."

Article 46: "Article 46 is a repetition of the old law."

Articles 47 and 48: "Gentlemen, there is nothing in articles 47 or 48 which involves a substantial change of the old law. There is no change; it is simply rearrangement such as I ought to call to the attention of the committee. I have included rape among the offenses where the confirmation of the President is not required in time of war."

Article 49: "In article 49, I have incorporated new language (authorizing the commanding general to approve a proper sentence for a lesser included offense, when he thinks the larger offense is not proved). There is nothing further in the article which is not new."

Article 50: "Nor is there anything new in article 50, except in line 9, commencing with the last word 'for' to the word 'held' in the tenth line."

Article 51: "Article 51 is simply a repetition of the old law."

Article 52: "Article 52 has some new language taken from the existing regulations."

Article 53: "Article 53. The new article does not undertake any enumeration."

Article 54: "Article 54. You will notice in article 54 there is nothing new."

Article 55: "I have omitted from article 55 the (certain) phraseology."

Article 56: "There is no change in article 56."

Article 57: "We now come to article 57 for punishing deserters, to which I have already referred. The defect sought to be remedied is in old article 47 on the subject of desertion. The intention of the old article was undoubtedly to punish desertion in time of war differently from desertion in time of peace. You will notice the word 'shall' is misplaced in the second line so as to carry the construction that the article deals only with punishment in time of war. There is another defect which is corrected by the insertion of the words 'when under orders for active service when war is imminent.' A war might be imminent and we might send orders to the 15th Cavalry at Fort Myer to be ready to march, and a desertion committed after receipt of such an order would be just as harmful as one occurring after the war had been declared. I have worked those two ideas into the new article."

Article 58: "Article 58 is the same as the old law, but I have made the phraseology a little clearer."

Article 59: "Article 59 is simply a repetition of so much of existing article 50 as was punitive in character."

Article 60: "In article 60 I have combined six articles of existing code into one short article."

In Gen. Crowder's introduction to the punitive articles he contended strongly for a retention of the authority that courts-martial may punish all offenses denounced therein at their discretion, and said:

"This principle of punishing at discretion is old in military codes and it is observed in the British code to-day. It is what is distinctive of the military code of to-day. I think that the service would feel very handicapped if that discretion were limited in the way it is in the civil codes. I do not think there is anything more vital in this legislation than the preservation of the principle of punishment at the discretion of a court-martial restricted only, as I have stated, as to the imposition of death sentences, penitentiary confinement, and in time of peace as the President may prescribe in orders issued under the authority of the legislation of 1890. It would be a radical departure if that principle should be impaired in this revision. As I have pointed out, it is a principle that characterizes the military code as distinguished from the civil code and characterizes the code of England as well as of this country. It is a fact that the British code does not undertake to limit the discretion of courts-martial in the assessing of punishment, except in a very limited way. I do not think that the discretion of the court-martial should be further restricted."

"Mr. SLAYDEN. You do not think it would be wise to define the offense and fix the maximum and minimum in the statutes?"

"Gen. CROWDER. No, sir."

Article 61: "Article 61 extends the authorities against whom contemptuous language may be used punishable by these articles to include the Secretary of War."

Article 62: "The next article 62 is a related article. It treats of disrespect toward superior officers, and the only change is from the word 'commanding' in the old article, in the left-hand column, to the word 'superior' in the new article." (Note this is a very large extension of a punitive article, and subjects to its penalties disrespect to any superior officer whether he is a commanding officer or not.)

Article 63: "I have inserted the word 'willfully' to conform to the accepted construction of the present article."

Article 64: "Article 64 is new and is introduced into the code in order to emphasize in a separate provision the necessity of obedience to and proper deportment toward a noncommissioned officer in the execution of his office. This is carrying out the policy which has been favored by the military authorities for some time, namely, to instill into the soldier in the ranks a high respect for his noncommissioned officer." (Note.—This was formerly punishable under the general article, old 62.)

Article 65: "We now come to the offenses of mutiny and sedition, punished by article 65, which is practically the existing article. There is nothing new in the article in subjecting these several classes to the provisions of article 65. It is a jurisdiction which has always been exercised."

Article 66: "The only new language in article 66 is the phrase 'and having reason to believe,' the insertion of which would seem to require no explanation."

Article 67: "There is no substantial change from existing article 24."

Article 68. "Article 68 is a restatement of the existing law with additions necessitated by the fact that the existing law was lacking in comprehensiveness and defective in the regards which I will now indicate. (Indicating the accepted construction.)"

Article 69: "New article 69 relates to investigation of and action upon changes and substitutes—articles 70, 71, and 93."

Article 70: "The next article (art. 70) carries no change in the existing law, which is article 67 of the present code, except to give that article what it lacks in the existing code, namely, a penal sanction."

Article 71: "Article 71 is existing article 68 without substantial change."

Article 72: "New article 72 is existing article 69, and no substantial change has been made."

Article 73: "We now come to new article 73, which is rather an important one. It is a substitute for existing article 59. (After stating the changes, he concluded:)

" 'This is a matter of construction under the existing article, and I have deemed it best to make it a matter of express provision and let the military trial proceed uninterrupted by the demand.'

"In examination it was reiterated that the changes were in the nature of expressions of existing construction."

Article 74: "Article 74 is a consolidation of articles 41 and 42. I believe there is nothing in particular to call attention to in that article."

Article 75: "Article 75 has some new language. The existing article says 'any garrison, fortress, or post.' I have added 'camp, guard, or other command,' giving the article broader applications. In other respects the article remains unchanged."

Article 76: "You will notice a change has been made there to distinguish between war and peace."

Article 77: "The only change in that is to substitute for 'whatsoever belonging to the Army of the United States' the words 'any person subject to military law.'"

Article 78: "Article 78 deals with captured property, but without penal sanction, which is here supplied."

Article 79: "This is an attempt to make the Articles of War out of section 5313, Revised Statutes."

Article 80: "The same may be said of article 80. That is section 5306, Revised Statutes, which was in the nature of the Articles of War and is transferred to the new articles."

Article 81: "Article 81 is a combination of existing articles 45 and 46, without substantial change."

Article 82. "Article 82 is section 1343 of the Revised Statutes, incorporated without any change whatever."

Article 83: "Article 83 substitutes article 15 of the existing code."

Article 84: "Article 84 is a combination of articles 16 and 17 of the existing code. I have made no change in it, but I desire to ask the committee to make a change. The words 'to him' in the sixth line ought to be omitted to cover the situation."

Article 85: "In the next article 85 there is an important change. (The change was from mandatory to a discretionary sentence of dismissal.) I have also suggested a change to distinguish between drunkenness in time of war and in time of peace. I do not think there can be any question about the advisability of these changes."

Article 86: "Making a like distinction between peace and war sentences."

Articles 87 and 88: "Articles 87 and 88 on the next page may well be considered together. They came down to us from the ancient codes, and were useful in the days when armies were without the trained and efficient commissariat of the modern army. The articles are not without their use to-day." (The penalty was broadened.)

Article 88: "Article 88, you will observe, is a related provision. It comes to us from the code of Gustavus Adolphus (1621), and had a place in all the early British codes. I have stricken out the words 'foreign parts,' and I have omitted the death penalty."

Article 89: "Article 89 is a partial substitute for existing articles 54 and 55. It preserves the punitive part of these articles. The administrative part is transferred to new article 105, to which I will later call your attention."

Articles 90 and 91: "Articles 90 and 91 are related articles and are substantially articles 25, 26, 27, and 28 of the existing code."

Article 92: "This is a rewriting of old article 58 so as to extend the jurisdiction of military courts over murder and rape outside of the geographical limits of the Union."

Article 93: "Article 93 is a substitute for article 62 of the existing code, but not a complete substitute."

Article 94: "Now we come to article 94, which was taken from the Revised Statutes and made an article of war in the revision of 1874. New article 94 is existing article 60 with absolutely no change except the phrase, 'Any person in the military service of the United States' is made to read in the new article 'Any person subject to military law.'"

Article 95: "That takes us to article 95. There is a very slight change in article 95."

Article 96: "I have taken some liberties with article 96, which is our old article or existing article 62. * * * I have changed the order of statement so as to make it absolutely certain that the phrase appearing in the existing sixty-second article of war, namely, 'to the prejudice of good order and military discipline,' does not qualify the phrase 'all crimes not capital' by only 'disorders and neglects.'"

Articles 97 to 103: "The next chapter relates to courts of inquiry. So very few changes are made in the articles under the subject of 'Courts of Inquiry' that I think we can pass over them rather quickly."

Article 97: "You will notice in the first article (97) under that heading that I have omitted certain language much for the same reason that we have asked to have omitted the preachment in the article about dueling."

Article 98: "The next (98) relates to the composition of courts of inquiry. The old article said that the court should consist of one or more officers, not exceeding three. There has been but one instance in the history of our Army when we convened a court of one officer. There has always been the maximum, and our most important courts of inquiry have been convened under special legislation authorizing five or seven, or whatever number of members was deemed appropriate."

Article 99: "The next article is a new article (99). I have made what was a matter of construction (challenge) a matter of expressed grant."

Article 100: "The oath of members is preserved in the form in which it appears in the existing articles. Of course, I have added that formal conclusion in case of affirmation."

Article 101: "Powers and procedure of courts of inquiry" is the existing law, with the obligation written into it that the reporter and interpreter shall take the oath of a reporter and interpreter for a court-martial, formerly left to regulation.

Article 102: "This article is old article 119 without change."

Article 104: "Article 104 is a new article. I have undertaken and written into a new article the provisions of the existing regulations on this subject which have stood the test of experience."

Article 105: "We dealt with article 54 of the existing code at Saturday's hearing. A part of it, namely, that part that was administrative, was left unprovided for, and I then notified the committee that it had been made the subject of a special article (105)."

Article 106: "Article 106 is an attempt to make an article of war out of the act of June 18, 1898, section 6, giving authority to civil officers to arrest deserters.

There is no change in article 106 except that I have introduced the words 'a possession of the United States' to cover civil officers in the Philippines or Porto Rico who may arrest deserters."

Article 107: "I have attempted to combine the various legislative provisions into a new article."

Article 108: "I have taken those three statutes—they are widely scattered provisions—and combined them into an article of war which states the manner in which a soldier may leave the service. I think I have them accurately stated in the new article."

Articles 109 and 110: "Not discussed, but made no substantial change."

Article 111: "Article 111 is a repetition of article 114."

Article 112: "Article 112 substitutes article 125, article 126, and article 127 of the old code and adds much new matter. It is a matter of probate jurisdiction."

Article 113: "Article 113 is a new article and deals with inquest."

Article 114: "Article 114 extends the authority to administer oaths to the president of a general or special court-martial, the president of a court of inquiry, of a military board, or any officer designated to take a deposition."

Article 115: "New article 115 makes such assistant judge advocate competent to perform in substitution of the regular judge advocates the duties of the latter."

Article 116: "I have taken that legislation and built an article of war upon it."

Article 117: "Article 117 is simply a reenactment of article 99 and two acts of Congress."

Articles 118 and 119: "Article 118 has to do with relative rank and 119 with authority of command when different corps or commands happen to join together, and have no relation to military justice."

Mr. ANSELL. Now, here is rather high evidence with respect to this Crowder revision, coming finally and at the end of the hearings, out of the mouth of the Judge Advocate General himself. He says:

If Congress enacts this revision, the service will not be cognizant of any material changes in procedure, and the courts will function much the same as heretofore. The revision will make certain a great deal that has been read into the existing code by construction.

I say nobody, neither the Judge Advocate General, the Secretary of War, nor the committees of Congress, ever regarded this project as a real revision, a substantial revision, and certainly not such a revision as to change the whole theory upon which the articles proceeded, and they took occasion to assure the committee every moment, as though the committee did not want any revision, that there was not any real revision here.

When we come to talk about the head of the bureau of military justice and revisions that he has proposed, and remedies that he is proposing, it is well enough to examine the attitude of this official as evidenced by his official acts toward the liberalization of this code. He and I are just like this [indicating] on this subject. He says that the code is great and I say it is rotten. Now, one or the other of us is right and one or the other of us is wrong.

Now, let us just see if we can appreciate the state of mind with which this very high and able official approaches this subject. First, he argued before your committee every time there was a liberalization suggested—as, of course, there was bound to be by members of the committee. One, I remember, suggested that there should be peremptory challenges, because the Army community was such that there must be these prejudices, ill defined, of course, such that a challenge for cause would not lie, and that challenges should be peremptory. But Gen. Crowder said with respect to that, "I think it would be very harmful, indeed, for this committee to undertake to modify these Articles of War by injecting into them any of these civil protections."

When a member of the committee suggested that the rights of counsel ought to be declared by statute, Gen. Crowder said, "We have it in our regulations now; it is working out now pretty well the way we have got it; let the commanding officer do as he pleases"; and again he says, "I must warn you to be careful about injecting into this system these civil principles that give you counsel, and protection at every stage of the proceeding, because it will disturb discipline." He said that on pages 18, 20, 29, 30, 44, and 48 of the hearings, and repeated it time and time again. "If there is one thing we must not have in the Military Establishment it is an appellate tribunal." He said:

In a military code there can be no provision for a court of appeal. Military justice and the purpose which it is expected to subserve will not permit of the vexatious delays incident to the establishment of an appellate procedure. However, we safeguard the rights of an accused, and I think we effectively safeguard them, by requiring every case to be appealed in this sense, that the commanding general convening the court, advised by the legal officer of his staff, must approve every conviction and sentence before it can become effective, and in cases where a sentence of death or dismissal has been imposed there must be, in addition, the confirmation of the President.

The latter statement is not accurate. It is only in cases of certain sentences of death and dismissal that the President must confirm. Gen. Crowder wanted no appellate procedure. And, mark you, you speak to any Regular Army officer to-day, colonel, major, or what not, and ask him "What do you think about this court of appeals?" "Oh, it is perfectly splendid in theory, but it will destroy discipline." "Why?" "Time consumed." Time consumed! We have consumed, Mr. Chairman, I say conservatively five times more time with this futile and unauthoritative review that we make, and arguing back and forth with commanding generals, arguing because we have no authority, than we would have consumed if we had had a set of judges up there independent of military authority, speaking with authority as to law. And then, "time consumed." I invite your attention to this formal statement made in 1916 by the Judge Advocate General of the Army to the committee over which Senator Chamberlain then presided as chairman, a long argument of three closely typewritten pages as to the distinctions growing out of the necessity of the military service being such that you could not govern these trials by legal principles; and he quotes Gen. Sherman. And if he had only quoted all of Gen. Sherman I would not have minded, because that stern old soldier, in addressing the graduating class, when he was commander of the Army in 1882, at West Point, subsequent to the time of the quotation extracted from his works and placed in here by Gen. Crowder, said this. Senator Harrison had spoken to the graduating class that day, and he was an able man with long public experience, and he had deplored the uncertainty of justice in courts-martial, and the fact that they were such that the public did not have confidence in them, and he said "We are swamped here at this late day (1882)—the Congress is swamped—by efforts to get men back into the service when the public, at least, are convinced that they ought not to have been put out of the service."

Of course everybody remembers the historic case of Fitz-John Porter in which as great a commander as Gen. Grant made up his mind inflexibly one way; and it was not until Gen. Grant came down almost to the very day of his death that he would actually listen to the other side; and when he did loosen up his mind, and had ceased to be impervious, he all at once said, "I have done this man one of the grossest injustices, and I will devote the rest of my life to the correction of it." And he did; although the court-martial, of course, was a tragic mistake. After Senator Harrison had gotten through with his address to the graduating cadets, Gen. Sherman, none too liberal, rose and said this:

Now, as to the court-martial question alluded to by Senator Harrison in referring to the appeals to him. It must be remembered that a court-martial must consist of thirteen members and its findings be approved by the President.

They are swamped just as you gentlemen will be swamped, 1, 5, 10, or 50 years hence, unless you do something now, as I believe we ought to do something to revise for errors of law in courts-martial that have been had during this war.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The Senate has been revising those by remedial legislation every day during the war.

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; but you know what it means to get a case through Congress; counsel, and toil, and a long struggle. I am not criticizing Congress.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; of course you are right.

Mr. ANSELL. You see what Gen. Sherman said. And do you observe that even Gen. Sherman did not understand the court-martial system, as the Secretary of War to-day does not understand it? He does not know where the President comes in. His statement shows that he does not. Gen. Wood got up here before this Bar Association Committee and also wrote an article in the Metropolitan predicated upon his belief that there was a revision of every court-martial case by the President and that every court-martial case also came to him as Chief of Staff. He had been Chief of Staff for more than four long years, and of course he had not seen but one case in a great number. This shows you the extent of the appreciation that the ultra-military man has for the administration of justice. Now, to cease the interjection and go on. [Reading:]

I am quite willing to see a court of appeals on courts-martial established. It would settle a great many vexed questions and give a legitimate channel for subsequent operations instead of those who make the laws being told the findings are all wrong by some fellow working up his own case on ex parte statements.—Gen. Sherman's remarks to graduating class at West Point, June 12, 1882 (New York Herald).

Now, I must admit that the old general there was speaking probably as much from the viewpoint of expediency as principle. He was, however, in favor of a court of military appeals, that stern old Roman was, here at the close of his life. He had seen so many mis-cues and knew that the Congress was so much importuned.

Now, here is a most complete argument to the Army idea that court-martial proceedings and their conclusion and execution must be summary, or else the discipline of the Army will perish, made by that most distinguished officer whom the present Judge Advocate General so frequently refers to, Gen. Fry, the Provost Marshal General of the Union Army during the Civil War. Gen. Fry, student of military affairs as he ever was, writing long after the Civil War, in the eighties, saw that a great number of officers were being restored, not so much because a man could say that they were guilty or not guilty, but because of the uncertainty and distrust of what had been done during that war, though it was not one-hundredth part as bad as what has been done in this war. I would like to put in this record this article, because it is rather difficult to find. It is an article on a military court of appeals, written by Gen. Fry in the eighties.

Senator LENROOT. Very well; it may be inserted.

Mr. ANSELL. But I want to call your attention to the one fact that this article smothers, as you would suppose it would if it were well written—the argument that we must have this expedition and summariness if we would get the effect of discipline. Quickness is not the only thing we want. I think we want certainty of results first and then quickness. To be sure, nobody wants a system of appeal after appeal, and delay after delay because of technicalities. Nobody wants that, but that is not inherent in the idea that we need to have a review, because we have a review now which while no good is time-consuming and not authoritative.

(The article referred to, found at page 182 of "Military Miscellanies," by James B. Fry, retired Assistant Adjutant General, United States Army, is here printed in part in the record as follows:)

A MILITARY COURT OF APPEALS.

Col. Lieber, judge advocate, is one of the best authorities on military law. He holds that military obedience "can only be enforced by prompt punishment; that the recognition of this has led to a departure from the ordinary forms of trial, and to the building up of a new system for the very purpose of having one sufficiently summary in its nature; that in carrying out this object a common law, military, has grown up of necessity, to a large extent, at variance with the common law, civil," etc.; that "military law is founded upon the idea of a departure from the civil law and should not become a sacrifice to principles of civil jurisprudence at variance with its object"; that "the fundamental principle of a code of military punishments is the enforcement of prompt obedience by prompt punishment," and he adds: "Because we have made progress in the amelioration of punishment, we must not, however, jump to the conclusion that this includes delay in its execution * * *. The admission of new features favoring delay is inconsistent with the object," etc.

These propositions admit of some explanation or qualification. They do not justify the conclusion that the efficacy of military punishment depends on its promptness alone. The claim in favor of promptness is, of course, based on the assumption that the finding is correct. The proceedings of courts-martial should be sound as well as summary. Inasmuch as the military is a more arbitrary and despotic system than the civil, so is uniform and even-handed justice the more necessary in it.

The claim in favor of prompt punishment is a claim for prompt proceedings and true findings. The amelioration of punishment is due to progress in enlightenment. Promptness in military punishment is a feature designed to increase the exemplary effect by adding to the terror of the infliction. But in the Army, as well as out of it, government through terror is gradually yielding to the control of a higher sense of justice. Promptness must now submit to all the delay which legally constituted authority finds necessary to the ascertainment of truth according to the highest lights of the time. It is not so important that the punishment be prompt as that it be inevitable. That, nowadays can not be, until guilt is clearly established. The practical question, therefore, is, What shall be the procedure to attain this end? Col. Lieber says: "Military law, like other sciences, is progressive. It is not a stagnant pool. But it has, by virtue of its nature, been to a large extent progressive within its own sphere independently of others."

The science of military law is progressive, and so is the science of civil law in a greater degree and in a larger field. If progress in the science of civil law has brought to light principles or modes of procedure which are essential to the ascertainment of truth, they could not be "at variance with the objects of the military code," and they ought to be applied to it. Any lack of promptness in punishment which might result would be outweighed by the increased chance of certainty of just punishment.

It is probably in deference to a deeply-seated conviction that all available means of ascertaining truth are not invariably resorted to by courts-martial—that their findings and sentences are so often interfered with by the legislative and executive branches of our Government. The President and Congress are the only sources of appeal in such cases. They often receive evidence which satisfies them that the findings of courts-martial are not just. The fact that the proceedings were summary and the punishment prompt, is usually a point in favor of the complainant, and thus, promptness—on the presumption that it has interfered with justice—tends to defeat the good effect which it is designed to secure. The certainty of punishment is overthrown by doubts which might be forestalled by less promptness. Cases are reopened which were supposed to be closed, and are retried by tribunals without legal power and without judicial modes of procedure. This is probably more injurious to the Service than less promptness and unquestionable judicial proceedings would be.

During the past eighteen months, bills or resolutions have been introduced in the United States Senate or House for the restoration of about 36 officers of the Army who have been dismissed by sentences of courts-martial. There are now on the rolls of the Army eight officers who were dismissed by sentences of courts-martial, and after remaining out of service for some time, were re-instated by special acts of Congress, and eight similarly dismissed, who were reinstated or reappointed by the President. These facts suggest the inquiry: Is not the progress of military law kept rather too closely "within its own sphere" for our Republic, by continuing to regard our ordinary courts-martial as courts of final jurisdiction in cases of sentences to death, or dismissal of officers? Could we introduce to advantage a Supreme Court-martial with final jurisdiction in such cases, by appeal from lower tribunals of military justice?

Congress can "raise and support armies," and "make rules for the government of the land and naval forces."

Courts-martial are what Congress chooses to make them under this provision of the Constitution. At present they are regarded as courts of final jurisdiction, but they are not so in fact. Appeals from them are entertained, as already stated, both by the executive and legislative branches and by both are their findings set aside. Not only this, but after courts-martial have been dissolved, new tribunals (as in the Hammond and Filtz-John Porter cases) have been constituted, for the purpose of rehearing questions long before settled by defunct courts. In the light of these facts the question is repeated, would it be wise and practical for the law-making power to create a Military Court of Appeal and final jurisdiction in the cases which the Articles of War now require shall go before the President for confirmation?

* * * * *

It is true that the power of Congress and the President's pardoning power would exist with a military court of appeal, just as they do without it, but the temptation and the opportunity to exercise these powers would be materially reduced. Moreover, the rights of the accused must be fully weighed. The sentences of dismissal awarded by courts-martial are sometimes wrong. While the President's pardoning power or an act of Congress may prevent some of the consequences of the wrong, neither the President nor Congress can proceed judicially in ascertaining the truth, nor can they rectify the wrong. That could only be done fully on ascertainment of truth through a judicial tribunal, created and empowered for such cases. Do we need one?

The sentence of dismissal (with which we are dealing, as the matter of practical importance) is blasting in its consequences. It involves loss of profession, loss of pay, and loss of reputation. The same "rude tribunal" which has had final jurisdiction of it for centuries, has it still. Yet, as we are told and admit, "Military law is not a stagnant pool. Within its own sphere it is progressive." Will that progress justify the establishment of a military court of appeal as a remedy for the evils which have been indicated? Would the remedy be worse than the disease? Military punishment should be prompt, but it must be just. Taking things as they are in our service would delay in final action in cases of dismissal be increased or reduced, by having a court of appeal, with all the finality of jurisdiction that law could confer upon it? Neither the legislative nor the executive branch of the Government is disposed to violate its trust in the action of which we hear so much complaint concerning dismissals. They merely grope for justice, which such a tribunal as that under consideration might make so clear as to prevent their interference, or at least so probable as to give them good grounds for declining to interfere.

Mr. ANSELL. My point 3 is that this code is an anachronism that came to us out of a system of government and out of an age that we have long since turned our backs on. Why, this system came to us from the time when the armies were the result of a press gang; that is the truth; when the people had no affection for the Army; when naturally they had a hate for it; when the army was the army of the king.

Just look at the old articles of 1774, which are equally the articles of Gustavus Adolphus, which John Adams says were the original Latin articles—Roman articles—of war. I can not find the original Latin articles. Are you going to take any system out of Europe of the seventeenth century? Not much. And especially military systems, press gangs, or hired men surrounding the king to prosecute his little wars in Europe against the desires of the people?

Compare those articles with the present articles, and see: King-legislator; king-judge; king-executive. King says who shall be tried; king says whether he will have counsel or not (and usually none, of course); king or king's officer says who shall constitute the courts; king tells them when to meet, and when to stop, and rules on everything that comes up in front of them. And then when they get through the king says "I will approve or disapprove of what you have done, and if I disapprove, you will do it all over again." That is exactly what these articles of war provide, except for three or four of them. Congress prescribes that the court shall take an oath, for instance; but that very oath itself does not say that you shall try according to the law. No; "You will try largely according to the facts and to the customs of war as you understand them in like cases." Customs of war! The unwritten law military, which takes you back to our friend Gustavus Adolphus, also to the system that was made for an army of that day.

Not being a military people, we have not maintained large armies except in an emergency, and we have not gone to the people to get them, except in an emergency, and then we get rid of them as soon as we can. So that armies do not come from the people in English-speaking nations except in cases of these great modern emergencies, and if you are going to have a system of law that fits these armies coming from the people, you are certainly not going to find it in that system of law that governed this king's establishment hundreds of years ago. And yet, between our article, and the king's, the counterpart is complete. Our commanding officer, just as the king does, convenes the court, passes upon the legality of the charges—the legality such as it is—and the competence of the members to sit; and then every single case that can arise, every question that can arise in criminal procedure, he decides; and then he approves or disapproves what they do, and if he disapproves he makes them do it over again.

That is no court. I believe the pithiest statement of what we may describe as the irreconcilable difference between what Mr. Baker approves and the views I adhere to is to be found in an editorial in the New York Evening Tribune of the early part of this week. Discussing this Kernan report it is obvious that they misapprehend the issue, because of the fact that they do not understand the kind of Army that we are bound to have from now on, if we have any from now on—an Army of citizens. Even if we go back to the old military establishment, still the idea is becoming established that a man is a citizen even though a soldier and his soldiership is but an incident of his citizenship, and the tendency should be to give him the protection of a citizen to the utmost possible extent while he is performing this duty incident to citizenship. He is not a mercenary owing this personal obligation to a king or to a president or to some army officer.

Senator LENROOT. May I ask you, General, has any case come to your knowledge where, a commanding officer having disapproved the verdict of a court-martial, there has been a new trial of the case?

Mr. ANSELL. Disapproved? There is a kind of a new trial, according to Gen. Crowder's statistics, which I accept as true, and I believe they are true; not a new trial, but a reconsideration.

Senator LENROOT. I did not mean that. I meant where there was an actual new trial with new evidence taken.

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; we have had a few of those cases, where the War Department has held that the court was absolutely without jurisdiction. But we have had some during this war, probably at my instance, whether I was right or wrong, and I was willing to stand the test of a civil court. There was the case from Rockford, Ill., that I referred to the other day. You see there, Senator, a most flagrant case. Somebody had ravished this girl, and the court said these 17 men did it, with no trial worthy the name. Now, no man on his conscience and his oath of office, no man who appreciated his profession, could ever pass such a record as that; though, strange to say, officers of the Regular Army tried to prevail on me to select 5 men out of those 17, and recommend that they hang. They said that they thought really those 5 were guilty, anyway. Never mind the other 12, but hang those 5 in order that the law might be vindicated. They said that was rough-and-ready justice. But could you not see, Senator, that no responsible man could let that record stand and hang those 17 men when he knew that they had not had a fair trial; and yet no man appreciative of the responsibility could turn them loose, because some of them, or somebody, at the time and place alleged, had committed this most grievous offense. As I say, I worked that case as far as I fairly could under the theory that by rushing them to trial and otherwise depriving them of the assistance of counsel the court lost jurisdiction. It was not a trial at all. If, of course, it was not a trial at all, the judgment was not a judgment at all; and should it be so held you could have another trial without its being a new trial. It would have been a trial in the first instance.

But, I also said that I believed if we had the power to review at all, we had the power to reverse the judgment and allow a new trial.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did they have a new trial?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. How many were convicted?

Mr. ANSELL. Some were convicted and some were acquitted. That is the point. I have no doubt that the new trial was a fair trial. I selected ex-Gov. McGovern, and two other distinguished lawyers to help him, and we saw those negro soldiers got the best of counsel, and they had the most thorough trial. Some of them have been convicted and some of them acquitted.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But all of them would have been convicted?

Mr. ANSELL. All of them were convicted and they would have been hanged by this time.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You did not answer succinctly the question of the chairman. There have been cases where the commanding general did not approve the sentence of the court-martial, and there was a retrial or a rehearing or something, and as a result of it a party who had been acquitted in the first trial was convicted on the second?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; but of course in those cases he never put the word "approved" on the judgment.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What did he do?

Mr. ANSELL. He said, "I do not approve of what you did, and I send it back for your reconsideration, and these are my instructions."

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Practically he determined the case?

Mr. ANSELL. Why, that is the whole situation. The commanding general's control over the court is such that even upon an acquittal the commanding general or the convening authority can order the court to reconsider, subject to his instructions; and that came up in the bill that Gen. Crowder and the Secretary of War submitted to your committee for this revisory power. They were going to give this revisory power to the President and also give him this same power to reverse an acquittal and direct that the case be tried over again.

Senator LENROOT. The reason I asked that question is that it has been stated there had never been a new trial for prejudicial error where that error did not go to the jurisdiction.

Mr. ANSELL. I tried to explain that we worked—or at least I worked—in a case of this sort to correct what ordinarily would be called, perhaps, in a civil court, simply reversible error, into jurisdictional error.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The point is that you did, in endeavoring to get a new trial, endeavor to show a want of jurisdiction?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; I endeavored to get under the cover of jurisdictional error as a safeguard if the writ of habeas corpus should be sued out. But I want to say that the most distinguished lawyers in my department agree that there is a statute, if the War Department would properly construe it, to reverse the judgment and order a new trial.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is under the power of revision?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes. That was the view of Col. Rumbaugh, professor of constitutional law at Harvard; Prof. Morgan, professor of law at Yale; and a dozen of the best lawyers, all men of long, practical legal experience. The War Department took the other view. But I think it ought to be stated that from the time of Judge Holt's régime up until the time of this war there had been no retrials or new trials except in the case where clearly there was a lack of jurisdiction in the composition of the court or in the capacity of a court to pass upon this kind of case. So, here is what happened, I might say, Mr. Chairman: Even after we started up this review during this war, and we advised the commanding general to disapprove of the judgment which he had approved subject to this review, see what the effect was. It always turned the man loose. The general could disapprove of the judgment of a court-martial, but he could not order a new trial. Therefore, the reversal turned him loose.

I say that this code is in sharp conflict with the principles of government which, in my judgment, our Constitution evidently contemplated should apply to our Army. The Constitution of the United States provides that Congress shall make rules and regulations for the discipline of the Army. It is not conceivable to me that the framers of that historic document intended that the Congress should adopt this monarchical theory in toto, substituting the Presidents and commanding generals for kings and kings' subordinates.

The theory has been all along that this system was so absolute and detached from the Constitution that it was not subject to any legal principles, those found in the Bill of Rights or elsewhere; that every right that a man had on a trial before a court-martial came by reason of the statutory grant, and that in the absence of statutory grant, of course the power of military command could do as it pleased.

It was on this theory—this early theory—that in 1806 the Congress of the United States, accepting it, wrote into the code the inhibition against double trial; and so the Government, really accepting the War Department's views, proceeded until 1906.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. 1906?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; and I refer this committee, because it is composed of lawyers, to the Grafton case, which I have adverted to. It is a landmark in the military law. The Grafton case holds that the protection against double jeopardy a man gets when tried by court-martial comes not from statute but from the Bill of Rights of our Constitution. I believe that if the officers of the War Department had studied that case, had determined what it actually decided, and had acted accordingly, we would have had a different situation during this war. A fair trial. A man can not have been tried fairly if he has been tried a second time, and he can not have been tried fairly if he did not have witnesses, or if he did not have counsel for his defense. He can not have been tried fairly unless there is somebody he can address his legal objections to. Yet the War Department says that if Congress is silent on these matters or does not clearly inhibit, it simply authorizes the power of military command to do precisely as it pleases.

Let us take the punitive articles of the present Articles of War. There are 41 of them. Now, one would naturally think that inasmuch as this is a penal code, and inasmuch as Congress has been endowed by the Constitution to make the rules of discipline of the Army, where Congress says a man shall be tried, Congress should say what he shall be tried for, and Congress should prescribe within reasonable limits the penalties. I ask the committee to look at these 41 punitive articles, the very gist of the code. Twenty-seven of them terminate this way, "Whosoever violates this article of war shall be punished as a court-martial may direct." Eleven of them say, "Whosoever shall violate this article shall be punished by death, or as a court-martial may direct." Two of them make death mandatory. Not one of them describes or defines the offenses.

Is it any wonder that we have had an actual case of felonious homicide punished with only three days' confinement and another felonious homicide punished with death? And we have had trivial cases of absence without leave punished with sentences of 99 years' confinement.

The court has been authorized by the Congress of the United States to do just as it pleases. We talk about the great variations of punishment. How, in heaven's name, can we expect anything like a fair and reasonable uniformity of punishment when the code itself tells courts-martial "Punish these offenses as you please, any way you think is right"?

Now I, for one, am not going to deceive myself with all this talk about "Well, the court did the best it could." I assume it. I do not hold much of a brief for them, but they probably did just what any other set of men would have done if they were told to do arbitrarily as they pleased and there was no check on them.

But I say there ought to be a check. Now, Col. Wigmore in his most remarkable document here—he is a sort of a new-thought man in the legal world, notwithstanding his work on evidence—says, and a North Carolina friend of mine wrote me yesterday saying, "Ansell, this court-martial system is far superior to anything we have got in the civil administration of justice." Of course, there are men in this country who believed that the German system was superior to our form of government, that the British system of government is superior to ours and the French system. They just disagree about premises. There is in such a case no use continuing the argument.

Col. Wigmore has done a lot in that direction. He is a teacher, a new-thought man in regard to the Constitution and everything else. To such men the Constitution does not mean very much. To them it seems to have been the result of a long course of foolish thought by our people. It does not mean very much to these new-type scientific lawyers. They look at the logic of the situation and resolve everything in the forum of pure reason, not of human experience. If you told them that you were going to start a new government in the South Sea Islands somewhere, they would write a most wonderful constitution for you, but I doubt very much if anybody would ever see it work. The rules of evidence are not much to them; the Constitution is not much to them; and naturally "this military system we have got is far superior," because, I suppose, it is so different. That is what they say in this defense here; what this letter from that friend of mine said yesterday. It would be a great thing, then, to change all this civil system and supersede our safeguards by some Army officers going around applying this very effective military system. To my mind, the absurdity of the whole proposition is shown when men have such a mental attitude that they can put up an argument like that, when they say that the Constitution of the United States and its principles do but little more than save a few criminals from just punishment. They are men who are always criticizing our courts. Our courts ought to be criticized; they are not above it. But, nevertheless, they should be criticized for the administration rather than for the principles of the system.

I want to make this point rather especially: Our Articles of War are based on the king theory. Congress has taken the reins that the king held and then turned them over to those military gentlemen who have succeeded to the king's authority here, and said, "Now, you drive as you please." Any officer of the Army can put any charge against an enlisted man. Their defense says that that is a wonderful thing; that it is nothing but an adaptation of the new American method of prosecution by information to the Army; that we were ahead of the civil system on that, and that the civil copied that from the military system. That would be like saying that all Senators could prosecute all people at will, or that all Congressmen could prosecute all people at will, or that all preachers could prosecute all people at will; that all of the upper ten could prosecute at will; that every farmer could prosecute his hired men at will. Why, of course, the information theory is that an officer of the law must have been specially designated by sovereignty and must have taken a special obligation as a quasi judicial officer to do what is right in this case, and there is only one man representing the sovereignty in the particular jurisdiction who can do that, and he is substituted for a grand jury. Now, I ask the committee, how far does an argument of that kind get with you? How far ought it to get? What ought to happen to the whole case when its defenders argue like that?

They believe that every officer ought to put in charges, not under any special sense of obligation; that he ought not even to swear or certify, "I have investigated this case and believe it ought to be tried, and therefore I submit it to trial," but should act simply by virtue of his office. Of course, an enlisted man can not prefer charges against an officer, though. Oh, no! It must be adopted by this sacred thing, official caste. And then, when I tell you that between 96 and 98 of every 100 charges preferred result in trial and conviction, I say my point is made, that officers of the Army can try anybody they please, at will, and Congress is responsible. Congress says "You try anybody you please." And then, even if the charge is murder or rape or arson or mayhem or manslaughter, is there any way whereby that man can have the legal sufficiency of that charge tested? No; Congress says that the power of military command must do that. Congress does not say that military command shall be advised by a judge advocate, even, and it is not so advised. You have not got legal personnel enough. You never had but 13 in the old Army, and they were made mostly for duty right here in Washington. You did detail a line officer who had some special proclivities, and put him at the right hand of the commanding officer as a staff officer, and he advised him. In any event, the commanding officer takes the advice if he wants to; just as he takes, or rejects, the advice of the man who issues the rations, the man who plans the operations. The judge advocate is just like any other staff officer. So that Congress has said to every man who under these articles of war is empowered to convene a court-martial, "By virtue of your rank you are also a judge, absolute and final, with authority to do as you please."

When we try a man in a civil court for murder, for instance, you know how meticulously we guard him—probably too much so; and surely there is a way of having a judicial determination, at the very beginning of the trial, of whether the charge actually alleges an offense known to the law of the land sufficiently to justify trial. But here let the commanding officer say, "That charge is good," which he says when he refers it to a court for trial, and there is no power on earth to say otherwise.

Now, a man tried for murder or anything else over in the military forum gets the same punishment rather more and more expeditiously than he gets when he is tried by the civil court for the same offense. The effect upon the individual is just the same. It means a long term of imprisonment or deprivation of life or property; and yet we leave everything, not to the law, but to the power of military command. Now, I ask the committee, are they satisfied with letting a major general sit up and determine whether or not this offense is actually an offense against the articles of war and the law of the land, and make that final? And then, after he has determined that it is final, let us look at the challenge. You have got to challenge one at a time and for cause stated. That is a challenge for cause only. No peremptory challenges and no challenges to the array.

Mr. Chairman, if there ever was a community anywhere where there ought to be peremptory challenges and challenges to the array both, it is in the Army of the United States. The commanding general who designates that panel is frequently a prejudiced person. In that case he does not know it. Of course not. We usually do not know when we are prejudiced. But he is prejudiced all the same, and if there were a proper judicial authority to determine that fact, it would frequently be so determined.

But let us take a case like this. I can recall four cases that I have had during this war in which there were men who had committed offences under circumstances of such similiarity that you could not try one, without, indeed, passing upon the case of the others. Two men, we will say, are tried jointly, it may be properly, so far as the offense is concerned. Suppose they should be given a severance. Would you think, in a civil forum, of trying the second man by the same jury that tried the first? Of course not. And yet the same military court, when a whole crowd of soldiers are involved in the same transaction, will try them all separately, the same court will sit there and try one after another, one after another, until really, in one case that I know of, it was a perfect farce, and the men knew it was a farce also; and yet under the law of Congress you are limited in your challenges to a single challenge, and for cause stated, and the triers of the challenge are the other members of the court?

Now, let us see how it works out in a case of this sort where they are actually sitting as a second jury in the trial of a case of similar circumstances. You challenge one man under the law, and he steps aside, and you have got the other twelve, and they sit there and pass upon that challenge, when the challenge lies as much to them as it does to the first challenged. Now, that may seem puerile, and yet the army argues that it is all right. "We are officers of the army, and we can divest ourselves of any predilections we had in the other trial. We are intelligent and superior, and you must not make the charge of prejudice against us." Surely you are not going to let a thing like that keep up.

Now you come to the actual trial. No rules of evidence; none prescribed. The law of Congress actually, under this so-called Crowder revision, has authorized the President to make any rules of evidence he pleases. Gentlemen, if there is one thing in the world that ought to be stopped, it is the further abdication by Congress, to the power of military command, whereby a man may be tried before a court-martial not according to the rules of evidence and law, but according to some rule prescribed by the President of the United States, which, of course, means the Judge Advocate General of the Army and the Chief of Staff.

Why, I recall a case where I resisted the entire military hierarchy, the evidence being this: They actually extorted a confession out of a man and a man's wife. I say "extorted." I am not using too strong a word. Everybody agreed that the confession was thereby incompetent; had been dragged out of them by third-degree methods. Yet by means of that confession, and other means, they got other evidence. And they said that that record was good, because if you struck down the confession, struck it out entirely, there was enough left to justify the man's conviction. Now, they went that far. They said that a confession extorted by those methods resorted to by the Government, which it would not have resorted to unless it had to, an extorted confession which was used for the purpose of conviction, the most credible of all evidence when properly obtained, can be relied upon without doing any prejudicial error to the accused because there is other evidence in the case. When I said that I would have conclusively presumed error from that confession, at least, they said, "Well, it is true that the Supreme Court of the United States has held that, but we are not bound by that." And they are not. They do not follow it. They are not bound by any principles of law. Our rules of evidence may not be the most logical in the world, but they are what we have got; we have got nothing better; they are really a basic part of our jurisprudence and of our civilization, and I, for one, am not ready to give them up in the trial of an important case before a court-martial in favor of rules, or no rules, prescribed by military command.

So military command can do as it pleases when it comes to court-martialing a man. It selects the man, selects his counsel, determines the court procedure, defines the offense, applies any rule of evidence that it pleases, and then when it comes to sentence it can impose any sentence it pleases, from 1 day to 100 years, or from a penny to death. The commanding general can then do as he pleases, governed by no principle of law.

Now, I can tell you one great reason why these punishments were so harsh. Everybody knows that these courts are afraid of the commanding officer. Why, men have actually been sentenced to sit on courts-martial by commanding officers for purposes of "instruction," and it is the most arduous duty known in the Army, and Army officers hate it like sin. They do not want to do it. They know they are under the general's hand. He will likely change their station and punish them if he does not like the way they do on a court. So they say this—this is common, and they will all tell you so when they are speaking frankly and personally—they say, "The Articles of War say we can do as we please. The commanding general up there is pretty stiff. He cussed us out, that last case, you know. We said the man ought to have a small sentence, and he came back and cussed us out and said he was going to dissolve us and put a lot of his remarks on our record, and all that kind of thing. Now, I suggest, since we can do as we please, that we put it up to the old man. We will give a sentence high enough, so that the general can cut it down to suit him." They say, "Let us give this fellow a sentence of 25 years, and let the commanding general cut it down to 5 years, if he wants to." So Congress tells the court-martial to do as it pleases, and they pass it up to the commanding general and tell him to do as he pleases. They make that arrangement because they say the commanding general has authority to cut down or control it.

If that seems like a puerile sort of conduct of official business by a lot of grown men, let it seem so. It is true.

It is true, then, Mr. Chairman, that from the beginning to the end courts-martial are governed by the power of military command, not by the law of Congress. You have not required your military commander mandatorily to do certain things or not to do them. Quite the opposite. You have not told your court mandatorily to do certain things or not to do them. Quite the opposite. You have just simply adopted the old kingly system of Great Britain, foisted it upon our Army, and told them all to do as they please.

Now, quite truly, Mr. Chairman, Gen. Crowder in his proposition to revise the articles in 1912 and 1916 said, "These articles come from the British system, and the British have revised their system out of recognition." It is true, to our shame, that though the British Government is not the most liberal Government in the world to its soldiers, it is far more liberal than we. Does it not occur to you as significant that it is provided that the British judge advocate general shall be a civilian barrister; and that it is provided the French judge advocate general shall also be a civilian barrister? Does it not mean something?

The English judge advocate general, until they created the office of secretary of state—that is, when the war department was governed by the war council, up until the latter seventies or the eighties—was a member of the Government, a member of the Cabinet, with a seat in Parliament. When the Parliament came to control there, as it did, against the Crown, that was the first thing they said, "The man in charge of the bureau of military justice will be responsible to us, and he will sit in this body as a member of the Government; and he will be a civilian and he will be a lawyer, a judge; and he will be appointed for life; and he will be taken out from the command of the war council and even of the King.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Has it resulted in a modification of the extreme military sentences?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; though I must say that England is not as modern as I think England ought to be and will be; because England has an investigation on, right now.

I have here an interesting article, which I shall not read into the record but which is interesting nevertheless, from Blackwood's Magazine of June, by a distinguished Scotch barrister who was a judge advocate with the forces in the field, and he shows that they made a great outcry there against their system, as they made it here during the war; and I know they did, for I was there. They made it more vociferously than we did here because we were more suppressed. I want to show you what this distinguished barrister said. It is a very ridiculous article, but less ridiculous than an article could be written about our system. For instance, he was sitting as an officer on a court-martial. The junior member of the court votes first. A law officer sits here instructing the court as a judge would the jury. He asks the junior member of the court, "How will you vote on this?" "I think I will give him a very heavy punishment." This went up to the various members of the court, and all of them said, "Yes; a heavy punishment." Then the law officer said, "Now, gentlemen, with all due respect to you, I do not regard this as a very severe offense. You have given him 15 years." "Well, what do you think he should have?" The law officer said, "Three days, it seems to me, would be sufficient." The President said, "You have heard what the law officer says. Since considering it further, what do you think?" The junior officer said, "Well, since I have heard the remarks of the judge advocate of the court, three days, I think, is quite sufficient." So, then, it went up through the court; three days went all through, and that was the sentence. Fifteen years—three days. That is very ludicrous. But let me call your attention to the last part of it. He says:

This system of confirmation is very undesirable. No commanding general should be allowed to confirm.

He says it is actually vicious because it makes this court subject to the command of the commanding general [reading]:

For the reasons which I have already given, it tends to destroy the independence of the tribunal, as well as leaving the final decision in the matter in the hands of officers who have no special, if any, legal experience; who have not seen or heard the witnesses, and who are seriously handicapped by their military training and who are not capable to mete out impartial and disinterested justice. Is it fair or consistent that a court of criminal appeal should have been set up in respect of convictions in criminal courts and not in the case of convictions by courts-martial?

I suggest that every person convicted by court-martial (subject to the exigencies of moving warfare), should be entitled to apply for leave to appeal to a court of appeal presided over by a permanent legal judge appointed for the purpose, and conversant with military affairs, and that the present system of confirmation by military officers should be abolished.

It is worthy of note that the committee which has been set up by the War Office to inquire into military law and the procedure of courts-martial, does not possess a single member who has had any real experience during the war as a member of field general court-martial. Let us hope, however, that the committee will make an effort to find out what the real position is, and will not shrink from such drastic reforms as may be necessary to enable the members of courts-martial in the future, without fear and with independence of judgment, to administer the sacred duty entrusted to them.

I do not know how the committee will regard it, of course; but I know the English, it must be said, do things quite thoroughly at times in matters of this kind, and they do not stack committees; but let us look at the English system as compared with our own. Here is a great outcry against their system, and England's military code, I will assure you, is far more liberal and progressive than ours; but no general court-martial can sit in the British Empire without a law officer sitting by the side of the court, endowed with the functions of a judge, who instructs that court upon every point of law, sums up for them, and does everything exactly as a judge does here, sitting in a criminal trial with a jury.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And then he is not a military man?

Mr. ANSELL. Not as a rule. In all general courts-martial he is usually a barrister warranted out of the great body of English barristers for the purpose, and I will give you some reasons for that later on. It is true that Great Britain, with her capacity to do things, customarily and without accurate definition, has never said that that judge's instructions were absolutely controlling of the court; but if that judge advises the court one way, and the court should do the other, when that report gets to the Judge Advocate General of England, who is a civilian, and who himself has warranted that man to sit there representing not the commanding general, but himself, as the Judge Advocate General of England expressed it to me, "Of course they know what is going to happen. The whole thing is going to be disapproved." And in fact, the law officer with the court is the judge, with all the authority that a judge has with our courts and juries.

Now, a field general court-martial is the general court-martial which accompanies the army when it is actually fighting in the field for the trial of enlisted men—not officers. The law does not provide for this law officer with that court; but the Regulations have done so, and every field general court-martial for the trial of enlisted men for any offense, however slight—they do not try them for the slight offences we do, however—has this law officer, and he is commissioned because his position is rather unstable, as you will see by reading this article, and as I saw it. They give him rank, though he is really a civilian and he is the law member of the court, and he has, of course, the power of the Judge Advocate General's office back of him; although there is no law, as I remember it, back of him. But we surely are not blind to the superiority of the British system, such as it is, over ours, when we see that at the top of the judicial hierarchy is a civilian, a barrister, answerable now to the Secretary of State for War, and never to any military commander. Never any report of the Judge Advocate of England goes to the Commander in Chief of the Army or to any military commander. I was there a considerable time, and saw that the army has accepted him as the final judge of law as applied in the Army. He does not have to write these long-winded arguments that we write. Rather briefly does he make his minutes on the case, and dispose of it. It does not go to the Chief of Staff or to any military man, and the authority that is actually exercised over him by the Secretary of State for War is a formal one, because they have not yet gotten out of, and never will get out of, the theory, as I am advised, that Parliament has just put this chief administrator there as Secretary of State for War, and he has replaced the Judge Advocate General of England, who is sitting with Parliament, but nevertheless he has all responsibility still to Parliament. We know that Parliament does not hesitate to make a racket about any case of military injustice in England that is brought to its attention, and to call upon the Judge Advocate General for what he did in that case.

ESTABLISHMENT OF MILITARY JUSTICE—PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF THE ARTICLES OF WAR.

---

SATURDAY, AUGUST 30, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to adjournment, in the room of the Committee on Appropriations in the Capitol, at 10 o'clock a. m., Senator Irvine L. Lenroot presiding.

Present: Senators Lenroot (acting chairman) and Chamberlain.

STATEMENT OF MR. SAMUEL T. ANSELL—Resumed.

Senator LENROOT. I do not remember just what point you had reached at the last session, General, do you?

Mr. ANSELL. If the committee please, yesterday I had said that Great Britain had recognized the necessity of at least a partial civil control, in the last analysis, over courts-martial. I had shown that their law requires a law officer with the powers of a judge to sit with each general court-martial, though, as I said—and ought to have said, in fairness—those powers, like so many things British, were not well defined and fixed. Probably, de jure they are advisory; de facto, they are controlling.

That with each field general court-martial, which is their agency for enforcing discipline when they are in actual campaign, so far as enlisted men are concerned, as a rule, the law does not require this judge to sit with the court-martial; but by regulations it is required, and it has worked out to the absolute satisfaction of all, the only complaint being it should go farther and be fixed by statute.

I had shown that the head of the Judge Advocate General's Department, who is the chief of the bureau of military justice there, is a civilian, had at one time been a member of the Government, still has a close relationship both to Crown and Parliament, and, most significant of all, he is not subject to any military supervision whatever.

I had also adverted to the fact, previously, that there was far greater opportunity there for the civil courts of the Kingdom to review the judgments of courts-martial than here, the sole remedy here being by way of the writ of habeas corpus; except, of course, in a suit for trespass, which, as you know, seldom or never is resorted to, for the very obvious reason, I suppose, that you had to prove that a member of the court has maliciously and flagrantly violated his duty in order to do injury to the accused. Certainly that would have to be proved before damage could be recovered. Such actions are not brought here.

In France it is significant likewise that, military as that people is, the judge advocate general of the army there is a civilian, and a most distinguished one. In my travels there I met no lawyer who impressed me more than he.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What is his title?

Mr. ANSELL. Undersecretary of State for Military Justice, with a seat in Parliament.

In the French Army in time of peace there is a very large appellate system. Many of their cases can go to the supreme court of France, the Court of Cassation, of Paris; and in time of peace there is a court of military appeals, as well; and in time of war the law provides for a court of appeals with each army, but, as I understood their practice, perhaps a court of appeals was not maintained at the headquarters of each army, but rather, administratively, at some central point, as at Paris, where it could take care of more than one jurisdiction.

Senator LENROOT. But is maintained?

Mr. ANSELL. But is maintained. That is the point. My recollection of it is that in time of war they may have, and do have usually, on their court of military appeals men who are commissioned in the army; that is, army men. Of course there the distinction between the professional soldier and the citizen soldier is not so marked as it is here. If there is one thing more impressive about the French Army than another, it is the unity observable in their military establishment, a unity which we do not have here, but which I hope that we may some day have.

Senator LENROOT. You mean it is more democratic throughout?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes. Senator, I went to France, of course, with the utmost sympathy and admiration for the French people, but not so much with the idea that the French were really a democratic people. Whatever may be said for any other institution, that institution which is usually in all nations least democratic was in the case of the French most democratic; that is, their army. I said in my report, and I repeat, that whenever we shall change, let us not change toward the British or what might be called the northern nations' view of maintaining discipline, because I think probably this system whereby discipline is maintained by the great gulf between enlisted man and officer by erecting the officer as a sacrosanct thing far above him belongs rather to the northern races—to ourselves, to the British, and to others. Let us, if we can, incline to the French system, where, without loss of dignity and without any infringement of proper prerogatives, the relationship between officer and enlisted man is a remarkable one, a most helpful one, and causes, I think, a Frenchman to love his army as every citizen ought to love an army that gives him protection.

I am not going to compare the French Army with the British or our own. We have qualities, Mr. Chairman, that are, of course, remarkable, and they are remarkable in the Army also. But the relationship—the disciplinary relationship—between the officers and men really might be improved upon.

The French take the discipline of their men much to heart. Justice to the enlisted man is very much on their conscience, and the first thing that a colonel of a regiment does when he comes to his orderly room in the morning is to look over the delinquency book and to go into it with the greatest of care. A man may not be court-martialed there until a quasi-judicial officer does look over the charges, and does look over the evidence to see whether there is a prima facie case; and such officer is not under the control of military authority either. And after a man is tried, as I have indicated, he gets this review. It should be conceded that French courts-martial, like French civil courts, do not adhere to the technical rules of evidence, for instance, and other rules of procedure, as we do.

In Italy there is established the system of appeals, it seems to me, on a much more elaborate scale than in any other country. It seemed to me too elaborate, indeed.

I discovered in Paris a book which I regarded as very valuable. It was a report made by a Norwegian judge advocate, sent by his Government to investigate the systems of military justice obtaining in all the European countries; and later he extended that to our own country and some of the South American countries. It is the only comprehensive study, so far as I know, that has ever been made of such a thing. It is old, however. But after I got back home I found there was one copy of that book in this country, and I got it from Harvard University. I have let another officer have it temporarily, and have not been able to get it back, but I wanted to assure the committee that I have read the report of that officer, and that report reveals clearly that this system of military appeals is established throughout Europe, and that the system of having a specially qualified law officer sitting with each general court-martial is established throughout Europe. That officer comments on the fact that Spain, Prussia, Russia, England, and the United States are the ones who do not have it. There, I believe, is some sort of review in Prussia—was at that time—that I am not familiar with at all. But even in Spain there is a more thorough review by the judge advocate general than there is here; and most especially does he comment on the fact that the British system and the American system make no provision for an authoritative review whatever. So that this talk about a reviewing body being a new thing, detrimental to discipline, is disproved by the fact that it is an established institution in Europe, where armies, of course, are far more significant things in government and closer to the people than they are here.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. May I ask you if, in your visit to France, you compared the maximum penalties imposed in the French army with the maximum penalties imposed in the American Army?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes, Senator; and the French punishments are comparatively very light, indeed.

Senator LENROOT. Could you secure for us for this record a copy or a translation of the French law?

Mr. ANSELL. A translation? I could do it myself, if I could get a little time.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I think we could ask the legislative board for that.

Mr. ANSELL. I will try and get it for you if I can.

Senator LENROOT. All right; and will you also secure for us a copy of the British law?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes. Our War Department has not yet advanced as far as the British had advanced at the beginning of this war. During the war the British have grown quite liberal. I wish to call attention to the fact that Great Britain is in process of advancing some more now. But then, above all, why should we limit ourselves, with our citizenship of the very highest grade and our liberal institutions, to the systems of Great Britain and of Europe?

The bill that is before you I do not think need be gone through in detail, and, in any event, I have spent so much time in discussion that I can not go into it in detail, but I think we can sum it up in this way: If the committee should be, for instance, in favor of having a government by legal principle rather than trusting so much to this power of military command, they could only disagree with the bill in mere matters of detail.

If, on the other hand, they agree with the War Department and the Kernan report, for instance, that courts-martial are the agencies of military command, then really you could not agree with anything—you could not agree with the fundamental principles—of that bill, and I hope that I have made that clear.

One theory is that courts-martial are governed by military command throughout.

The other theory is that they are governed by fixed principles of law and the statutes enacted by Congress, throughout.

Now, if you believe in the first principle, why, I do not know that anybody could find any great fault with our system. I could not. If military command is to be permitted to exercise all this control, I know our men are good men, and they want to do what is right, and though they do their best, we may expect the results that we have. I disagree with the results, and I attribute them to the system that we have.

Senator LENROOT. Are there not two fundamental propositions involved? Is there not one other than you have mentioned? First, there is the unlimited control of military command, within the law; secondly, the broad discretion vested in the law, in military command?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; I think that is true. I intended to include them both. I do not say that that is so in the sense that they have not authority for what they do under the Articles of War. It seems to me that they can do almost anything.

Senator LENROOT. Is not that a proposition quite separate from their having unlimited control of military command, within the law; in other words, unlimited discretion as to punishment?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; they have unlimited discretion as to punishment.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. They practically make the law as to punishment.

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; of course that is true. Congress has delegated the power.

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. ANSELL. And it seems to me never before has a legislative body delegated any such power. It is true that in this bill there are of course means—methods—advanced that are open to disagreement. We can always disagree as to means and methods, but the contending principles I think we have got a fairly good idea of now. For instance, in this bill that I have drafted, one of the things, I believe—I speak with great frankness—that shocks the Regular Army officer, and maybe officers of the new Army, more than any other one thing, is the fact that the bill provides for the detail of a number of enlisted men on general courts-martial—three out of eight, for instance. Well now, the very moment you mention that to a Regular Army officer he at once replies, “You have taken out of the hands of the officer the power of the enforcement of discipline and handed it over to the enlisted man.” Of course he is going right back, there, to his fundamental theory that officers are the governing element and must have their way. But under this bill it must be remembered, and I call the attention of the committee to that particularly, the court is really a jury finding the facts, and the officer of the law sitting with that court is the judge. I, myself, do not believe that there is a thing to the argument that you can not intrust one of the enlisted men of our Army with a proper determination of facts; and I will go further than that and say that even if they were to determine the law, were to be judges of both law and fact, from my judgment of the enlisted men of the Army as they now are, and from my knowledge of our citizenship, I will not say that the discipline of the Army is going to be destroyed by permitting enlisted men to sit on those courts and do justice under their oaths. I do not believe that, no matter what anybody else says.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It is just like a jury drawn from the body of the community.

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; and it is a very high-grade one. We may call the jury a cross-section of citizenship. We get some inferior men; but surely it has got to be said that there never has been an army in any country in the world that compared with the Army that we have to-day, for intelligence and probity and everything that goes to make up character in a man that will impel him to perform his duty.

Senator LENROOT. Right there, because that is a very material point in this whole matter: You have described at great length the feeling generally existing, and the condition of caste between the officers and the men. Now, is it your opinion that when charges are made by an officer against an enlisted man, generally speaking, it would require no stronger evidence to convict with enlisted men sitting as members of the court than with a jury in civil life trying a man for a like offense?

Mr. ANSELL. That it would require no stronger evidence to convict an enlisted man?

Senator LENROOT. Yes. That is, would an enlisted man be as free to convict a fellow enlisted man upon charges made by an officer, as a jury in civil life would be to convict a defendant charged with a like offense?

Mr. ANSELL. Mr. Chairman, I believe that our enlisted men, situated as they are, would, as nearly as they could, do absolute justice, and I do not believe that they would permit the fact that an officer had preferred charges against an enlisted man to create a sort of rebellious attitude, a feeling against convicting that man.

Senator LENROOT. That is the point. Of course, I was assuming that they would try to do absolute justice; but the point would be whether there would be any prejudice.

Mr. ANSELL. Of course, you would find a man here and there; but I think that we can always say this, with the knowledge of any system or hierarchy, that the lower the man is in the hierarchy the greater respect and deference he actually has for the men above him. We can not get rid of that. The abuse of the caste system, I think, is apt to be from the higher man downward rather than from the lower man upward; and if you take a lower man and put him on a higher plane, I think he will do his duty regardless of his condition in other respects. That is, for the time being an enlisted man, pro hac vice, becomes an administrator of the law, does he not?

Senator LENROOT. Taking it during this war, would you say that the enlisted man did have that high respect for his officers, generally?

Mr. ANSELL. For his officers as persons, why, yes; but there were so many officers that did not do well, that did not treat them well, that did not have the fullest respect of their men, I think not. The system creates distrust.

On the other hand, if a set of charges came before a court in which there was a small sprinkling of enlisted men—they are to be chosen, of course, by the man who convenes the court, who is an officer—I should think that if those enlisted men were affected at all, as they might be, it would, nevertheless, be in the direction of that great equity which is necessary to doing all justice.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It would not decrease the morale, because the enlisted man would then feel that he had a man on the court who could see his viewpoint.

Mr. ANSELL. I feel strongly that it has great advantages, and that it would not be abused except as all administration is once in a while abused. But here is a man who feels that he is a part of the Army, he is trusted as a part of the Army; he has got a part of its authority upon him. Under such circumstances enlisted men would feel that their station had been very much elevated, and that they were eligible to be chosen for this high duty at any time; and the accused would feel, as you said, that he had a fair man on that court in the sense that such member of the court knew his difficulties.

Senator LENROOT. Before you get away from that I would like to ask you, at the other extreme, whether in your opinion, because a court is made up wholly of officers and the charges have been preferred by an officer, there is any tendency of the court to sustain a fellow officer?

Mr. ANSELL. I answer yes, sir; there is such a tendency. I have heard this. I have sat on just as many courts-martial as any man in the Army, and if any man has ever had a full experience in the administration of military justice it must be myself. You have this all the time. Here sits the officer, member of the court, and here is a set of charges against an enlisted man. He looks on that set of charges and what does he see? He sees, "Preferred by an officer." Then he sees an indorsement on that set of charges by the post commander, the organizational commander, to the effect, "I have investigated these charges and I believe they can be sustained. I do not believe they can be dealt with properly other than by court-martial." That is signed, usually, by a colonel. Then he sees a second indorsement referring these charges to the court-martial, which, in effect, means the same thing, that the major general believes that these charges ought to be tried; that is, he believes the man is guilty. That is signed "major general."

Now, here come the charges. Frequently, after you have gotten in the evidence it is perfectly patent to all that the evidence is very flimsy; but I have heard this statement made, I believe literally, a thousand times, "Well, you know, there is something to this case or it would never have gotten here to us. It has come up through all these authorities." You hear officers of the Army say, "Well, if a man's charges are referred to a court for trial, you may bet your bottom dollar he is guilty."

Senator LENROOT. You think that is true to a greater extent than in civil life, where in spite of the presumption of innocence the jurymen are very apt to think that if a man has been indicted by a grand jury there is something to it?

Mr. ANSELL. Sometimes I think such may be the jurymen's vague and general first impression, but when he gets into the trial, with lawyers and the judge, too—as they must, of course—required to assume innocence until guilt is proved, no matter what they may think as mere men when they get into the box, by reason of the grand jury having functioned, before they get through with the thing I think they are universally given a mental slant toward the accused.

Senator LENROOT. I think that is true. And you do not think that is true in courts-martial?

Mr. ANSELL. I think it is just the opposite there.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. A man comes before the court with a presumption of guilt against him, for the reason that the superior officer has said it ought to be investigated?

Mr. ANSELL. I am sorry to say, Senator, that is the truth. If you were really to change the law now in courts-martial and say that a man should be presumed guilty until he has proved himself innocent, I doubt very much if the results would be changed.

I do not mean to say that these officers sitting on courts deliberately go out to convict men, although I think we have got these traditions—these professional preachments—so well grounded in us that it is difficult for us to do justice strictly in accordance with law.

Take the case of a very splendid young man tried for an offense out in the Middle West. A brigadier general was the commanding officer and prosecuting witness. He was called by the judge advocate to testify, and a very bright young lawyer from New York—a second lieutenant—defended the enlisted man, who was a sergeant—I think a candidate for a commission. Here is what happened during the trial: The brigadier general testified against the youngster, and the second lieutenant began to cross-examine to test the credibility by the usual proper questions.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The credibility of the brigadier general?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; the legal credibility I am referring to, of course. There was some evidence that the brigadier general did have it in for this man, because there were two men involved in the same transaction, and he let one of them off and insisted on court-martialing the accused. Now, obviously there was a chance to go into the commanding officer's attitude toward the accused and toward the case generally, and this young counsel undertook to do it, and the record will show that he did it most respectfully; but when he came to about the second question the brigadier general said to him, "What, sir, do you mean by asking me these questions?" Perhaps a bit unfortunately the youngster resorted to legal language and said, "I am trying to test your credibility"; whereupon the brigadier general thought that was a reflection upon his veracity and integrity, and said, "I will not permit you to ask me any such questions that reflect upon my credibility." But the youngster insisted that he had such a right; and the brigadier general jumped up, excited, and said to the counsel, "If you insist on asking any question that is designed to reflect upon my veracity and capacity and disposition to tell the truth in this case, I will put in charges immediately and have you haled before this court."

Well, as usual in such rumpuses as that, the court was closed. You see, there was an objection made by the witness to making answer. When the court was closed everybody went out, and when they were called in to hear the decision of the court the court had decided that the brigadier general was right.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is a case of record?

Mr. ANSELL. That is a case of record. I could name you the brigadier general. He is a very good man, but he just did not understand. Now that is shocking to us as lawyers. I will assure you that is not shocking to Army men. It is not shocking. I have been counsel for men too many times not to know that. I have a very distinct recollection of myself having defended a signal sergeant to acquittal—I think he was a signal sergeant—and I made a pretty vigorous and sometimes technical defense—certainly, what Army men would call a technical defense, but, nevertheless, a proper defense—and friends of mine on the court would come to me at recess and say to me, "Why don't you stop this? You know your man is guilty. You are getting yourself in dutch with this court;" and all of that kind of thing. Now, they did not mean to do wrong.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Practically prejudging the case?

Mr. ANSELL. Oh, yes. If a judge had told you that in a civil forum you know what would have happened. But it just shows you.

I will give you another example. A lieutenant, a quartermaster, was put to making a trap for an enlisted man out in the western department, to catch him, to see if he was not stealing some goods out of a storehouse, and he set the trap and he said that he caught the man; which I very much doubt. He preferred charges against the man. He was, of course, the prosecuting witness; and then he was made judge advocate of the court; and then he was assigned by the commanding officer as counsel for the accused, and he functioned in all capacities, prosecuting witness, judge advocate, and counsel for the accused!

When that case got to me, I said very briefly that this man had not been fairly tried, and it went back to the commanding general of this particular department, and he, as though hurt, said "The Acting Judge Advocate General is actually criticizing our system"; which of course I was, if it was under our system permissible for that man to be all that he was. In other words, your present articles of war make your judge advocate the prosecutor, and also to a great extent the counsel for the accused. If there is any one thing that I hope the committee may very carefully consider, it is that we have a judge advocate. Notice the title, "judge advocate." He is the advocate for the court, and prosecutor. He is the judge for the court. He is their legal adviser. He is also counsel for the accused when the accused has no counsel, and if the accused has counsel, he is directed to see that the interests of the accused do not suffer. Now, that sounds as though it was all for the benefit of the accused. I will assure you that it is not. We ought to abolish the judge advocate as a prosecutor and make him a real judge before that court, according to the general system of Europe, and have a special prosecutor for the Government.

Now, these cases that I have used for illustration, they are not isolated cases. They are not.

Senator LENROOT. General, if this plan were adopted, to what extent, in your judgment, would it be necessary to increase the force in the Judge Advocate General's office, with the present-sized Army?

Mr. ANSELL. With the present-sized Army, I do not think we would have to increase it at all, Mr. Chairman. You see, we would have less review up here. I would have you to get that point. We wait now until all these errors have accumulated from the bottom to the top, and then we do our best to correct; and look at the reviewing force! One hundred and eight men we have had here; and we must have a very large number now. Of course I am not connected with the department now, but I doubt if it has decreased very much. One hundred and eight lawyers, with the vast number of clerks, going all the time. They are not all engaged on this work, but a large proportion of them are engaged on it.

Senator LENROOT. What was the number of the personnel prior to the war?

Mr. ANSELL. We had 13 officers under the national defense act, and then when we expanded under the national defense act when war was first declared—you remember that filled up—we got 29 or 30, and that is our law department.

Senator LENROOT. Altogether?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; and then when the big Army came on we ran up to 450. But Col. Weeks, as executive officer, and I worked out a scheme last October which was designed to put one law officer with each court and prevent error, if we could, right at the source; and we believed that by sending many of our reviewing officers here and putting them on courts-martial and preventing error at the source, we could get along with fewer men, and I am convinced we can get along with fewer men.

But there is another element that would work toward getting along with fewer men. We have got to do something to decrease the number of trials. It must be obvious to everybody that we have too many trials by court-martial. Now, a man may do something, but every time that a man does something in violation of the law he should not be haled before a court.

Take the methods of investigation. I say if you require, as this bill does require, the most thorough investigation before a man shall be court-martialed, and then you require the law officer, who is already on the staff of the convening authority, to go into the evidence and say that the evidence is sufficient to constitute a prima facie case, and then go into the charges and determine their legal sufficiency, I say this, Mr. Chairman, based upon my experience, and I notice that Gen. Wood agrees with me in this—and I really believe that up until the time we got into this controversy nine out of ten Army officers would have agreed with me; probably not now, because we have all gotten into a sort of controversial mood or excited—that you can reduce by more than 50 per cent the number of trials in the Army, which reduction in and of itself will tend greatly to the benefit of discipline by requiring these thorough investigations and legal tests before we arraign these men before courts-martial.

Senator LENROOT. Did I understand you to say that you thought after we got to a peace basis, 30 men in that office would be sufficient to carry out the duties?

Mr. ANSELL. I never thought that 30 were sufficient, because we relied upon getting judge advocates then by detailing men from the line.

Senator LENROOT. Yes, I understand. That is what I am getting at.

Mr. ANSELL. Oh, no. But I say this, that for the same number of men we had before the war, I mean with the same sized Army and the same number of men that we used on legal work—they were not all judge advocates—I believe we can do this same task. But it would be necessary to decrease the number of courts-martial as we would decrease them under this bill.

Senator LENROOT. The number that would be required would depend very largely upon the policy that we would hereafter pursue with reference to the consolidation of Army posts, would it not?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes. Of course the court-martial system does largely depend upon that; but it is not indissolubly connected with it. There is no reason why a court-martial should be sitting at each post. I think it is bad to take some 13 officers, with the stenographers, clerks, the attachés, and all that, and have them sitting in each Army post. Of course if an Army post had a division there, that would be an economical legal unit; but if I were a major general commanding a department, I would not have all these courts-martial sitting in all these posts. It is not necessary. I believe, just as much as I am sitting here, that an itinerant court would have been one of the most valuable things, and certainly on the battle front. Take the men to be tried; they might be partially sick, or wounded. With a good Judge Advocate, a law officer, a prosecutor, if you had let him go from place to place and let them try these men there, I believe that would have been a good thing. But, of course, under the present system, every little commander has his court-martial.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. If he is the commander of a garrison he has his court?

Mr. ANSELL. Oh, yes.

Senator LENROOT. Your bill does contemplate that?

Mr. ANSELL. The bill permits the President himself to convene courts-martial and give them any jurisdiction with respect to territory that he pleases. But if we did ever once get this system of law-controlled courts, with the commanding general largely cut out of it, of course there would not be, Mr. Chairman, the same necessity to resort to a court-martial at every little place.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is, you mean a general court-martial?

Mr. ANSELL. A general court-martial.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. If we had one general court-martial.

Mr. ANSELL. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. We have the Eastern Department and the Western Department——

Mr. ANSELL. I was up there as judge advocate at the Eastern Department, and we had scores of courts going at every one of the little stations, taking up the time of the officers from training their troops. It is ridiculous, but it is according to the old army traditions. We have not moved a peg.

Now, the Confederacy departed from this system immediately after the opening of the Civil War. They had what, we must confess, was a rather better military system than the Union Army. They broke away from this system almost from the beginning.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. They realized the character of their citizenship down there. They would not have stood for it, I think.

Mr. ANSELL. Of course I think that is perfectly true. We all understand the differences between the two armies.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. At the first of the war?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes. It is a very important matter.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I will put this question to you: There are four departments, the Eastern, the Western, the Central——

Mr. ANSELL. I think there are more now. We have the Northeastern and the Southeastern Departments.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. There were only four departments. Now, with one general court, why could not that court function in each of these departments, and would it not become more efficient?

Mr. ANSELL. It would work out beautifully, I have no doubt in the world.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Would it cause delays and long imprisonment of men?

Mr. ANSELL. No, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. They now keep a man confined sometimes four or five months before he gets a trial.

Mr. ANSELL. After all, when you make an officer of the Army realize that he is governed by a legal system, you are going to get a good result. Officers of the Army are not lawless men. When a court sits, they are going to do their duty.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Civil courts do that very thing; they go from one district to another and try cases.

Mr. ANSELL. Yes. I wanted to call attention to one phase of the placing of enlisted men on that court, because you will hear more of that later. It is that which has led to the suggestion in the Kernan report, as you may have observed, that this proposition is one of bolshevism. I would like to sum up with respect to this matter and say that its main provisions are that a commanding general can not court-martial a man at will. These two things must have been done; his law officer must have said, "The investigation that has been made has produced evidence that justifies a trial"; that is, prima facie proof; and, too, the law officer must have said that the charges as drafted are legally sufficient to allege an offense against the Articles of War.

Now, then, after that the commanding general may or may not, as he pleases, court-martial the man.

Second, an officer may not prefer a charge against a man simply upon the general obligation of his office, but he has got to do so under the special obligation of an oath, on proper information. That will greatly reduce the number of charges.

Then, when we come to the trial, the man is entitled to his challenges, both for cause and peremptory challenges, and in the usual cases to challenges to the array. But, of course, in the case of challenges to the array the commanding general has the entire Army under his command to create a new panel with.

When we come to trial, the principal thing about the trial is that there is a judge and there is a jury, in fact.

Lastly, the commanding general does not confirm the proceedings, but they come to this court of appeals; and there is a court of appeals.

Now, as to the details, I presume gentlemen can dispute about them. I know they can.

I wanted to invite the attention of the committee to the Kernan report. I have studied the report with some considerable thoroughness, though not the actual amendments that they have suggested to the Articles of War; but it is obvious from the character of the report that the amendments that they suggest are but slight changes of the existing system. Observe that their great text, Mr. Chairman, is that this proposition here in the Chamberlain bill, or the bill that I drafted, or the propositions that you have heard me advocating here, will result in the transfer of discipline to the hands of lawyers. "The transfer of discipline"; that is the way it is put.

Now, let us just examine that. Let us see where a lawyer comes in. A lawyer can do no more than say that there is a prima facie case here; that as a matter of law the charges are legally sufficient. Where does discipline come in there? Are not those questions inherently questions of law? Are the charges good, and is the evidence sufficient to justify trial in accordance with the lawyer's well-known conception of what evidence is sufficient? He has got to know the elements of the evidence and the kind of testimony that it takes to prove it. Is that not a question of law?

Now, let us see what the opposite to that means; and it reveals the whole situation. The opposite side is this, that a man ought to be tried if the commanding general so wills it, even though the charges are not, as a matter of law, legally sufficient—that is true; that is their contention—and that a man ought to be tried if the commanding general so wills it, notwithstanding the fact that the investigation has not revealed sufficient evidence to justify the prosecution.

The statement that this bill or this proposition transfers discipline to the hands of lawyers is not true; it does no more than transfer pure questions of law to the hands of lawyers.

Now, when we come to the trial, I am going to quote the British barrister that I once referred to, away back there in 1849, Warren, and I am going to quote this Scotch barrister, writing in Blackwoods, and then I am going to appeal to our common sense. When we take from 5 to 13 of these unskilled tryers, these military men, who certainly have not acquired any capacity for judicial determination by reason of the fact that they wear shoulder straps, and make them judges of both law and fact, may we not expect all sorts of errors of law? Would you trust 5 to 13 unskilled Army officers to determine questions of law any more quickly than you would trust 5 to 13 pure lawyers, and nothing else, to come down here and make the plans of the Army for an invasion of Germany or Mexico, or some other strategical military proposition? I would not. And it is not logical and it is not common sense; and we have never done it in any other institution of our Government. What is there about an Army officer——

Senator LENROOT. May I ask you here, so that I can follow you a little more intelligently: Do I understand that the only jurisdiction that you propose to confer upon this court of appeals is to review for errors of law?

Mr. ANSELL. To review for errors of law. I think that is the jurisdiction that is conferred upon all courts of error. They are not to retry the facts. The facts, once determined, I think should be permitted to rest, when they are legally determined under instructions by a judge, just as facts are determined in lower courts of the United States.

Senator LENROOT. In your bill, after reciting the review for the correction of errors, in article 52, the language is as follows:

Said court shall review the record of the proceedings of every general court or military commission which carries a sentence involving death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge or confinement for a period of more than six months, for the correction of errors of law evidenced by the record and injuriously affecting the substantial rights of an accused without regard to whether such errors were made the subject of objection or exception at the trial; and such power of review shall include the power——

(a) To disapprove a finding of guilty and approve only so much of a finding of guilty of a particular offense as involves a finding of a lesser included offense.

Mr. ANSELL. Yes.

Senator LENROOT (continuing reading):

(b) To disapprove the whole or any part of a sentence.

* * * * *

And said court of military appeals shall have like jurisdiction to review and revise any sentence of death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge approved for any offense committed and tried since the 6th day of April, 1917, and any sentence of death, dismissal, or discharge in the case of any person now serving confinement as a result of such sentence.

Now, it would seem to me that that empowers this court of military appeals to pass upon the facts as disclosed by the record as well as the law.

Mr. ANSELL. Not prospectively, because the last clause that you have read there was giving it a retrospective jurisdiction, to try to correct what had been done.

Senator LENROOT. That is true as to that, but in the first paragraph I read you say such powers shall include the power to disapprove a finding of guilty.

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; where it is a matter of law, and that is the only case where you could.

Senator LENROOT. I do not think you say so. It seems to me that language would permit the military court of appeals to substitute its judgment for the judgment of the court-martial upon the facts.

Mr. ANSELL. Of course, we are following there rather the existing law governing the convening authority, and it may be that in deference to that language I may have gone afield. I have not read the bill recently. I am inclined to think you will find it so upon thorough study that if the court should find—let us say that the man was charged with murder and convicted of murder—if the court should find that the evidence as a matter of fact was sufficient only to sustain a charge of manslaughter—that is, the malice was not proved—then they would be permitted to substitute the finding of manslaughter for that of murder as a matter of law.

Senator LENROOT. Yes; that would be a matter of law.

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; or if in any case the evidence failed to establish a particular element of offense, the absence of which specific element would reduce it from one grade to another, then the court would be justified in reducing it to that grade.

Senator LENROOT. I want to thoroughly understand you there. If the bill does not confine the jurisdiction of the court to the review for errors of law, it is your view that it should be so confined?

Mr. ANSELL. It is.

Senator LENROOT. And that it should not permit the court of appeals to substitute its judgment upon the facts for the judgment of a court-martial?

Mr. ANSELL. Only when the judgment upon the facts becomes a question of law.

Senator LENROOT. Oh, yes; I understand that; when the facts—

Mr. ANSELL. Are not reasonably sufficient to sustain any judgment.

Senator LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. ANSELL. On any particular element of its finding.

Senator LENROOT. Then, one other question: If the sentence imposed by the court-martial was within the jurisdiction of the court-martial to impose, upon a proper finding of guilt, it is not your intention to permit the court of appeals to revise that sentence because it may think it excessive, although within the jurisdiction of the court?

Mr. ANSELL. Not at all, sir. I would not favor a retrial of the facts, nor would I favor permitting this court to substitute its judgment as to what the punishment upon a proper finding of guilty of an offense ought to be.

Senator LENROOT. That is what I wanted to understand.

Mr. ANSELL. In other words, I would do no more than to confer upon this appellate court the usual power that an appellate court has to correct for errors of law, except that we get a sort of modification in military procedure when we have so many offenses that are composed of included elements, as in civil life we have the various degrees of murder and manslaughter, and in the military procedure you have desertion and the lesser included offense of absence without leave, and so on. We take larceny; it may not be larceny, but it may be prejudicial conduct—trespass. The intent to steal may not be there. We have many offenses of that sort that are rather peculiar to the Military Establishment. Now, I insist, Mr. Chairman, that the statement made in the Kernan report that the effect and the purpose of the proposition that is advanced by that bill is to transfer discipline to the hands of the lawyers is not correct. It does no more than transfer the determination of pure questions of law to the lawyers; pure questions of law, and nothing else.

Senator LENROOT. That was the point I had in mind in my questions, General.

Mr. ANSELL. Yes; I quite appreciate that. I believe that was so in the minds of myself and of every other officer who participated in the drafting of that bill. We consulted jurisdictions of courts, and the English systems, and all of that, and we have the language there; but I again say, having declared what our purpose is and the intended effect, what we want to do is to create a court of appeals here that will correct for errors of law; and we do want to give to this judge, who sits with the trial court, the power to control that jury on questions of pure law; and that is the only way, I think, that the discipline of the Army can be made a discipline regulated by law. The discipline of the Army now is not regulated by law, because the disciplinarians are judges of both the law and the facts, and they have no standard in the code. Their argument is an argument ad hominem. They say that the line officers should be entrusted with this great power of discipline. They take this abstract and rather resultant term, discipline—of course discipline ought surely to be a result of the application of law of some kind—they take that abstract term and say that should be left for the fighting man. Of course, the Constitution left it to Congress to prescribe the rules of discipline, and those rules are law. Let discipline be left to the fighting man, but let it be discipline governed by law.

Now, is the line officer, the fighting man, any more competent to determine these legal questions? Of course, they divide the Army into two classes, the fighting man and the legal man. But in such armies as we are going to have, are we justified in making that hard and fast distinction between the law man and the so-called fighting man? I will assure you that I saw the law man in the battle line, in quite dangerous positions, and I saw many fighting men as safe from the zone of operations as we are, sitting right here. Let us look at this argument straight. Gen. Pershing himself, commanding general of the A. E. F., was in no more danger than you are here, except when, occasionally, he did go to the battle line to inspect some organization. The headquarters of the A. E. F. never saw an air raid. It was not in the danger zone half as much as Paris was. It was absolutely free from it, as, in fact, it ought to have been; and the very general who is chairman of the committee that made this report, Gen. Kernan, was sitting away back at Tours, 150 or 200 miles from the nearest gun, and he never heard or saw a gun.

Now, are we not paying too much attention to mere labels? We had 200,000 officers in this Army. Of the old Regular officers there were somewhere between 8,000 and 10,000, and we will presume that some two or three thousand of them had heard a bullet, and that is about all. Then we took the other 190,000 from civil life and we divided them up into line and staff; and one lawyer belongs to the line and another belongs to the staff. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not going to concede that merely because you label this new-made officer a "line officer," he becomes, ipso facto, qualified to pass upon all these questions of discipline so-called, unregulated, or unadvised, or uninformed, or anything else. It does not get anybody anywhere. But what this report is really predicated on is the sharp distinctions between the professional and the nonprofessional officer, I think. They are talking about the old-time army, where the man who served with troops was supposed to be this rough-and-ready soldier who was ready to fire at any minute, who served with his troops all the time, and who knew nothing but his troops. Well, I say I think one of our great mistakes is that we adopt and maintain in time of peace a system that always falls down in time of war because it was not made for war. Our Army systems are not made for war, that is certain. Every time we have a war they have to change the whole scheme of things, and if we are going back to this system that they seem to think was fine for the Regular Army—I do not, but they seem to think so—this old-type sort of mercenary establishment, the old school, then when we come to war again I will assure you that the Senate and the House will try to remodel the thing after war has begun.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Has this archaic system of the Army had much to do with the prevention of young civilians enlisting in the Army?

Mr. ANSELL. I have no doubt of that. I believe I have always been a little closer in touch with civil thought, for one reason or another, than the ordinary orthodox Regular Army officer. I am orthodox enough. The time will come when your boy and mine are going to war. I think about it a great deal. I want mine to go to war, and they are going; but I shall feel very much better satisfied with any system of military instruction that you are going to have if I know that when these youngsters of mine or yours come to camp for instruction or for battle training they are going to be met rather sympathetically, and by a set of men who know that they are citizens, that they are not this professional type of soldier. If one should go absent without leave for two hours, I do not want him sent to the penitentiary or to a disciplinary barracks for 25 years.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I know that the civilian point of view has been obtained from observations at near-by garrisons. A young civilian goes there, or the father or mother of a civilian goes there, and finds your soldier doing menial duty, waiting upon an officer, holding a horse at the door, standing around until the officer is ready to go, and the general impression is that the soldier is acting as a servant, and they go away from there and report that to the civilian population. Have you not found that so?

Senator LENROOT. Absolutely.

Mr. ANSELL. While I was at West Point there was a very decided effort made there—I can not say that it succeeded, because I can not recall—to bar the enlisted man, when accompanied by a woman—that is, a soldier when walking with his girl or a married soldier with his wife—from the front walks, and to make them go through the alleys. I served right here at Washington Barracks as a mere boy when this order was issued. During the parade, the daily ceremony, everybody from Washington could come there, everybody, and could stand on the front walks and observe the parade, but the soldiers had to confine themselves to back alleys, etc. Now, that is not going to do. I will tell you this, West Point is one of the greatest institutions in this world, it is second to none as a military institution, but it has its very serious faults. It inculcates these wrong views, I think, in our officers. We West Point men do establish the system, the standards, of our Army. There are only about 30 per cent of us of the old Regular Army, but for reasons that may be well appreciated, we establish the standard of the Army. The others conform.

Now, I can recall how this thing struck me as a cadet. Here was an enlisted man, well-dressed—because they have to be well-dressed there—soldierly, walking a sentry post up there, as you have seen. They guard the institution on the river front. I remember, when I was a fourth classman, asking an upper classman for some direction, and he said, “Go ask that bum.” Seeing that I did not know what he meant, he said, “That bum soldier over there”—the enlisted man walking the post. It was quite common, I found out afterwards, for the young gentlemen at the Military Academy in training to become officers to refer to the enlisted men as “bums.” I understand that it is claimed that the word is a derivative of “bombardier,” and they were bombardiers who formerly guarded the post; but I can only say that too frequently the suggestion was of the lower order of things. Now, there ought not to be that kind of spirit. Of course, we are not talking about social equality and that sort of thing. That is not the point. Of course not. But we want a considerateness on the part of the officer for the enlisted man and a complete realization that an enlisted man is doing, at a far greater risk and disadvantage, just what the officer is doing; he is serving as a citizen and performing a military duty as a citizen, and we ought to look out for him. As I say, the whole fault with the Kernan report is that it does not visualize the fact that our armies are and must be armies of citizens.

Now look at this report, gentlemen. It bears careful perusal. It is well written, succinctly stated. But do you notice that they say it was necessary to have all these courts-martial and all these long punishments because our men were green men and it was necessary to whip them into shape as soldiers in just a few months? Of course, it was necessary to make the best soldiers out of them possible in a few months. But does not the whole report proceed upon the predicate that we got discipline through terrorism? Of course it does. And you do not get discipline, in any rightful sense of that term, through terrorism. Whatever discipline we got, I will assure you, into the Army of the United States during this war, was discipline that was based upon a high regard for citizenship. The quality of the American Army, its fighting quality, was an incident of the appreciation of its citizenship. The Army of the United States in France had a spirit that was second to the spirit of no army that this world has ever seen.

Now, you can not make anybody believe that that spirit was put into those men in the few months' time they were in training camp. It was not put there by terrorization. It was an antecedent, based upon moral considerations and appreciations; it was not pumped into them in a few months in the training camp.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you remember the story of the little sergeant major from the Argonne, who said that a man told a falsehood if he said that he was not afraid when he went over the top; and he said, "Whenever I felt afraid of getting afraid, I thought of the folks at home"?

Mr. ANSELL. Yes, Senator. I am not going to confess that the thing that makes me stand up in front of a bullet is the fact that somebody has terrorized me, Senator. That is not so. It is a different quality from that.

I will lay it down as a fundamental proposition, and I think everybody here will agree with me, that you do not get discipline through fear. Of course you have got to punish men, but to set out to get discipline by trying every man who has violated the regulations, and giving him a maximum punishment, will never do. The higher the appreciation the soldier has for his citizenship, the closer he sticks to his duty. Our successful soldier will ever be actuated by patriotism rather than the fear of his officer. When we come to rely upon terrorism to win battles, then we shall have dropped to the point where we have got, in fact, an army of cowards, who have never won anything yet.

Just see how far these Kernan gentlemen will go, Mr. Chairman. They say that disobedience of orders is disobedience of orders regardless of the character of the order, the time, the place, or the circumstances of its commission. Now, is that reasonable? Are we going to legislate upon any such proposition as that? Is Congress going to permit the Army to be governed upon any such lawless, senseless principle as that? We have these cases. A young soldier guarding a park of artillery down in southwest Texas, exhausted, and having just come out of the hospital, still sick, sat down on post, as he ought not to have done, and fell asleep. The nearest German—so far as I know, the nearest enemy—was 4,000 miles away, with the Atlantic Ocean between. To be sure, it was necessary to guard those guns. It would probably be far better done by watchmen, but we can train soldiers that way. Now, to sentence that man to death, Mr. Chairman, simply upon this hard and fast principle that sleeping on post is sleeping on post, no matter where it is, I say is inconsistent with our natural sense of justice and what military necessities require.

They say that this boy who would not give up his cigarette must be most severely punished, because disobedience of orders like that will grow like canker or gangrene throughout the military establishment. Now, that sounds all right; but it is predicated upon the idea that we have got a set of people who are set like tinder, ready to catch fire from every bad breeze that blows in an army—and you know that we have not! Men do not want to disobey orders. Take that same man up against a German, after he has been given some instruction as a soldier, and if you went and told that man to charge the German, or to shoot at a German, or to advance on a machine-gun nest, and then he deliberately and knowingly and intentionally refused to do it, why, to say that that case is such as that case was up here in the New Jersey camp is quite absurd.

They speak contemptuously of a soldier, however new he may be in the Army, following the natural human impulse and inclination, or human sentiments. They say, and they are quoting the War Department for this, "Why, are you going to let a man go home to see his sick mother, or a dying brother, and let him stay two or three days, and then not sentence him to death when he comes back? If so, the Army will disintegrate, and the instinct will be far greater, when you get in front of the Germans, not to charge a German trench." In other words, let a soldier follow the ordinary human impulse or sentiment in the least degree, you must not take that sentiment or impulse into account in the least degree as an extenuating circumstance. Sentiment is apt to be good; it should not be crushed out; it should simply be directed.

I do not think that our Army can ever take its proper place in the affections of the people if you are going to have a set of Army officers who are strict adherents to the theory that if I am impelled to go home to see my dying mother, and those are the facts, conceded, after I get back I should be shot, and that the great call of the human heart is not to be considered as an extenuating circumstance. That is too hard and fast. I have already told you that this report largely consists of a legal argument to the effect that you gentlemen—I mean the Congress of the United States—can not create a court of appeals. Now, consider the clause of the Constitution itself, and I do not think that the question admits of any dispute or argument. You have just as much right to create a superior military court as you have the summary court. You have just as much right to create this military court of appeals as you have the general court-martial. And certainly everybody has known from the beginning, and the Supreme Court of the United States has said time and time again, that courts-martial of the United States are purely the creatures of Congress, as you make them, whatever you make them. You may have one kind of court or ten kinds of court; you may vest final jurisdiction in the summary court or the special court or the general court, or you can vest final jurisdiction in an appellate court. Really, that is not worth arguing, although seven pages of this report is taken up with that proposition.

They say that you must not divorce discipline from the hands of the commanding general. I have never insisted that you should. I have only insisted that the disciplinary measures that are to be handled by a commanding general should be regulated by the law of the land.

Now, that whole report is right in theory with that celebrated editorial that appears in the Congressional Record of February 15 last, I think it was, taken from the Chicago Tribune, read into the Record by the present distinguished chairman of the House Committee on Military Affairs, evidently expressive of his views, at the request of the Judge Advocate General of the Army of the United States. The editorial is very brief, indeed, but it speaks a volume. It is the text of this Kernan report; it is the text of the War Department attitude. I say that this committee's report proceeds exactly along the line of this editorial, which I believe was expressive of the views of the gentlemen in the other House, and which I want to read here, because it is brief. [Reading:]

ARMY DISCIPLINE.

"For I am a man under authority, having under myself soldiers; and I say to this one, Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh; and to my servant, Do this, and he doeth it." (St. Matthew, vii, 9.)

When a soldier goes absent without leave, deserts his post of duty to see a dying father, he does so because his own personal desires are stronger than his sense of responsibility to his country. It may be a hard thing to give up seeing a dying father, but it is a harder thing to give up running away in the face of the enemy.

That is what military justice is about. The sole preoccupation of an Army, wherever it is, is to train its men and keep them trained to obey the will of the commander under the most trying possible circumstances, and serve the will of the nation. If disobedience had been tolerated in the United States, our Army in Europe would not have captured the St. Mihiel salient nor fought six weeks in the Argonne.

The reason that the National Guard made good in this war and failed in our previous wars was that from the time it was inducted into the Federal service it was subjected to Regular Army discipline. In previous wars it kept its own "discipline."

An Army, to be successful in the field, must from the moment it begins to train at home have absolute control of its discipline. The commanding general is everything. He must bear the three keys. He must have final control. He must be the judiciary, the legislature, and the executive. If he were not, he would not have an army. He would have a collection of armed individuals.

It so happens—and I looked it up—that the text of this editorial is the statement made by the centurion when he came to Christ at Capernaum and apologetically asked Christ to save his child, saying, "I represent the power of the whole Roman Empire, and yet over these moral and spiritual things I have no control, and you have so much." That was the Roman theory, to say to the soldier, "Go, and he goeth," and to another, "Come, and he cometh;" and the centurion had absolute control. We found the Roman theory in the German Army; hard and fast iron discipline. And yet that German Army was fairly pitted—more than fairly pitted—against the liberal armies of the world, especially our own, when our Army was not the best equipped army—when it was not the best led army from the standpoint of professional soldiers; but we saw that kind of discipline pitted against this higher appreciation and conception that an American soldier has of his duty as a soldier, and we saw the result.

We overcame the German troops in front of us, not because we had had this long system of Regular Army training and this hard and fast discipline, but because of these other qualities that I have referred to; and we succeeded, to an extent, in spite of the system of discipline that we had and not because of it. We succeeded, in a word, because of the American spirit that those men took there with them. It was because of the spirit and not because of this hard and fast senseless discipline that we won against the Romano-German methods.

The gentlemen again in their report referred to the fact that the new Army officer is responsible. Responsible for what. I do not know, because the report is an approval of the result of the administration. But as I said the other morning, conceding harsh punishments, the statement is not so; and even if it were so, we ought not to have a system that permits a new officer to abuse his force. It should be controlled by law rather than by the untrained judgment and unrestrained power of this new man.

But I said that the fact was that the convening authorities were not untrained officers; they had the authority; and they ought not to pass the buck to any new officer.

The Kernan board say that they have actually heard from 255 officers, and that rather more than half of those officers approved of the system, and that the old officers in the service in large percentage approve of it, and that the other officers go from absolute, flat disapproval to a mild approval or disapproval. Of course the gentlemen of the Regular Establishment who have been trained to this system do approve in large percentage, but this is a fact, and is one that speaks loudly: You take an officer at his retirement time, or an officer after he has retired—a Regular officer—and see what he says about it. You will find him quite a liberal-minded man. He has got back into civil life; he is no longer in the hierarchy and subject to it; he has taken a calm survey of his life's work. If they have 255 letters from officers of the Army at large, I have got seven times that many letters from officers of the Army at large and very nearly that many letters from officers of the Regular Army on the retired list and who are about to go on the retired list, saying that something ought to be done about this system. The board say that it is noticeable that the gentlemen who have been on the battlefield, out of these 255 officers, advocate the present system because they have seen how necessary it was to have this German hard and fast system applied to our troops. If that is so, if they saw on the battlefield how necessary it was, they must have seen it through observing the derelictions of our men. Now, we did not have that kind of wholesale dereliction on the battlefield. I went over to Europe and commanding generals there argued with me that they had to have more power to shoot men, and I said to one of them: "It seems to me that I must infer from your insistence that for the first time we have an army with a very considerable number of cowards in it." "No, no; nothing of that kind." "Where, then, is the necessity for this thing?" Then they began to tell me about our allies, how our allies took men and stood them up and shot them before breakfast. And I investigated our allies' administration in that respect, and it did not bear out that statement at all. When I came back from Europe, I said to the Secretary of War that an enlisted man of our Army has poorer protection than the enlisted man in any army with which we were associated. It is true. A man could not be executed in the French Army by a commander in the field in this ruthless way. It was passed upon by the supreme authorities of the land.

I have already adverted to the fact that the report concludes, following Col. Wigmore's letter, as you remember, that if you loosen up on this system of discipline, as you call it, you are bound to have bolshevism. That is the bugaboo now. There will never be a bit of reform or a bit of progressive legislation proposed but that the people who insist on being static will label it bolshevism.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The only indication of bolshevism in the American Army that I have seen comes from the mouths of the men who have been unjustly punished in Europe, and they are very bitter at the treatment they received.

Mr. ANSELL. Of course, if it is as reactionary as I have said it is, and there ever should be bolshevism, I think logically we could attribute the bolshevistic spirit to the oppressive treatment. Now, the idea of Mr. Wigmore coming along, and in the spirit which this report adopts, saying that that is the way they have in bolshevist armies, and that this will lead to bolshevism. Does anybody believe that bolshevism, or whatever else it is indicating lawlessness in Russia, is due to too much liberalism and too much democracy, to too high a regard upon the part of the officers of their Army for the enlisted man? Is bolshevism, this great upheaval, or whatever it is, traceable to an overdose of liberalism or is it, indeed, traceable to the fact that it is a break up of the old reactionary system that they have had there?

It is not a fair argument to come here and argue against the bill that if you require discipline to be regulated according to law, the consequence, must be bolshevism. It is one of those arguments ad hominem, and a foolish one at that.

I got a letter yesterday from a New York lawyer. It was in reply to a postal card I had sent out asking the American Bar Association would they please be careful, in passing upon the report of that bar association committee, so that the American bar might not be said to espouse the retention of this system, and this New York lawyer wrote a letter. He said, "Oh, I will admit that lawyers have a great influence; but it may not be in the direction you want it in. We have got bolshevism on every hand, and the whole country is lawless, and we have got to come out and show people, and if necessary we have got to hang them. There is going to be a terrible time, it is certain. That is the line of reform we want in this country, and more and more needed."

Well, that is his view of it. When I was discussing point No. 1 the other morning, I had started on showing this committee the spirit with which that revision of 1916 was undertaken. I had put in one exhibit, but I was switched off, as I have been very frequently—switched off of my own accord—to another subject, before I put in another exhibit, which I would like to do now. I think it is very brief. It is just some statements made by the Judge Advocate General and the Secretary of War before the committee, to show conclusively that they rejected absolutely the liberalization of this system at this time, as they still do.

I desire to thank this committee for their extreme patience in hearing me, and their extreme courtesy at all times. I have had a full and fair hearing, and I want to thank you for your interest and attention.

Senator LENROOT. We are very much obliged to you.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. May I suggest the names of some other witnesses whom we would like to hear?

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. There is a gentleman here from Detroit, who served as an enlisted man through the war, and had some experience of court-martials. Can we hear him on Monday?

Senator LENROOT. Are you going away, Mr. Thomas?

Mr. THOMAS. I have been very anxious to go. I have been waiting over, Senator, in order to make my statement.

Senator LENROOT. On Tuesday, then, we will hear you.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. There is also Col. Chantland, of the Department of Justice. Will you hear him?

Mr. ANSELL. Mr. Chantland is away, and will not be back for over a week.

Senator LENROOT. We will hear you, then, Mr. Thomas, on Tuesday at 10 o'clock.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. Thomas, I would say, did not come here to testify. He was here in Washington on some business, and I met him and was talking to him. I thought the committee would be interested to hear him.

(Thereupon, at 12.30 o'clock p. m., the subcommittee adjourned until Tuesday, September 2, 1919, at 10.30 a. m.)

ESTABLISHMENT OF MILITARY JUSTICE—PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF THE ARTICLES OF WAR.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 2, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to adjournment, in the room of the Committee on Appropriations in the Capitol, at 10.30 o'clock a. m., Senator Francis E. Warren presiding.

Present, Senators Warren (chairman), Lenroot and Chamberlain.

Senator LENROOT. Last Saturday morning, I, as acting chairman of this subcommittee, sent a note to Secretary Baker stating that these hearings were going on, and that I would be glad, if he desired, to have a representative of the department present at the hearings, and that the committee would be glad to hear such persons as he might suggest, and at his convenience we will be glad to have him appear before the committee. I had from him this morning a letter in reply, which I will present for insertion in the record at this point.

(The letter referred to is here printed in the record in full as follows:)

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, August 30, 1919.

MY DEAR SENATOR LENROOT: I have just received your courteous note of this morning informing me of the hearings before the subcommittee appointed to consider the Chamberlain bill proposing to revise the court-martial law.

I should be very grateful if the clerk of the subcommittee could be instructed to supply me with copies of the testimony as rapidly as possible, so that my associates and I can have the benefit of the suggestions made. At the convenience of the committee I, of course, desire to have Gen. Crowder, Gen. Kreger, and Gen. Kernan appear as witnesses, and I should be glad also to personally appear at the convenience of the committee, though, perhaps my appearance had better come in the latter part of the hearings rather than in the earlier part of them, so that any matters which the committee has before it affecting orders issued by me will be fully disclosed and can be properly discussed. My own attention to the court-martial attention, of course, has been supervisory rather than executive, and on the general question of modifications proposed the suggestions of those who have been operating the present system will have to be relied upon for detailed discussion.

Cordially, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

STATEMENT OF MR. W. B. THOMAS.

Senator WARREN. I understand that we have as a witness before the committee this morning Mr. Thomas. Will you give your full name to the stenographer, Mr. Thomas?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. May I make this statement for the record? Mr. Thomas was incidentally introduced to me some days ago, and I ascertained that he had participated more or less in court-martial trials in France as an enlisted man, and I asked him if he would come before the committee while he was here to give his views upon the whole subject, from the viewpoint of an enlisted man and from the viewpoint of one who had participated in trials by court-martial, and he is here in pursuance of that suggestion.

Senator WARREN. What organization were you connected with, Mr. Thomas?

Mr. THOMAS. I was a private in Company F of the Sixteenth Engineers, railway, that being one of the first 10 regiments that was organized in the Reserves after the United States declared war, organized for the purpose of proceeding immediately to France for various engineering construction work, and organized of picked men who would be of the kind that could go without a great deal of preliminary training; men of sufficient poise and character to take part in the work that was required of them without having to be trained for a long time.

I would like to state that the enlisted personnel of the regiment was a very unusual one; it was of very high class.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Will you tell the committee who you are and what your business was and where you were located, and how you happened to go there?

Senator WARREN. I was just about to make that inquiry; because in those engineer regiments they were looking for those who were experienced in various lines.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; picked men. I am a lawyer by profession, of about 25 years' experience, and of average standing, and of average ability, I presume, and I had a very fair practice.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Whereabouts?

Mr. THOMAS. At Minneapolis. I practice in the county and live in Minneapolis.

During the Spanish-American War I resigned a commission in the militia and enlisted as a private in the Third United States Artillery, Regulars. I resigned my commission in the militia at that time because the militia then were very inefficient.

I served for about six or seven months as a private during the Spanish War in the Third Artillery, Regulars, and then was given a commission in the Thirty-fifth Infantry, and served with them in the Philippines, resigning from the Army in 1901. On the outbreak of this war there were many reasons which the committee would not be interested in, the details of which I need not go into, why it was very advisable for me to go into the Army. The conditions in Minnesota were such that I felt it clearly my duty to do everything in my power. I was over the age for a commission, as the law then stood, but I was within the age to enlist in the engineer force, and I enlisted.

We went to France; left some time in July, 1917, and arrived in France about the middle of August—about the 20th of August, 1917—and I was there until this spring.

Shortly after we had gotten there numerous charges began to be brought against men for all sorts of offenses, and within a little while it got out among the enlisted men that I was an attorney in civil life, so that I became very popular as counsel for the accused in court-martial cases. The present Articles of War make no distinction between an officer and an enlisted man in acting as counsel for an accused, and while the officers attempted in every way to prevent my acting, I stood my ground constantly on my right, under the Articles of War, until an occurrence which I will relate later, and insisted on acting for all the men who demanded that I do so.

When I give my views, gentlemen, I am quite sure that I am voicing the opinions of the enlisted personnel of the American Expeditionary Forces; I lived with the boys two years. The life in the Army is much more intimate than even in an affectionate family. The boys live together and know every move that everyone makes. There could be no closer intimacy than is in the barracks of a company under the conditions that we had in France.

One case, which I did not try myself, but which was put into my hands after a conviction with the view that perhaps something might be done, and which was put in my hands not by the man himself but by his friends in his company who were outraged at the injustice that had been done, was the case of a man named O'Hara.

Right here I desire to state, parenthetically, that just before leaving for the United States I was sent to the hospital in France with tonsillitis, and the doctors suspected that it might be diphtheria, which was then rampant there, and I was put in isolation and everything taken away from me that I had, including all my papers, and I never got them back. All of the papers that I had accumulated as counsel for courts-martial were lost then, and I have to testify entirely from memory.

This man O'Hara was stationed at the Engineer replacement camp at Angers as a casual. There were fourteen or fifteen thousand men at Angers in casual camps, and the system was, when replacements were needed in any company or regiment in the Engineer Corps, a demand was made on the replacement camp for so many men, who were then selected and sent out to fill up the vacancies. Men were going through there at the rate of 2,000 or 3,000 a day, going and coming, and they were all strangers to each other. It was not the same as where men were in their own companies and all knew each other. The men were all strangers, and no man was interested in anybody but himself.

This man O'Hara, with about 70 others, was sent out with a lieutenant as replacement to a regiment. They marched down to the depot in Angres in heavy marching order, with all their things on their backs, at 3 o'clock in the morning. After marching around there for a while looking for a train, the lieutenant took them into the waiting room and told them to unsling their packs and wait there. This waiting room was in the immediate vicinity of the eating room in the station, and after the lieutenant had gone out the men asked the sergeant who was left in charge, "How about getting breakfast?" He said, "Certainly; any of you that want breakfast go in and get breakfast." Some of them did. This man O'Hara and one other went in and sat at a table overlooking the tracks, where they kept on watch, and ordered breakfast. They were there not over 20 minutes, and when they came out their outfit was gone, and they rushed down the track and found that the outfit had gone on a French train, not on the train they were expected to go on, but a French train that the lieutenant found had some empty cars on it, and the lieutenant had come back on the run and told them to come on and go, and they had been gone six or seven minutes when these two men came out of the restaurant.

This man O'Hara immediately went across the street and reported to the provost marshal, the proper procedure for a man in his condition. He was given three years and a dishonorable discharge and, as far as I know is now serving his three years. He was when I left France; he was in prison.

Senator LENROOT. Were the facts that you state proven?

Mr. THOMAS. I am speaking now of the record. I am speaking not from what somebody else might have stated, but from what the record showed, and the whole facts shown. He was charged not with missing a train, but with disobedience, the disobedience consisting in not remaining in the immediate vicinity. Of course, any lawyer would understand that he was not guilty of disobedience at all, but that is what he was charged with.

Senator WARREN. Tell us something about the trial. What was he charged with, and who constituted the court?

Mr. THOMAS. That, sir, I do not know. In that particular case the record was given to me to examine, but I did not represent the man on his trial. The record was given to me to see if something could not be done on appeal, and I did write a communication or two about it, but got no satisfaction.

Senator WARREN. You looked the case over to see if the man was guilty?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir; and I personally was not acquainted with the court, and I could not give you the names of the members of the court.

Senator WARREN. You could not give us the names of the court?

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir; the only name I remember is that of O'Hara, of the One hundred and sixteenth Engineers.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That would locate him.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes. The case must be of record. It was a general court.

Senator WARREN. You do not know whether he is serving his sentence now or not?

Mr. THOMAS. He was when I left France, early this spring. He was in the prison camp at Gievres.

Another case, which was a little thing, but which probably showed the attitude as well as anything I know of, was a case——

Senator WARREN. Just a moment; I am not, I might say in this connection, speaking for any division of opinion about Regulars or drafted men or militia, but still, sometimes it is well to follow those matters. As to these officers of that court, if you know, to what did they belong?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not know, sir. In regard to this particular court, I do not remember the name of a single officer that was on the court. The case had not been tried in the vicinity in which I was stationed. It was tried at Angers when I was up on the English front, and I paid no attention to that. I only paid attention, so far as a record was concerned that was given me, to the facts and not to the personnel of that court, or any names.

Senator WARREN. This record you received came from the man himself or from friends of his?

Mr. THOMAS. This was the record of the court, and he sent it to friends of his, who sent it to me. I think his friends got it from his counsel—the man who represented him on the trial.

Senator WARREN. I was going to say that the complaint is, usually, that they can not get those records.

Mr. THOMAS. There was great difficulty in getting them, in certain cases.

Senator WARREN. I wanted to ask how it came to you, so as to cover that point.

Mr. THOMAS. His friends got it from the man who represented him on the trial as counsel.

Senator WARREN. I happened to try to find, myself, about an officer, and was not able, in my position, to get at the record.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; that was the general complaint over there.

One case that showed the drift over there perhaps as well as anything was the case of a lieutenant, whose name unfortunately I have forgotten, but I can give you the name of the judge advocate who prosecuted him, and that is the important matter in this regard. This lieutenant was an expert telephone man from one of the little cities in the Middle West, I think Crawfordsville, Ind., and was taken because of his expert knowledge, and was sent over there immediately. He was sent over there as a casual officer, without any training, a first lieutenant, and he reported at Tours and was told that he would be assigned to his outfit in a short time, and in the meantime to wait around Tours. Tours was then the headquarters of the Service of Supply Department. I may state that by character he is a rough-and-ready, hail-fellow-well-met man, used to construction work, used to bossing men on the job, and pleasant to everybody. Everybody he met was "Sandy" or "Shorty" or "Bill" or "Curly" or some name of that sort. That evening he went into a café in Tours and saw an enlisted man sitting at a table drinking a bottle of wine, so he clapped the enlisted man on the back and sat down with him, perfectly delighted to meet some decent company. They sat there and had a bottle of wine or so until the café closed, at 9 o'clock, and then two girls came through the room as it was closing and spoke to the enlisted man, whom they knew, and who spoke to them in French, and then the enlisted man turned to the lieutenant and said, "If you want something more to drink, these girls say we can get it around at their rooms." so the lieutenant and the enlisted man went around to the rooms and got some more to drink. The evidence was clear that there was no improper conduct otherwise. Simply they were not through spending the evening yet, and they went around there because the café was closed—in one of the largest hotels in Tours.

The lieutenant was arrested. He had been seen with this enlisted man. There is the suggestion. A certain Maj. Elmore, of the Judge Advocate General's Department, was the prosecutor.

In his address to the court he said—and he represented the Judge Advocate General's Department, of course, in saying it:

If this man had done what he did alone or in company with other officers, he would have been guilty of no offense, and you could well pass it by. Having done what he did in the company of an enlisted man, I insist that dishonorable dismissal from the Army will not be sufficient for him, but that a sentence of imprisonment at hard labor must be added.

And they gave him three years.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And a dishonorable discharge?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; and a dishonorable discharge.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Is that a part of the record?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; and that address is in the record. There were other cases.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Who was this Maj. Elmore? Let us locate him.

Mr. THOMAS. Except that he was Maj. Elmore of the Judge Advocate General's Department, I do not know. Gen. Ansell knows him. I mentioned this incident to Gen. Ansell the other day, and he said, "Oh, yes"——

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. How can we locate the case? Do you know the unit to which he belonged?

Mr. THOMAS. No; he was a casual officer and had no unit. If his name was mentioned to me, so as to bring it to my mind, I would know it. I have racked my brain to try to remember it, but I can not do so.

Senator WARREN. We would prefer that you would deal with cases that you have been personally connected with.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Senator WARREN. Did you have that record?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; from the same person who gave me the O'Hara record.

Senator WARREN. Did you appear in it at all, Mr. Thomas?

Mr. THOMAS. Only after the trial, as his representative to get a mitigation, if possible, of punishment.

Senator WARREN. Before whom?

Mr. THOMAS. That was all done in writing. In that particular case the communications were addressed to Gen. Harboard. I never heard from it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Signed by you?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes. I never heard from it. In our own outfit, which not only meant our own regiment——

Senator WARREN. Before you get to that, tell us about that case, if you know.

Mr. THOMAS. The lieutenant is serving his time, also, at Gievres.

In our own outfit I was selected first as counsel. In our own regiment the first case that I had was a general court-martial, and there again the name has slipped me, although I remember the men very well. This was a court-martial of a man who had gotten into an altercation with an officer, which was nine-tenths the officer's fault. The officer had led him on and harrassed him, and so forth. That was the first case in which I appeared, and I tried the case just as an attorney in civil life would try a case, making as much as I could of the facts, no matter whom they hurt. In that case.

the sentence, I think, was a very reasonable one. The man was sentenced to six months imprisonment and $5 fine, per month, for that period.

Thereafter—and this is the point I want to make as an instance of one of the openings that are now possible, under the present system—thereafter it was impossible in our regiment to get a general court-martial. In general courts-martial a complete record is kept of all the proceedings, the testimony, motions, and so forth—everything that is done. In a special court no record was kept at all except the charges and the findings of the court. After that one case, we never had a general court-martial case.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Why was that?

Mr. THOMAS. I am, of course, now giving my opinion, but in several instances, as counsel for the accused, I demanded general court hearings, and the case was referred to a special court, and in all of those cases, I think without exception, they would pile up the charges in the special court; as, for instance, a man would be absent without leave 24 hours, and they would put one charge in the specifications against him for being absent without leave under the article that prohibits that. Then they would put in another charge in the specifications against him for failing to report for his work, that being covered by another article of war. Then they would put another charge against him, in one instance for disobedience, there having been a general order out that all men must report back when their passes were out. Then the special court would give him six months on each one of those charges and specifications, and make no record of it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. How long a term of imprisonment could a special court give?

Mr. THOMAS. Six months.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Then they would make the punishments cumulative?

Mr. THOMAS. They would make them cumulative. Whether they came under general order from general headquarters, those sentences were all served, not according—

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Were they enforced, as a rule?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir. Now, I am guessing now, but I appeared as counsel in at least 50 and, I think, 100 cases after that general court in which I appeared.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You have not given the names of the men you represented.

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir. I can remember most of their names.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you remember the name of the first party?

Mr. THOMAS. Reynolds, of Company C, One hundred and sixteenth Engineers. Every one of those men was charged with seven or eight charges and specifications for one act.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The Judge Advocate General's Office may want to locate the case.

Mr. THOMAS. All that I can do, Senator, is to give you the names, and in my regiment I think I can give you also the company in each case. I can give you the man's name and the company.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Will you try to furnish the stenographer with the names of these parties you represented?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You can do that, and let him print the names and the units to which they belonged?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir.

Senator WARREN. Who was the colonel of your regiment?

Mr. THOMAS. Burgess, for a time, and during the time I speak of Col. Fowler was in command. Burgess was on detached service somewhere. As I say, a record was kept of general court-martial cases but not of special courts. The trials were all by special courts, of which no record is made.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. No shorthand report?

Mr. THOMAS. No shorthand report, but they would reach the same amount of punishment by charging a man under four or five different Articles of War for the same offense and give him six months on each one; as, for instance, in one instance a man who was absent without leave for 24 hours was charged with being absent without leave and also charged with failing to appear for duty at his proper place under another article with several specifications on it, and in one instance was charged with disobedience, there having been a general order that men would not be allowed to leave camp without proper permits. They would turn that into disobedience of orders. Then they would give him six months on each one of those charges and make them cumulative. After that first case, until I left duty with the regiment I never had, nor could we get, although it was several times demanded, a general court-martial hearing.

Speaking generally, the special courts were extremely arbitrary and autocratic. A man had practically no rights before them at all.

Senator WARREN. Will you give us your opinion as to why that change was made, Mr. Thomas?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; it was generally believed, it was the universal belief, and I think borne out by all the facts, that the men in control, in authority, did not want records of the cases made; did not want the facts taken down or preserved, so that anyone could ever find out what they were.

Senator WARREN. You continued to appear in these cases?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir; I continued to appear until along in August, 1918; and as preliminary to what I have to say now, I would like to put myself in evidence as Exhibit A.

We were up on the English front for five or six months in the spring and early summer of 1918, and came back from the English front to Nevers. About the 1st of July I was in the city of Nevers, our camp being out of the city about 2 miles. I was properly in the city, free from any regulation, at the Red Cross, and was taken with a violent chill, followed by high fever, which afterwards turned out to be a violent case of flu, which was new there, and they did not know as much about it as they found out afterwards.

A lady in the Red Cross put me in a bunk at the Red Cross and the soldier boys looked after me, and the next morning I was even more ill; could not raise my head. The Red Cross lady telephoned to the hospital in the city of Nevers, at the base hospital there, and they sent me for three weeks to the hospital, and then sent me out to the regiment with an order that I was to do no manual labor of any kind and was not to be put to any exposure.

Senator WARREN. You were not subject to drill?

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir; I was to do no manual labor and was not to be subjected to exposure. I was sent from the hospital before I was ready to go because they were so crowded. They needed room for new cases.

Just prior to that the boys of my company, and also I will say, of the other companies of the regiment, had asked me to look into and demand an accounting of the company funds. It was the general supposition, amply supported by the circumstances and such facts as the men were acquainted with, that our company funds had been dissipated by the captain, for their own pleasure.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Was the captain the keeper of the funds?

Mr. THOMAS. The captain was the keeper of the funds. In attempting to get an accounting of these company funds we had no success at all, and it was insisted that some showing be made as to whether it was——

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You were doing that as the representative of the men?

Mr. THOMAS. As their representative, and at the request of the men. We had nearly starved to death when we knew that we had several thousand francs in the company fund that we had no use of at all. On the English front we had been on a very poor English ration when there was plenty of food to be had, but we could get no money out of the captain to buy it.

On my return from the hospital, which was just at the time when we were asking for this accounting, and also at the time when I was busy all the time attending court-martial cases, and doing nothing else, and we were trying three or four a day, when I came back with this order to do no manual work I was immediately put into the kitchen as the permanent kitchen police, that being usually considered as a form of company punishment, and the hardest work that can be required of a man—put there permanently to scrub pans and peel potatoes, working from before breakfast until after dark; did it without complaint; practically did not do it, because I was busy all the time trying these court-martial cases; and anyway, under orders appointing counsel, they had to give me time to do that.

That went on for about six weeks, I still insisting on some action in the matter of the company funds.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. To whom were you making that insistence?

Mr. THOMAS. To the captain.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. To the man who was keeping the funds back?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; and orally had had a talk or two with the regimental commander.

Six weeks after I came back from the hospital we were still trying these cases. We had two special courts going all the time. We had two special courts going at two villages about a couple of miles from each other, and I was going backward and forward all the time from one to the other.

One evening after finishing our trial work, at half past 10 or 11 o'clock at night, the lieutenant who was acting as judge advocate of one of the courts said that he would like to see me, and I went over, and he read me charges against myself for absence without leave during the time that I was in the hospital.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Who read this to you?

Mr. THOMAS. The lieutenant who was acting as judge advocate of one of the courts, Beselius. He told me that I would be tried the next morning at 11 o'clock.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did you see the charge?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; he read the charges to me.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. For the time that you were in the hospital. entirely?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; absent about three weeks, just the time that I had been in the hospital.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. How long was this after you returned from the hospital?

Mr. THOMAS. About six weeks.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And after you had gotten active about the company funds?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes, sir; yes, sir. I raised such a howl about it that Beselius said he would see if he could not get the case postponed for a day and give me a chance to go to Nevers and get the hospital record and the testimony of the lady at the Red Cross; and he did succeed in getting a day's continuance, and I went down to Nevers.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. With leave?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir; the next day. Well, I will say with leave. Not with a formal pass, but with a statement from Beselius that I was going in on court-martial business. I may state in that respect, Senator, there was either an order or it was permitted, so that a counsel in a court-martial had leave, within reason, to prepare his case without a formal pass. I went into Nevers, to the guardhouse in Nevers, and went back to the regiment under guard.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Without seeing the authorities?

Mr. THOMAS. Without any opportunity to get the witnesses. As soon as I got into Nevers I was arrested.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. How far was that from your post?

Mr. THOMAS. About 2 miles.

Senator WARREN. That was not done by any members of your regiment?

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir; I was arrested by the military police; but there had been a 'phone message from my regiment to the guardhouse in Nevers. I do not know whom that came from.

I was arrested just as I was coming out of the Red Cross at Nevers, where I went to see this lady, who was not there, being away for the day. Next morning I was tried. Upon the formal motion, I could make no argument. I was tried anyway.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. By a special court?

Mr. THOMAS. By a special court, without any record except the charges and the findings. I introduced the hospital record immediately on having the charges read, which I had had one of my friends in the company get before it could be destroyed. I introduced the hospital record, showing that I had been in the hospital all this time, and testified fully as to the facts. The only evidence against me was my first sergeant's evidence, that on that day I had gone into Nevers; that evening I was taken sick, and from that evening I did not report to the company until I came back from the hospital.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Which was true?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; which was true. He also testified that when I did come back I came back with a hospital order showing how long I had been there.

I will say that technically I was absent without leave during the time I had been sick at the Red Cross; from that evening until the next day technically I had been absent without leave.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But ill?

Mr. THOMAS. But ill; so ill that I could not hold my head up. However, they found me guilty of absence without leave for the whole time.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. How long?

Mr. THOMAS. About three weeks.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. For how long were you sentenced?

Mr. THOMAS. I was given four months at Gievers, without any fine. That four months is the minimum punishment for which a man was sent to a disciplinary barracks.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Now, will you give the unit to which you were attached at the time of the trial, and the names of the members of the court?

Mr. THOMAS. Company F of the Sixteenth Engineers was my company and regiment. The president of the court was Capt. Magoffin.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He was the keeper of the company funds?

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir; the president of the court was Capt. Magoffin of E Company of the regiment.

The other members of the court were First Lieut. Smith, of F Company; First Lieut. Challoner; and Second Lieut. Paddock. I think that comprised the court. There may have been a fifth member. If there was, it has slipped my mind. Beselius was the judge advocate.

I have been getting a little ahead of my story. At supper time of the day these charges were read to me—Oh, the charges were filed by Capt. Wenzell, of Company F.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He made the charges?

Mr. THOMAS. He made the charges, and he was particularly the man who, we were as morally sure as we could be of anything, had dissipated our company funds.

Senator WARREN. May I ask you there: You belonged to a company. Now, what about the medical men of that service? How many did you have in your regiment?

Mr. THOMAS. Sometimes two and sometimes three.

Senator WARREN. In the regiment?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir.

Senator WARREN. Did they insist upon having no one go to the hospital unless they first sent them, or anything of that kind?

Mr. THOMAS. That was the general regulation. I do not know that that was insisted upon.

Senator WARREN. You said that technically you were guilty of absence without leave? —

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir; technically I should have gone on my company's sick report, reported to the regimental surgeon, and then by him ordered to the hospital. That would have been the regular way of getting into the hospital. In my case that had not been done. I had taken sick in Nevers—extremely sick—very suddenly, and had been sent to the hospital, not through the regular channels.

Senator WARREN. You felt that they took advantage of the technicality?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Senator WARREN. I think that I can see that point now.

Mr. THOMAS. I felt that they were bound to get rid of me anyway.

Senator WARREN. You think it was prejudice because of your defense of various of your comrades?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly; I was just going to enlarge on that, Senator.

The instant that happened, at supper time that same day the charges were laid before me, Col. Fowler sent for me.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The regimental commander?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; and he told me that he was not going to have me take any more of these court-martial cases.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Why?

Mr. THOMAS. He did not say. But then, it was reported that he said he was not going to have his officers subjected to cross-examination that way, and shown up.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. By a private?

Mr. THOMAS. By a private. I said, "One way to keep them from being shown up is to have them"—

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. So far as you know there is nothing in the law to prevent a private from acting as counsel for an accused.

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir; that is true.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He is permitted to act, and so is a civilian, as I understand?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And they are permitted the same privileges on cross-examination that an officer would have?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes. Just the same as any counsel, in that case.

Senator WARREN. I want to get at the action that is differing from the law; wherein there is any difference.

Mr. THOMAS. The colonel told me I could take no more court-martial cases. That was at supper time of the same day that those charges were read to me, later. I told him if he made such an order as that it would be illegal, and a reversal by him of the laws passed for the government of the Army.

Senator WARREN. Now, you say that the sentence of four months imprisonment was the minimum punishment. What did you do during that four months?

Mr. THOMAS. I was at Gievers a part of the time. I was discharged before the four months were up.

Senator WARREN. Why did they discharge you before?

Mr. THOMAS. Well, I think partly because I was an old man, and I had a good prison record, and there was a general supposition at Gievers that it was an outrage to send me there.

Senator WARREN. I can easily understand that; but give us the difference between a disciplinary barracks and a guardhouse, for instance. Of course I know what the differences were when I served, but I want to get at what it is now.

Mr. THOMAS. In a regimental guardhouse a man was among his own friends, and the men over him were his own friends.

Senator WARREN. But he was confined?

Mr. THOMAS. He was confined in the guardhouse. The point was raised there in my case whether, if I was in the guardhouse, they would not even then have to let me appear as counsel if I were demanded by anybody, and the supposition was—it was only a supposition—that they gave me enough to send me away from the regiment, so that I was put clear out of the way.

Senator WARREN. You were confined in the disciplinary barracks the same way as you would have been in the guardhouse?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, certainly; the disciplinary barracks is very much stricter. It is practically a prison.

Senator WARREN. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. As a matter of fact, with me it was not. I was given greater privileges at Gievers than anywhere else in France.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You had no complaint there?

Mr. THOMAS. No complaint at all. I was better treated, and was treated with more consideration, than I was in my own regiment.

Senator WARREN. You say that you were discharged before your time was up. What percentage of the men who go to the disciplinary barracks have to serve out their full time?

Mr. THOMAS. Practically all of them, Senator, over there, so far as I was able to see, in my experience. There were, I think between 600 and 700 men. There were two prisons at Gievers, but in the prison to which I was assigned I think there were between 600 and 700 men, and during the two months or so that I was at Gievers I think one man was not discharged but paroled. He was an expert chauffeur, and the colonel got him to drive his car.

Senator WARREN. I want to see if they differed in their procedure in the disciplinary barracks from what they do here.

Mr. THOMAS. They were not called disciplinary barracks over there. They were called prison camps, and there was no segregation. Men convicted of crime were prisoners just the same and associated with and worked with the prisoners who were convicted of strictly military offenses. There was no segregation of any kind. They had men there serving 99 years, and they had men there awaiting sentence of death.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You felt that you were railroaded there because they wanted to get rid of you as an active defender of enlisted men?

Mr. THOMAS. No question in the world about it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What ever became of the charge of dissipation of the company funds?

Mr. THOMAS. That was the end of it. I might say that within the last few days I met our regimental quartermaster, who is still in the Army, at the Washington Hotel, and who, by the way, was, I think, our most popular officer. He was one of these rough and ready, hail-fellow-well-met men, and the boys called him "Raw Beef Weeks." His name was Weeks.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Col. Weeks?

Mr. THOMAS. No; Maj. Weeks, the Colonel's brother. Maj. Weeks was the most popular officer we had.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Is he now a colonel?

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir; he is a major.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Is he a Regular?

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir; he is a reserve.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Is he out now?

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir; he has gone to San Antonio.

Senator WARREN. He is a lieutenant colonel?

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir; he is a major.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I would like to go back to this company business. Who was the captain?

Mr. THOMAS. Wenzell.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Was anything ever done with him?

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Was the fund ever accounted for?

Mr. THOMAS. Maj. Weeks told me at the Washington Hotel the other day—the only information I ever got of it—that it was a part of his duty to audit those funds when the regiment was demobilized, and that he told those captains they would have to get vouchers, and they did get vouchers of a sort; that in the rush of work he passed them, but he was very much surprised that they had passed when they got to Washington. However, he said so far as he knew no trouble was ever made about it.

I will state, however, on my own responsibility, that in April, and from then following until I went to Gievers in August, the company fund of F Company was either entirely dissipated or short.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is another captain?

Mr. THOMAS. No; that is the captain of my company—Wenzell.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He kept both?

Mr. THOMAS. No; he had simply the funds of F Company.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, yes.

Mr. THOMAS. Whatever his final accounting may have been, I am willing to state on my responsibility that the fund was not intact from April 18 to August 18.

Senator WARREN. How do you account for his passing the audit?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, he might make it up, or he might turn in any sort of vouchers. That is no very great trouble. No very strenuous accounting was ever made of those funds.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Was Wenzell a regular officer?

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir; a reserve officer.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Is he out?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Demobilized?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Promoted?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. To what rank?

Mr. THOMAS. Major.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He was a captain in the line?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; he was a captain, and was promoted to major about the 1st of September, 1918.

Senator WARREN. That name sounds familiar. Can you tell me where he went from?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; from Detroit. He is a young man, himself, but his father and his uncle are consulting engineers in Detroit—Wenzell & Bro. or Wenzell & Co.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Has your record in the Army been good?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir; with one exception. I had been operated on in the winter of 1917 for hemorrhoids.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In France?

Mr. THOMAS. In France; and I had been returned again because of the crowding of the hospital before I was healed up, and there, again, I was returned to the regiment with an order to do no work until I was perfectly healed. The regimental surgeon marked me "duty."

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Marked you for duty?

Mr. THOMAS. For full duty immediately, which was very hard at that time. We were in camp in the rain and snow and sleet and mud and on low rations, and I was in very poor condition and was very sore—could not stoop over.

Senator WARREN. Speaking of rations, were you in the American forces all the way up, or in the forces that served with the British and French?

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir; we were by ourselves at Is-sur-cille. At that time the men had broken down badly from overwork, and the sick report was very large. I should suppose that 33 per cent of the men were on sick report every morning, and the doctors were quite generally marking everybody "duty," and they marked me along with the rest.

The second day after I got back I went down to the village and rented a room, after objecting to being marked "duty," and having been marked "duty," and I think I was four days, or something like that, there.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Absent without leave?

Mr. THOMAS. Absent without leave, sick; and I was fined $10 for that.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Not imprisoned?

Mr. THOMAS. Not imprisoned.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That was the only blemish on your record?

Mr. THOMAS. That was the only blemish on my record; and the circumstances were well understood. As I say, I think my punishment was $11, one-third of one month's pay.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did you establish a reputation, during your employment as counsel for the soldiers, as being a busy-body and a trouble breeder?

Mr. THOMAS. No; just the reverse, Senator. I tried to be just the reverse, and I think I was. I think I had the reputation of being one of the most punctilious soldiers in the regiment, so far as courtesy towards officers went, and I had the reputation, I am quite sure, among the men, of being oil on the waters, rather than a disturbing element.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What is your complaint, if any, against the court-martial system, and what suggestion have you to make about it?

Mr. THOMAS. In the first place, speaking as a lawyer, we who are engaged in practice in civil life overlook the fact, or are very apt to overlook the fact, that the administration of justice is something that requires a considerable amount of training. Even where we are trying cases before a poor judge or where we have a poor or inexperienced lawyer on the other side, they know a great deal about their profession. It is astounding, and one who has not had the experience would not believe, how utterly foolish and how utterly incompetent even intelligent men are who have had no experience in the administration of justice or in the trial of cases. If it were not so pathetic, it would be ridiculous. They have no conception whatever of the requisites necessary to fairly try a case or to render anything like a just decision.

The most outstanding fact is that all courts-martial, practically without exception, were treated as personal matters.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In the Army?

Mr. THOMAS. In the Army. The very fact that some officer put charges against a man was sufficient to have that man convicted.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. By his fellow officers?

Mr. THOMAS. By his fellow officers. It was a personal matter for him, and the whole case reeked with personal prejudice, from start to finish. It made no difference what the evidence was, it made no difference what the law was, the question was that some officer had preferred charges against a man and wanted to see him cinched, and that the court was there for the purpose of cinching him.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did they make a complete record of the evidence at the trial?

Mr. THOMAS. Only in general courts-martial.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did they make a pretty good record there?

Mr. THOMAS. No; it was always difficult there, Senator; not on account of the fault of the court, but because it was very difficult to get a competent stenographer.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In the summary courts they made no record?

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir. One of the gravest sources of injustice and one which irritated the men the most and which probably enhanced the irritable feeling of the men as much as anything else was the numerous instances in which men were kept the full limit of 40 days in the guardhouse and then were tried by summary court and given very trivial punishments.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is, they were kept 40 days before trial?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; before trial; and I was going to suggest that the bill S. 64 is deficient in that regard. It makes no provision; and I believe it would be a good thing and would lead to better discipline and more satisfaction all around with the system if the Articles of War themselves specified that all minor offenses—specifying what they should be, for instance, absence without leave for 36 hours, and other minor derelictions—shall be punished by a summary court and hearings shall be held within 48 hours.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And not keep men for days in prison?

Mr. THOMAS. As it now stands—and that is the old plan also—charges are filed, then investigated, and then the commanding officer orders what class of court shall try them, whether summary or special or general.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And in the meantime the man is in prison.

Mr. THOMAS. In the meantime the man is in the guardhouse all the time.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And after the trial, then he is often sent up for a few days only?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; or only fined. There were many instances of men being in the guardhouse a month for some little bit of a trivial thing that they were fined $5 for.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is pretty generally the case?

Mr. THOMAS. That is universally the case. Speaking now from recollection, I do not know of any case that was tried in less than 20 days. In the meantime the man is in the guardhouse.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Have you any suggestion to make with reference to the proper representation of the accused by counsel? Is the system that is now in vogue all right?

Mr. THOMAS. It is. It is a case of administration, Senator. The system now in vogue permits a man to be represented by counsel of his own choice, making no distinction as to an enlisted man and an officer. It brings the accused before a special or a general court, and he can choose his own counsel.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Is that carried out?

Mr. THOMAS. In my instance it was carried out until they railroaded me; but under the present system there are always those opportunities for railroading if they want to get rid of a man. It is a very, very difficult proposition. There is no question that an officer must have practically unlimited authority to be used in emergencies. There is no question that in the American Army, at least, it is only necessary to use that authority once in a hundred years. The truth of the matter is that in my judgment, at least, and in the judgment of most of those with whom I was thrown in contact, the officers were a hampering element and not a helping element.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In what respect?

Mr. THOMAS. Our regiment was a very efficient engineering unit, a unit; and very proficient, very efficient. The men were from the class who knew how to do almost anything. I was continually surprised at their efficiency in the field. No matter what was required, whether it was railroad construction, engineering, surveying—anything that was necessary—we had men that knew exactly how to do it. There was this Federal base which was one of the largest supply bases built by the United States in France, involving some 150 or 160 warehouses each some 150 by 60, with all the roads and trackage and water system and electric lights and everything necessary to make it complete, and as complete a system as a railroad terminal for a city of three or four hundred thousand people would be. That was practically all done from start to finish, from top to bottom, by the enlisted men, and in nine cases out of ten when the officer interfered with an order he mixed it up. The men who were expert at the various branches would hold meetings, and I never saw men so interested in their work as they were. They would hold meetings among themselves, informal conferences, and lay out the work among themselves, plan it, and do it themselves. The officers would simply walk up and down on the work occasionally, showing themselves.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. They were not experts in the work?

Mr. THOMAS. Many of them did not know anything at all about it. There were rock cuts; there was tunneling work. In one instance an officer did interfere and blow up two men. One thousand pounds of black powder went off prematurely and blew a lot of fellows up.

The enlisted personnel were practical and efficient men at that work, and it was all done on their initiative from the surveying to the actual pick-and-shovel work.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Now, we are getting away from the line of the hearing. What other suggestions have you to make?

Mr. THOMAS. A suggestion as to double charges. I think there should be a provision in the bill prohibiting the filing of more than one charge against a man for only one act.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is, not charging him with desertion and being away without leave and with disobedience of an order, all involving one act?

Mr. THOMAS. All involving the same act. That was one of the great sources of injustice, I think; but the two most outstanding, and the two to rankle in the men the most, were those two cases—the delay in the summary court hearing for a trivial offense, the long time spent in the guardhouse waiting, and the fact that a man for a comparatively slight single offense or act of omission would be charged under half a dozen different charges and receive a sentence of six months for each one.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did you not find that the judge advocate who represented the prosecution and the court does, as a rule, know little, if anything, about the law?

Mr. THOMAS. Nothing whatever, sir. As I said before, it would have been ridiculous if it had not been so pathetic.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you think there ought to have been some man there as the legal adviser of the court, at the trial, who understood law?

Mr. THOMAS. Unquestionably. As I said before, the administration of even the simplest forms of justice is a highly technical matter that it requires trained men to administer.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is the British system?

Mr. THOMAS. I may say that I voice the opinion of the enlisted personnel, I am sure, in stating that their preference would be for an expert outside court that had no connection whatever with the Army.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did you know any cases where a verdict of acquittal was rendered and was then disapproved of by the commanding officer—and a retrial of the case ordered?

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir. I knew of many cases where disapproval by the reviewing authority was had. I knew of only one case where there was a reduction of sentence by the reviewing authority, and that was made by Gen. Patrick. A man in our regiment named Ronan had received a dishonorable discharge and had been sentenced to 15 years, and Gen. Patrick cut that down to 6 months, with a sharp reprimand; with a statement to the court stating that evidently no member of the court had any conception of rendering military justice and that it had shown personal prejudice all through the case. I may say that was the first general case we had.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Was this Gen. Patrick in charge of aviation?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; he was in charge of aviation; and I may say that that was in the early days, and that that policy was reversed very shortly after that.

In every other instance that I saw except one, if any comment was made by the reviewing authority it was that the punishment was not sufficient.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. They did not reverse it?

Mr. THOMAS. They did not reverse them. We had one boy in our regiment that was tried for disobedience, with every excuse for the disobedience. He was an ignorant sort of a boy and there was a general order that engineers should not be drilled, and he was ordered by the first sergeant to do extra drill as a punishment, after working hours in the evening, and he refused. The captain sent for him and ordered him to obey, and he still refused, relying on this general order, and he was tried and was given one year in Gievres without any fine. He was a harmless, pleasant boy, and the court very rightly took the view that he thought he was right. In that case the reviewing authorities reprimanded the court for their leniency.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. For their leniency?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I know one other case in which the man ought not to have been tried at all, in which a sentence of dishonorable discharge and 20 years was cut down to 5 years and dishonorable discharge.

Senator WARREN. To revert for a moment to your statement that there should be a law that these cases should be tried within 48 hours, would you have any elasticity in case of engagements going on or because of movements of troops, where it would be almost impossible to get a court-martial? Do you think it is necessary to have any elasticity in that direction?

Mr. THOMAS. It is not necessary to have any summary courts when the American Army is not——

Senator WARREN. I meant about the 48-hour provision; whether that would be mandatory in all cases.

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir; it certainly ought not to be mandatory in action at the front. As a matter of fact, I never knew of any charges being preferred at the front. If a man committed any misconduct there, they waited until they got back to a rest area before the charges were filed. There are no guardhouses; there is no provision for guarding men or anything of that sort. The conditions would be so different.

Senator WARREN. As it is now, it is with the commanding officer how long they shall wait before trial, is it not? There is no law on it?

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir; the law provides that the man shall be served with the charges within 8 days after they are preferred.

Senator WARREN. I am speaking of the trial itself and his incarceration in the guardhouse.

Mr. THOMAS. Under the law he may be kept 40 days—10 days within which to serve the charges and 30 days thereafter.

Senator WARREN. Under the law, within how short a time can they perform those functions.

Mr. THOMAS. A man has three days after the charges are served on him, if he demands it, to prepare his trial.

Senator WARREN. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. So that a man could be arrested to-day and tried on the fourth day if the charges were immediately served upon him.

Senator WARREN. Nothing would hinder it?

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir.

Senator WARREN. And if he did not ask for a delay there is nothing to hinder it at once?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir; but, as a matter of fact, in practice it always works the other way. Courts are never ready to hear him until the last minute. The man is always anxious for his trial and can never get it until the last minute.

Senator WARREN. You proposed some legislation, and I wanted to get your idea about that. You would say that a man must be tried in 48 hours after he exhausted his time if he wished to exhaust it?

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir; you did not quite understand me, Senator. I said it would be a good plan in order to overcome the injustice of letting a man stay a long time in prison awaiting trial for trivial offenses, that the bill itself should specify what are minor offenses that shall be taken cognizance of by a summary court, and that whenever a man is guilty of one of those minor offenses he be tried by a summary court without investigation.

Senator WARREN. You speak about when he is guilty. That would only transpire after the trial.

Mr. THOMAS. When he is charged with being guilty, I should say, of one of these minor offenses he ought to be then tried by a summary court within 48 hours after his arrest.

Senator WARREN. How about the three days that he has? Would you cut those out?

Mr. THOMAS. He would not need those for a summary court. I have never known a man who ever demanded any delay. They are always ready for a trial if they can get one.

Senator WARREN. I agree with you about the desirability of quick action.

Mr. THOMAS. In the event that the case is serious enough to involve trial by a general or a special court-martial the judge advocate or the prosecution ought to be given time enough, and there are many cases in which the full 40 days would be necessary to prepare the case; in serious cases in which witnesses have moved around I can well see where it would take the full 40 days to prepare the prosecution's part of the case. But there is no reason why minor offenses should not be all tried in a summary court without investigation and why they should not have an immediate hearing on it.

Also, as I said on the other point, I think there should be a provision prohibiting charging a man under several specifications for one act or omission; that the prosecution should select what article they want to charge him under for any one particular act, and then be restricted to charging him under that act.

I have one other matter that I want to present to the committee. I was at the hospital at Savenay in France, and in the ward across the hall from me was a private, Paul B. Smith, in ward A 22, of Base Hospital No. 8. He was in Company C of the Twenty-seventh Engineers. He was wounded on August 21, 1918, at Chateau-Thierry, and practically all the flesh of his right leg from the knee to the thigh was stripped off. In addition to that the tendons across his foot and ankle were torn by a piece of explosive shell so that his leg was worse than useless to him. He was getting around on crutches, but the leg simply dragged. He had been wounded in August. This was in January. He was up and dressed. They had a rule at the hospital that every man who had his clothes and got up should have his bed made and stand at attention at the foot of his bunk with his things all in order for morning inspection at 7.30 by the ward surgeon.

One morning this Smith, with the help of the other boys in the hospital, made his bed, as he did every morning, and the word was sent around for inspection, and after standing at attention for quite a while at the foot of his bunk Smith lay down on his bed, and within a half an hour or so the nurse orderly came running into the ward and warned everybody to stand at attention, that here came the inspecting officers, and that nurse saw Smith getting off his bed, and he said, "Smith, you make that bed up again right away. You have no business to lie down on it until after inspection." He said, "No; I can not make it up. My leg is hurting me very badly." They had quite an altercation, and that was going on when the surgeon came in. He asked what the trouble was, and the nurse told him. Without evidence, without any charges being filed or any proceeding of any kind, the following order was served on Smith:

HOSPITAL ORDER }
HC 8. }

BASE HOSPITAL No. 8,
January 17, 1919.

1. Pvt. Paul B. Smith, Ward A 22, Base Hospital No. 8, will be confined to the guardhouse for a period of seven days and assigned to hard labor, for refusing to work in his ward except on orders from the ward surgeon himself.

By order of Lieut. Col. Estille, C. O., Base Hospital No. 8.

[SEAL.]

C. G. PAYSON,

First Lieutenant, Sanitary Corps, Adjutant.

(Lieut. Payson, Surgeon A 22, A. P. M., C. O. Hosp. Guard, Reg. file.)

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did you know the man?

Mr. THOMAS. I was there at the time and saw the whole thing.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Who signed that?

Mr. THOMAS. This is a copy which he wrote from my dictation and which I compared with the original order. This is one of the papers I got after I had lost my other papers.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. How long was he kept there in the guardhouse?

Mr. THOMAS. He was kept there the full seven days. He has written on the back of this sheet of paper his own brief history. [Reading:]

Pvt. first class Paul B. Smith, Company C, 27th Engineers, was wounded in action at Chateau-Thierry front on August 21, 1918, high explosive shell penetrating right thigh inflicting a wound 9 inches long, another piece of shell entering right leg, causing ant. fibrol paralysis of the foot; can walk with crutches; refused to make the bed all over after making it once, when told to do so by a ward nurse, Miss Smith.

Pvt. Paul B. Smith, residence, Bisbee, Ariz., enlisted in San Francisco, Calif., April 5, 1918, arrived at the front July 17, 1918, and was put out of action August 21, 1918.

This man is about 35 years old.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He was tried by a court-martial?

Mr. THOMAS. No; he was tried by nothing.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Was there any authority for that?

Mr. THOMAS. Nothing in the world. It was the clearest case of false imprisonment. That is simply typical of the mental attitude.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Who is the lieutenant colonel?

Mr. THOMAS. Lieut. Col. Estille, commanding officer, Base Hospital 8. This is also signed by C. G. Payson, first lieutenant, Sanitary Corps, adjutant. Those are the officers whose names are on the order.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did you see him in the hospital?

Mr. THOMAS. I saw him in the hospital, and saw him taken to the guardhouse. He came to me immediately after he got out for advice.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What became of the man?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not know. He was still in the hospital.

Senator WARREN. What was his condition when he came home?

Mr. THOMAS. It could never be improved.

Senator WARREN. What was the difference in his condition when he went into the guardhouse and when he came back?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, he was practically as well, because the boys of the guard favored him every way they could—against orders, but of course they could get by with it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What was the condition of his leg?

Mr. THOMAS. It was worse than if it had been cut off. It was simply dragging.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. His condition was prevented from deterioration by the men at the guardhouse?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes. He could do no more work—and he had not entirely recovered from the shock. He was still pale and wan.

In addition to the permanent crippling, he was still a sick man.

Senator WARREN. Is that all, Senator Chamberlain, that you want to ask him?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I have nothing further.

Senator WARREN. I have nothing.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have one or two witnesses called. Unless the Secretary of War shall desire to have some called, there are only two or three other witnesses that I know of that I care to have the committee hear. May I give you their names?

Senator WARREN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Col. E. M. Morgan, of Yale College, Maj. Roger Hull, of New York City, and Mr. J. B. W. Gardiner, of No. 18 East Forty-first Street, New York City.

I think those are the only witnesses I care to have examined until after the Secretary of War submits the names of such witnesses as he wants to appear.

(Thereupon, at 12.30 o'clock p. m., the subcommittee adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, September 3, 1919, at 10 o'clock a. m.)

ESTABLISHMENT OF MILITARY JUSTICE—PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF THE ARTICLES OF WAR.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 3, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to adjournment, in the room of the Committee on Appropriations in the Capitol, at 2 o'clock p. m., Senator Francis E. Warren presiding.

Present: Senators Warren (chairman) and Chamberlain.

Senator WARREN. I may say, before proceeding with this hearing, that the other member of the subcommittee, Mr. Lenroot, is engaged in the debate now going on in the Senate on the oil-land leasing bill, and asked us to proceed without him, saying that he would come in if he could later on. We have with us to-day Maj. Gen. O'Ryan, and we will hear him now.

STATEMENT OF MAJ. GEN. JOHN F. O'RYAN, COMMANDING THE NEW YORK NATIONAL GUARD DIVISION, FORMERLY THE TWENTY-SEVENTH DIVISION.

Senator WARREN. Gen. O'Ryan, we have before the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate the so-called Chamberlain bill, which provides for an entire rearrangement of the Articles of War, and we wish to have you tell us, after your experience in France and your subsequent service as a member of a special War Department board, what you consider necessary in the way of a change in the Articles of War as they stand to-day, with reference, as you go along, to the bill now before the Senate.

Gen. O'RYAN. My views are contained in the report of the so-called Kernan Board, a copy of which report I think your committee has. This report really consists of two parts. The first part is a general discussion of the subject, while the second part takes up in detail, article after article, the so-called Articles of War.

Under each numbered article we have set forth the article of war as it exists at the present time and the article of war as we propose it, and under each of the articles so arranged we have set forth comment, giving the reasons for the changes proposed; or, where changes were not suggested, why we think the article should remain unamended.

The only thing I think I can add, in a general way, to the general statement which constitutes part 1 of the report, is a view of the entire subject based not only upon study, but more particularly upon observations of discipline, or rather observations affecting the subject of discipline, made during the war.

I think that by those who were distant from the atmosphere of battle, perhaps too much stress has been laid upon the importance of the procedure of military courts. The object of courts in an army, especially during time of war, is mainly to deter the mass of the soldiers from the commission of offenses which have brought some of the soldiers to trial. I think, to appreciate the importance of this subject, it is necessary to reflect upon the influences which determine the conduct of soldiers in battle. These influences are the hope of reward, the stimulation of emotions of patriotism, pride, gang spirit, dependability of character; but underneath all of those influences there must be the strong arm of compulsion to move an element which exists in every army. Fortunately, I think that the American Army had but a small percentage of men who might be classed as undependable in battle; but nevertheless every army possesses such an element, in the same way that every army possesses an element of men who are hardly human in relation to their bravery and recklessness. The mass of soldiers are the subjects of ready leading, either in one direction or the other, and the skill of the commander is largely determined by the manner in which he suppresses one element and exploits the influence of the other.

In this work of leadership it is necessary that the commander should have at his command a summary procedure to bring to sharp accountability those who willfully or negligently fail in their duty in times of critical importance. I say that this point, I think, is so important, and it is so peculiar to the conditions which affect an army in the field that it is one apt to be overlooked in time of peace.

SENATOR WARREN. Without wishing to interrupt, let me say that I should be glad if, before you finish, you would portray, in your own good way, the differences in time of peace and in time of war.

GEN. O'RYAN. In attempting to answer the Senator's question, it is with diffidence, I think, that any commander will speak of that element of his command which is constituted of the men who are organically undependable. Nevertheless, they exist in all armies, and we had them in the American Expeditionary Forces.

In considering the conduct of such men, I think that form of misdemeanor which affected the discipline and morale of the Army more than any other was the conduct which prompted the soldier to quit in action, to shirk his battle duties, or in anticipation of battle to leave his command, not for the purpose of deserting the Army but for the purpose of avoiding battle by going absent without leave. In other words, we found that a man who went absent without leave in anticipation of a battle was as much a demoralizing influence upon the Army as was the man who actually deserted.

Now, if the punishment of these men who went absent without leave were dependent upon a court bound by such procedure as is proposed in the new bill, the delinquents would, I think, in many cases go without punishment, for the reason that during the battle period it would be impracticable—physically impracticable—for ~~that~~ concerned in the convening and conduct of courts-martial to ~~provide~~ the court prescribed and to carry out the procedure proposed.

The one thing, I think, that affects an army in battle more than anything else is fatigue, loss of sleep, and the fewer unnecessary duties there are imposed upon officers and men the more will the vigor and energy of the force be conserved. By that I mean that if officers during battle are to be required to constitute courts-martial for the purpose of trying men, the procedure should be as simple and as expeditious as practicable, so that they may be promptly relieved of duty and returned to their normal functions.

My recollection is that the proposed bill provides, in effect, that the court shall constitute a jury, while the staff judge advocate plays the rôle of judge.

It is also provided, I think, that enlisted men shall constitute a part of the membership of the court. In our report we have covered our views concerning this proposal, but in a general way I think that the objections to the proposed system are based upon the military man's knowledge of the need for summary action in disposing of cases based upon negligence and willfulness under battle conditions.

Senator WARREN. With relation to private soldiers, enlisted men, serving as members of courts in trials of enlisted men and noncommissioned officers, what is your judgment as to the views of the men themselves, as to whether it would be desired by the enlisted force, or whether they would prefer to have it the way it is at present, being tried by all commissioned officers?

Gen. O'RYAN. I think I can answer that; I know I can answer that positively in my own division. The men were satisfied with the system of courts-martial as practiced in the division, and I have a strong impression that the same view existed throughout the Guard divisions and the Regular Army divisions. In other words, that the men would not care for and do not seek the opportunity to serve on courts.

The phase of this subject that appealed to me most is this: Membership on a court implies that the officer detailed possesses experience, judgment, impartiality, and knowledge of the requirements and needs of the military service at the time. Now, under our democratic system it is the fact that in war our officers come from the ranks, and necessarily they are those in the ranks, or were those in the ranks, most fitted by education and other qualifications to become officers. Hence, if we put enlisted men on courts, we go into that class of the Army—knowingly go into it—where are to be found those least qualified in relation to these qualities to perform the functions of officers detailed to courts.

Then, I think, too, were enlisted men to be detailed as members of courts, it would be unfortunate in a disciplinary way. I think that their comrades would ask them how they and how the officers on the court voted, and I do not think that would be in the interest of discipline.

Senator WARREN. Would the likes and dislikes of the enlisted men, as they associate together, unduly influence, do you think, their judgment while serving on a court?

Gen. O'RYAN. Well, Senator, I think that would vary materially. In time of war, particularly, there is such a large percentage of enlisted men with a high sense of responsibility that as to those men I am quite sure they would not be influenced.

Senator WARREN. I am speaking, of course, of what is to come rather more than of what is past.

Gen. O'RYAN. Oh, yes.

Senator WARREN. That is to say, I am speaking of our Army as it will be constituted; and, as we hope that in time of peace we shall always be prepared for war, I am speaking of our Army, as it will be in peace.

Gen. O'RYAN. I think it can be fairly stated that the danger would be greater in relation to enlisted men than it would be in relation to officers. Their mean period of service is much shorter; their experience is less. Their characters are less developed as the result of less training, less years of life, less experience, and less education.

Senator WARREN. Has your division, for instance, experienced any difficulty, and if so how much difficulty, in procuring officers for service on courts-martial who are qualified? Has there been a large percentage or a small percentage of unfit officers charged with the duty of serving on courts-martial—who have been unduly severe, and so forth, or inefficient? Have you been compelled to take any large percentage from those coming in from civil life, among whom there have been officers by education and practice unfit for that service? What is your idea about that? Is there a large percentage or not, and is that cared for generally in the selection of courts?

Gen. O'RYAN. Court-martial work, I think, is considered by the average officer as disagreeable work. That is the first thing.

The next thing is that many officers consider it of less importance than the work that they happen to be doing, and based rather upon the second idea than the first, do many officers apply informally to the judge advocate to be taken off the list of officers available for court-martial work. Naturally, to some extent, these requests influence the judge advocate in making his recommendations to the chief of staff. I should say that a very small percentage of officers were unfit or undesirable for this service. When they were found to be unsuited, it was the practice for the trial judge advocate or for the president of the court to report the fact to the chief of staff and recommend that the officer in question be relieved.

Senator WARREN. You speak of the chief of staff. You mean the chief of staff of the division?

Gen. O'RYAN. Of the division; yes, sir.

Senator WARREN. Or of the brigade?

Gen. O'RYAN. Of the division. Now, getting right down to the details of the thing, my practice was this. I was concerned with securing for each court a president of the court whom I knew personally to be an officer of responsibility, who would supervise the administration of justice, who would permit no wasting of time, and who is known to be a good soldier. Occasionally our situation was such that I found it to be unwise to appoint as the president of a court the officer who was my first choice, and I thereupon took another. So I would say that all of the courts in our division were well administered, largely as the result of the good teamwork between two very efficient men, one the president of the court and the other the trial judge advocate.

Senator WARREN. General, I do not want to interrupt the even course of your testimony, but let me say this: There has been a great deal of complaint that court-martial proceedings and findings have been very strict, and of course there have been some instances cited before the Committee on Military Affairs as a whole, and elsewhere, that have seemed absolutely inhuman. I think that we should like to know from you what your observation has been, not only in your division but otherwise, and whether those instances are exceptions and whether they are extremely rare, or whether they are common occurrences; so as one may say, to get down to practical business. That, I think, is what the subcommittee and the general Committee of Military Affairs would like to know. They would like to know what of these reports we can accept as being of general application and as indicating the general attitude of Army officers on these courts, and whether, taking it by and large, the men of our Army as a whole have suffered tremendously—more than the exigencies of the case would require.

Of course, as to this matter of enlisted men serving on courts, which is a matter on which there is such strong division of opinion with people who are advocating change, I would also like, somewhere in your remarks, to have you state what your opinion is and what would be your advice about some final court, you might say outside the Army, a civil court, or if within the Army, appointed from civil life and appointed for that purpose and no other. You catch my idea, do you?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes, sir; I think so. When our troops were mobilized and the general plan for the organization of the big Army was understood, I think that a great many officers were rather appalled by the prospect of having so many men without military training brought into the service; that is to say, they were appalled by the prospect of handling them, disciplining them, and training them, and I think that many of them, from what I have heard in conversation with them at the time and since, made up their minds that in relation to offenses committed by those men, after warning and after a reasonable degree of training, they would send them before a court that would punish them in a way that would terrorize them—I use the word, I think, advisedly—or not so much terrorize them as terrorize the rest of the men on duty at that camp; at the same time, however, recognizing the fact that these sentences would perhaps be modified by the division commanders, or where they were not, or where they were attempted to be carried out in full, would after a reasonable time had elapsed, or perhaps after the conclusion of the war, be in part or wholly remitted. I think that the officers who served on military courts, and the division commanders who reviewed the convictions which resulted in these long sentences, all understood that no mature men in or out of the Army would seriously expect these sentences to be carried out; but that the men who constituted the Army were young, many of them unsophisticated in regard to military matters at least, that they did not know very much, if anything, about military courts or military justice; that they had an idea that the Army in time of war punished practically as it pleased. When stern sentences were handed out, I think that they had a very beneficial effect in those cases where the sentence was not so extraordinarily severe as to give the impression that it was unjust or perhaps even inhuman.

Senator WARREN. You say, though, these cases all went to division commanders?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes, sir; all cases within the division, of general courts-martial, had to be approved by the division commander.

Senator WARREN. All general courts-martial?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes, sir. The point I am making is that I think the officers of all the divisions and commands in the Army who were parties to the imposition of these long sentences had no idea that they would be carried out completely. The object was to give an example of the severity of military courts and military discipline to the newcomers, for the purpose of exercising a strong deterrent influence upon them.

Senator WARREN. You mean by conveying the impression that such sentences might at any time be declared, and that any of them for similar offenses might be similarly punished at any time thereafter?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator WARREN. I noticed from an examination of your report that it touched slightly upon the matter of the difference between a court-martial and a civil court of justice in that in the civil court all the evidence and surrounding circumstances were considered, and all the feeling in regard to the case was as to the particular offense of that particular occasion.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator WARREN. Whereas—and I think a member of your committee rather supported the idea—in court-martial cases and in war times there might be a difference, and sometimes almost an extreme difference, in the punishment inflicted for the same crime or misdemeanor, because of former indiscretions or former disobedience of the parties being tried. Perhaps you can tell us more about that. In other words, the character of the man and the character of his work that has been done before are in the minds of the court, as well as, in particular, that he is guilty of the offense in the charge.

Gen. O'RYAN. As to how much the character of the accused and his past performances affect the consideration by the court?

Senator WARREN. Yes. His character and his performances in the past.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes. Now, I find it difficult, Senator, to answer that question, because throughout the war I, naturally, being a division commander, never served on a court. My functions were to review the findings of the courts. Applying that question to myself, I always, in reviewing the findings of a court, had before me the record of the soldier from the time he entered the service, and considered that.

Senator WARREN. You reviewed the entire record of the soldier?

Gen. O'RYAN. As well as the typewritten record, the stenographic notes, of the testimony.

We made, in our report, one point that I think is important. I think it was Gen. Ansell who called attention to the great dissimilarity of sentences for the same offense in our Army, his argument being, apparently, if for example you justify in one division a three months' sentence for an offense, then you can not justify a 30-year sentence for the identical offense in another division; one is right and the other is wrong. I think we pointed out—and I am still of the same opinion—that that argument is not sound, and it illustrates the purpose of military courts. Their function is more to deter others in relation to problems that affect the particular division. For example, I can well conceive of justice being done in two cases in one of which a soldier in one division is sentenced to six months' confinement for an offense and in another division another soldier gets 10 years for the identical offense. I am of that opinion because I can conceive that in the first division mentioned the soldier has been guilty of an offense which constitutes, in relation to the discipline of that command, no problem whatever. For example, in that division the record may show that out of 25,000 men only one-half of 1 per cent have gone absent without leave during a long period of battle. The soldier charged with the commission of that offense puts in his plea. He has had a good record, and the court in determining his sentence is in that particular case uninfluenced by any problems affecting this division in relation to its discipline and morale. It is for the court a matter entirely of exact justice between the military law of the country and the individual soldier concerned, and so they take into consideration his former record, the character of the offense, the fact that operations have not been influenced by absences of personnel. They warn him and sentence him to six months' confinement.

In the other division, however, instead of one-half of 1 per cent only being absent without leave during a long battle period, we will assume that 7 per cent of the men were absent without leave. We will assume that in a previous battle 4 per cent were absent without leave and in a battle before that 3 per cent were absent without leave. In other words, the curse of absenteeism has been growing in that division. After the last battle perhaps the division commander has warned every man in his division that examples would be made of the next offenders. Now, a man in this division comes up for trial, and although the cause of his absence is almost identical with that in the case of the other soldier of another division, yet this court may, in the execution of justice toward the soldier and toward the Army as well in that important time, sentence that man to 10 years' confinement for his very serious offense, leaving it to some higher authority at some subsequent time, if the interests of the Army make it desirable, to remit the whole or a part of that sentence.

I think that those examples illustrate conditions that exist in an army and do not exist so forcibly, at least, in relation to the administration of criminal law in civil life.

Senator WARREN. That explanation brings out further the matter that I alluded to that is in the report. Without the remission of sentences and the shortening of the time, what percentage, approximately, generally speaking, not of your division but so far as your observation goes—we will take matters in France in the Army that was there for action—what percentage have had any such in the way of shortening of time or remission of sentence? That is, is it a large percentage or only trifling—I mean over there, before coming back to this side?

Gen. O'RYAN. I had a rather peculiar condition in my division. I early realized the inadequacy of our courts—that is, our existing courts—in relation to the offense of absenteeism during operations. I did not wait to have conditions develop which might be difficult to cope with later. We handled these men by trying them summarily and sentencing them to very short terms, but these terms to be served by confinement with the organizations at hard labor, and the hard labor to be performed—and the division was notified of the character of that labor—in the front line, and in the way of working parties against the enemy. These men began to get killed and wounded, and the result was that it stopped absence without leave during battle periods.

Senator WARREN. You put them in to perform labor where they had to submit themselves to the same risk of danger from the enemy as if they were in the ranks?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes, they did; and they had more risk, because they were kept at it after their own outfit was relieved.

Senator WARREN. Your division was a fully formed division before you left here—that is, from your own State—was it not?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes, sir.

Senator WARREN. And it was what might be termed a National-Guard division entire?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes, sir.

Senator WARREN. Was there any great percentage added of drafted men?

Gen. O'RYAN. No, sir; we received no replacements until after the armistice, until after the fighting was over.

Senator WARREN. All of your maneuvers and battles were with the division formed here from the National Guard, and it continued as such with the National Guard officers, altogether, did it?

Gen. O'RYAN. No; we had one small draft of about several hundred men that we received just as we left for France. They were draft men received from Camp Upton, Long Island.

As to the officers, they were, in the main, officers who had been in the division—that is, in the New York division—for years; the field officers and most of the company officers. In relation to the lieutenants, higher authority transferred some lieutenants from other divisions, and in cases where lieutenants were promoted in our division we received some lieutenants from other divisions or from training camps.

Senator WARREN. Did you have, under the old law, any Regular Army officers sent to the division, to conform to the requirement of the laws—that is, the laws that we have had at times, and which I think exist now, do they not, Senator Chamberlain—that they must, in these National Guard organizations, have some officers of the Regular Army?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; they are assigned for training.

Gen. O'RYAN. Do you mean the inspector-instructors that we have had in times of peace?

Senator WARREN. Yes; you had some of them, too.

Gen. O'RYAN. No; we had none after the mobilization in this war. We had no special instructors.

Senator WARREN. But you had had them before that?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes; we had had Army officers on duty with us.

Senator WARREN. While this may not bear directly upon this question, yet we have so much said, and I might say so much evidence is undertaken to be presented, that I want to ask you as to whether there are differences of control, or differences that make it desirable to change our laws because of the almost inherent differences that occur between the Regular Army and the National Guard and the drafted men—which, of course, all became the Army of the United States—as to matters of discipline?

Gen. O'RYAN. In reference to court-martial discipline?

Senator WARREN. Yes.

Gen. O'RYAN. No; I can think of nothing, really.

Senator WARREN. That is what I want to get now.

Gen. O'RYAN. There was no problem in our division. We had some Regular officers at times. I should say we had two or three. We had, perhaps, 100 Reserve Corps officers, and that number changed occasionally, there being sometimes more and sometimes less; but I do not believe the average officer in the division knew or cared whether a particular officer was regular or irregular or guard or Reserve Corps. There was no lack of harmony.

Senator WARREN. There were no differences?

Gen. O'RYAN. No. Harmony existed there.

Senator WARREN. After your observation of the other divisions—of course you may not want to speak of them, and so I will ask you generally——

Gen. O'RYAN. I can speak of the two American divisions that served throughout in the British area. That is, as to the Thirtieth American Division—in fact, I am quite sure of it from what I have heard—the same conditions existed in that division.

Senator WARREN. Who commanded that division?

Gen. O'RYAN. Gen. Lewis. Those two divisions were a part of the British Army from the time we got there until we left. We all wanted to be, of course, with the Americans in the American sector, but it fell to our lot to be sent there.

Senator WARREN. I suppose it was largely a matter of lot, was it not?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes; I think it was so far as the American Army was concerned. We had 10 divisions up there, and Gen. Haig determined, as we hear it——

Senator WARREN. You had, of course, largely the advantage—your division did—of perfect formation at home, and a great amount of drill. I suppose you were considered as being more nearly ready for action.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes; I think we heard authoritatively that Marshal Haig suggested that if eight divisions were to be taken away, they leave the Twenty-seventh and the Thirtieth Divisions, which was agreed to.

Senator WARREN. I can understand how that might be.

Gen. O'RYAN. We had just returned from the Mexican border, shortly before that, where we had been kept together as a division through a period of months.

Senator WARREN. Has anything occurred to you since the so-called Kernan report was made that would make you like to differ from or add to or take from that report—any point that was not considered then that you have had occasion to consider since, with reference to military justice?

Gen. O'RYAN. There was one thing. It really has nothing to do with the articles governing the system of military procedure. That relates to article 105. It relates to injuries to person or property. I might say, in relation to this report, that as the committee probably knows, the members of the board were unanimous in their views and recommendations, except as to two or three small details. In relation to this particular section I dissented from the majority opinion, and the comment in support of my dissent is set forth on page 37 of the report, and relates to article 105; but it has nothing to do with courts.

It relates to the appointment of boards to assess, upon officers and soldiers and organizations, damages claimed to have been committed by them and which affected the property or rights of citizens.

Senator WARREN. There are one or two cases which I do not have in mind, but one I remember that came back here that created a good deal of—well, I guess I can say scandal. As we got it from the newspapers, that seemed to carry a good deal of injustice to the men of the organization; and then again, it was claimed that there was injustice on the other side. Have there been numerous cases during the war of marauding or creating damages, sometimes unnecessarily?

Gen. O'RYAN. I think that the percentage was very small; but the Army was so large that a small percentage would aggregate—

Senator WARREN. An enormous amount of damages?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes; I think so.

Senator WARREN. I take it from what you say, and from your report, that it is unnecessary to ask you, and yet I will ask you, if you do not consider it necessary that there should be legislation concerning these articles of war?

Gen. O'RYAN. Oh, yes, decidedly; and I think that the changes should be along the lines—naturally I think so—of those recommended by the board.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. May I ask him some questions now?

Senator WARREN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. General, as commander of the division, of course you did not sit in any of these court-martial cases, but will you please state, now, what your functions were with reference to the several kinds of courts, whether summary courts or special courts or general courts-martial? What was your function as the commander of a division?

Gen. O'RYAN. My functions were to read the testimony adduced upon the trial of officers and men tried by general courts-martial, to review the findings and sentence, and concur or disagree, approve or disapprove, those findings, and to set forth the action at the end of the record of the trial and forward it to the office of the commander in chief.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is, the commander of the expeditionary forces?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And through him these were forwarded here to Washington?

Gen. O'RYAN. I believe so.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What courts did you appoint?

Gen. O'RYAN. I appointed all the general courts for my division.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Regimental courts—did you appoint the general courts?

Gen. O'RYAN. I appointed all the general courts-martial of the division.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did you appoint the special and the summary courts, too?

Gen. O'RYAN. No, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. So that there did not come to your attention the findings of either the summary courts or the special courts?

Gen. O'RYAN. Except that I kept track of them, more in the form of tables or statistics and explanatory reports made by my division judge advocate, who did keep such records.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You did appoint the judge advocate of the general court-martial?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And the judge advocate of the special court?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes, sir; no, the appointing power did.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Who was the appointing power?

Gen. O'RYAN. Usually it was a brigade commander. It was the commanding officer of a separate organization; and, as the division was necessarily under a billeting system more or less scattered throughout the various villages, we would group several villages under the charge of a brigadier general and——

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And he appointed the special courts?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes; but not the general courts.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And the summary courts were appointed by him or some subordinate officer of his?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes, sir. He usually decentralized the courts and permitted them to be appointed by the local officers.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Can you tell me how many sentences of general courts-martial you revised and went over and approved or disapproved?

Mr. O'RYAN. During what period?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. During the period over there?

Gen. O'RYAN. The average, I should say, was four a week; 16 to 20 a month; perhaps 100 to 120 general court cases during the period we were abroad.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did you go over them all?

Gen. O'RYAN. Personally, every one of them.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. How many did you disapprove, where there was a conviction?

Gen. O'RYAN. Perhaps three to five.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And the balance were all approved?

Gen. O'RYAN. No, sir; the balance were frequently modified.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is, you mean modifying the punishment?

Gen. O'RYAN. Modifying the punishment. I should say that perhaps one-third the punishments were modified, and of two-thirds approved. That is all from recollection.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, certainly. I only want the general proposition.

How many cases of general courts-martial were there where there was a finding of not guilty, in which you set aside the finding and ordered a retrial?

Gen. O'RYAN. Well, if there was a finding of not guilty, I could not order a new trial, under the laws that exist now.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You did not reconvene the court?

Gen. O'RYAN. No, sir. Oh, I see what you mean. We do not call that ordering a new trial.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You order the court to reconvene?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes; to reconvene.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It is, in effect, that?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes, it is.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In how many cases did you order the court to reconvene where there had been sentences of not guilty, either by the specifications or the charges?

Gen. O'RYAN. In perhaps three or four cases.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And in those cases were convictions returned by the court?

Gen. O'RYAN. I think—I am not quite certain that—my recollection is that—in our division where that has been done, the percentage is about half and half. In other words, in about one-half of the cases so sent back, the court refuses to modify its action. I think that such cases are a little more than one-half. In a little than one-half of such cases, the court, on reconsidering, did modify its former findings.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What influenced your action in cases where you ordered the court to reconvene, where there had been a verdict of acquittal or a judgment of acquittal?

Gen. O'RYAN. I recall one case, for example, that happened at Camp Wadsworth, where an officer was accused of being drunk and creating a disturbance, and it resulted in his trial by a general court-martial. The finding of the court was that he was not guilty. I read the testimony. The testimony was conflicting, to some extent. Nevertheless, the great weight of evidence established the case, and I characterized the thing as a complete miscarriage of justice. I criticized, indirectly, the members of the court and sent it back and directed the court to reconvene and to reread the testimony and to reconsider the case. That was done and they sent it back with the same result, and I then confirmed the action of the court, stating, however, that it was not in accord with my own views. But I later found what actuated the court was this, that this officer had been in the service for a long number of years, that he had been a fairly efficient officer, that he had had some family trouble of some kind and acted in this outrageous way. They knew that we must make an example of any officer who acted that way, that he could not remain in the service, and it was stated by a member of the court that if the court would find this man not guilty so that he could, without that smirch on his reputation, return to his family, he would guarantee that this officer would resign. It was an arrangement that was entirely without any authority.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did he resign?

Gen. O'RYAN. He did. He got out.

Senator WARREN. That is one of those cases in which the court took into consideration his prior actions and prior conduct, of course?

Gen. O'RYAN. Oh, yes; yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Now, General, I want to get this down to the actual practice in the Army. Either the division commander or the commanding officer of a brigade, or even of a lower unit, appoints all of the courts?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Then does the commanding officer also appoint the judge advocate?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And he appoints, as a matter of fact, the man who is to defend, usually appointing the man who is suggested by the defendant himself?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes; suggested by the defendant himself.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But that is entirely within the power of the commanding officer?

Gen. O'RYAN. To deny or to authorize.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes. Now, when a judgment is found against a defendant, whether an enlisted man or a commissioned officer, in the due course it reaches the Judge Advocate General of the Army, does it not, here?

Gen. O'RYAN. The record does; yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Is there any power between the commanding officer where the judgment is rendered and the department here, where there is power to revise or modify the judgment of a court-martial, except the commanding officer?

Gen. O'RYAN. That is all.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. When it gets here—and here is where the line of difference comes between those who insist upon maintaining the present system and those who desire the modified system—under section 1199 of the Revised Statutes this language is used. I will not read it all. You are familiar with it?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. However, I would like to have it go into the record. I will ask the stenographer to insert it and I will not read it.

(Sec. 1199 of the Revised Statutes, above referred to, is here printed in the record as follows:)

SEC. 1199. The Judge Advocate General shall receive, revise, and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions, and perform such other duties as have been performed heretofore by the Judge Advocate General of the Army. The power to revise the proceedings of courts-martial conferred upon the Judge Advocate General by this section shall be exercised only for the correction of errors of law which have injuriously affected the substantial rights of an accused, and shall include—

(a) Power to disapprove a finding of guilty and to approve only so much of a finding of guilty of a particular offense as involves a finding of guilty of a lesser included offense when the record requires such finding;

(b) Power to disapprove the whole or any part of a sentence;

(c) Power, upon the disapproval of the whole of a sentence, to advise the proper convening or confirming authority of the further proceedings that may and should be had, if any. If upon revision, under this section, all the findings and the sentences be disapproved because of error of law in the proceedings, the convening or confirming authority may lawfully order a new trial by another court-martial.

Sentences involving death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge from the service shall not be executed pending revision. If in any case a sentence though valid shall appear upon revision to be unduly severe, the Judge Advocate General shall make a report and recommendation for clemency, with the reasons therefor, to the President or the military authority having power to remit or mitigate the punishment.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Under that provision which has just been inserted in the record the Judge Advocate General of the Army claims that under the power to receive and to revise there is no other power than an advisory power of the commanding officer.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Unless there is want of jurisdiction, or the court has been illegally constituted.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you agree with that?

Gen. O'RYAN. I agree with that as a proposition of law.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You agree to that construction of the statute?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you agree to the proposition that it is a wise construction of the statute?

Gen. O'RYAN. I think it is always wise to construe statutes in accordance with correct legal principles, and therefore I think it is a wise construction.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Surely.

Gen. O'RYAN. But I think that the result of that law, rather than the result of the interpretation, is unfortunate.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Well, now, that is what I am getting at. You think that is a proper construction of the law?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It is the contention now of the Judge Advocate General of the Army and of a good many others that it is a proper construction.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. On the other hand, it is contended that under the power to revise the Judge Advocate General's office has to examine into the record and not only to advise the commanding officer but to reverse the judgment, if he sees fit, or to modify it.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you not think, if that construction could have been conscientiously placed upon the statute, it would have resulted in good?

Gen. O'RYAN. I think it would have resulted in good; yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Gen. O'RYAN. But I think it would have resulted also in some conditions that would have been unfortunate in that it would vest in a staff officer of the War Department powers that are really judicial and executive; the powers, in other words, to be gleaned or to be gathered from the word "revise," if that is to be interpreted as meaning, as you have stated, to read the record, to reverse, to modify. Those are really powers that are judicial, but in executing them they become executive.

a great deal of complaint that court-martial proceedings and findings have been very strict, and of course there have been some instances cited before the Committee on Military Affairs as a whole, and elsewhere, that have seemed absolutely inhuman. I think that we should like to know from you what your observation has been, not only in your division but otherwise, and whether those instances are exceptions and whether they are extremely rare, or whether they are common occurrences: so as one may say, to get down to practical business. That, I think, is what the subcommittee and the general Committee of Military Affairs would like to know. They would like to know what of these reports we can accept as being of general application and as indicating the general attitude of Army officers on these courts, and whether, taking it by and large, the men of our Army as a whole have suffered tremendously—more than the exigencies of the case would require.

Of course, as to this matter of enlisted men serving on courts, which is a matter on which there is such strong division of opinion with people who are advocating change, I would also like, somewhere in your remarks, to have you state what your opinion is and what would be your advice about some final court, you might say outside the Army, a civil court, or if within the Army, appointed from civil life and appointed for that purpose and no other. You catch my idea, do you?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes, sir; I think so. When our troops were mobilized and the general plan for the organization of the big Army was understood, I think that a great many officers were rather appalled by the prospect of having so many men without military training brought into the service; that is to say, they were appalled by the prospect of handling them, disciplining them, and training them, and I think that many of them, from what I have heard in conversation with them at the time and since, made up their minds that in relation to offenses committed by those men, after warning and after a reasonable degree of training, they would send them before a court that would punish them in a way that would terrorize them—I use the word, I think, advisedly—or not so much terrorize them as terrorize the rest of the men on duty at that camp: at the same time, however, recognizing the fact that these sentences would perhaps be modified by the division commanders, or where they were not, or where they were attempted to be carried out in full, would after a reasonable time had elapsed, or perhaps after the conclusion of the war, be in part or wholly remitted. I think that the officers who served on military courts, and the division commanders who reviewed the convictions which resulted in these long sentences, all understood that no mature men in or out of the Army would seriously expect these sentences to be carried out; but that the men who constituted the Army were young, many of them unsophisticated in regard to military matters at least, that they did not know very much, if anything, about military courts or military justice; that they had an idea that the Army in time of war punished practically as it pleased. When stern sentences were handed out, I think that they had a very beneficial effect in those cases where the sentence was not so extraordinarily severe as to give the impression that it was unjust or perhaps even inhuman.

cism is based upon the extreme severity of the sentence, not upon the fact that the soldier was unjustly convicted.

In the cases you mention, perhaps the conviction itself was unjust, wholly aside from the severe sentences imposed.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But these sentences were all approved by the commanding officer; they were approved by the judge advocate, they were approved by the Chief of Staff; so that if the military rule had been strictly complied with, they would have been shot.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Now, the President intervened by an act of clemency and remitted the penalty of death, but still that did not relieve them.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes. I share your view about that, and I did on this board, and I think you will find in the report that the others were of the same opinion, and as the result of that, we seek, by what we have proposed in this report, to vest in the judge advocate, in terms that can not be questioned, this authority—of course it is in the name of the President—to do these things. I think if you will refer to the section, you will find it there.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; I am glad to hear you say that, General. Now, the Judge Advocate General of the Army proposed an amendment to the Articles of War in January, 1918, before our committee, which vested that power in the President. That is substantially what you propose to do.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But in the last analysis that power which is proposed to be vested in the President rests in military authorities below the President.

Gen. O'RYAN. As a result of routine practice?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Because the President can not review these cases.

Gen. O'RYAN. He can not, personally.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. No; so that in the last analysis the President is governed by his military adviser, who is the Chief of Staff. So that, in the last analysis, the Chief of Staff is the man who acts. In the very nature of things, the President can not do it. Is not that true?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Now, let us get back to the Articles of War. But before I reach that: Do you not think that there ought to be somebody somewhere along the line, from the time of the trial until the final lodgment of the case here in Washington, who can represent the legal aspect of it in an advisory capacity to the different courts?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes; I think there should be in relation to sentences that sufficiently affect the material rights of the accused. But, while I am making that statement, I have in mind the division commander in the mud and the rain, with his men, getting a little bit tired of war, a percentage of them showing a willingness to follow the line of least resistance; I have in mind that commander, seeing the necessity of driving their noses against the grindstone and making a little example here and there in addition to all the other stimulating things he is doing: I see the necessity of that. I am not going to take those men and let them be shot without any trial at all.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I am not willing that it should be according to law?

Gen. O'RYAN. I am not willing that I would not do anything to whatever law is provided. But I am not willing that I should have the prospect of having every case that is sent before they are finally decided, going through various stages to Washington here, to have some board review them.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I agree with you as to that, but that would not prevent the idea of a court-martial. "Gentlemen, you are proceeding without any law. You have no authority to do this." Do you not think there should be some man with power to give that advice, right in the field, if necessary?

Gen. O'RYAN. I think we have that person in the trained law adviser of each division: that is, the staff judge advocate, who is a major or a colonel, who is away from the scenes that I have described or referred to, and whose specialty is law.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, General; but he has no power to act in the matter.

Gen. O'RYAN. He has no executory power. His power is that of an adviser. But might I interject here a thought that I think has a great bearing upon this matter, and that is, I find in discussing this subject with those who disagree, that there exists an attitude of mind in regard to a military man, that conceives that the officer is by virtue of his office in some way a man whom it is undesirable to vest with this character of authority in relation to his own men; that the men would seem to need protection from the officer. Now, I can tell you frankly I have a great regard for the men and their rights. I really have seen very little justification for that attitude. I think that any man fit to command a division appreciates even in a selfish way, aside from any other motive, that his success will be very largely dependent upon his men and their ability and their feeling toward him. If he is unjust toward them, they will not do things for him that he demands that they shall do, and some of the things he must do for them is to see that justice is done them in relation to discipline, and that they are fed and clothed. There is no man more concerned with these things than the division commander.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. As a rule, I think that is probably true; but if it is possible that there should be individual exceptions, it is unfortunate.

Gen. O'RYAN. It is, very.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. So that there ought to be some power lodged somewhere in cases where there are individual hardships or wrongs, if you please, to review and to inspect the record that is made, with the view of correcting it.

Gen. O'RYAN. In respect to that last point, Senator, I might say that I approached the service on this board with quite an open mind, and we looked into the statistics, which are not at my tongue's end now; but I was more concerned in finding out, not whether Pvt. Smith was almost shot, in an army of three and one-half million men, but what percentage of the vast number of court-martial cases had resulted in injustice; and my belief is, from the statistics given, that the percentage is very, very small. I believe it is less than in civil life.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That may be true, but in civil life there is a final tribunal where errors can be corrected. There is none in the court-martial system.

Now, pardon me—for the record—although it is insisted by Gen. Crowder and by the Secretary of War, and has been insisted by some of the military men of the Judge Advocate General's office, that the system is all right, yet there have been 322,000 cases of summary trials, and over 20,000 cases of general courts-martial, with an aggregate sentence in the latter of 28,000 years. If this system was correct, if it was fundamentally right, and wrongs could not be perpetrated under it, there would have been no need to have reduced these sentences; and yet out of 28,000 years in the aggregate, in 4,000 general court-martial cases they have remitted all but about 6,700 years. There is something wrong somewhere where there is a remission of such a great number of years in sentences.

Gen. O'RYAN. I think there is a point that explains that, to some extent. When our Army was formed there existed, as I explained before, this sentiment of "in terrorem." There did exist that sentiment. That explains, in part, the infliction of these really absurd sentences.

The next point is this, that a great number of divisions were created. Prior to the commencement of this war I think there were in the United States of America but perhaps three divisions in the Regular Army and the Guard together. In other words, there were but three divisions where division courts-martial—general courts—had ever operated.

Then the only other people who had had any experience in general courts-martial were the department commanders, because they were vested with court-martial jurisdiction; and of course that included the Philippines. I think that at McPherson and Leavenworth they have general court-martial jurisdiction. But the number of Army officers with experience in reviewing general-court cases was comparatively small; and in most cases they were the senior officers of the Army, many of whom were considered too old to take command of divisions in this war. The result was that a great number of officers from the Regular Army were made division commanders, and practically none of them had had any experience as reviewing officers in relation to general courts-martial. They were, by virtue of that lack of experience, principally concerned with organization, training, and getting their property, and I can well imagine that when the judge advocate handed them the results of general court-martial proceedings, they adopted an attitude quite different from what they would have adopted if they had had long experience prior to that time in the administration of justice. Otherwise, I think that many of the really absurd sentences should have been modified and reduced right there by the division commanders.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But they were not.

Gen. O'RYAN. But they were not.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And they could not be, according to the Judge Advocate General's ruling here, for want of jurisdiction.

Gen. O'RYAN. Except by Executive clemency.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; except by Executive clemency. And you know, General, you take a young man in a criminal court—and I have had a good deal of experience in prosecuting—and he is convicted, and if the court sets aside the verdict for lack of proof, he goes free. If the conviction was allowed to stand, he was convicted just the same, and he had to have clemency exercised in his behalf by the Government.

Now, in the Army where these young men have been convicted and sentences have been rendered against them, they are criminals just the same in the eyes of the law.

Gen. O'RYAN. I am in accord with you about the insufficiency of justice which merely relieves the man of the necessity of serving in a prison somewhere, and leaves upon him the stigma of conviction.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I think if you and I were to sit down to consider this, we would not differ about the administration of justice. You had the civilian touch when you went in, and you were the only man that went in who had that. You had the civilian touch, and you knew it better than the average military man; so that you have resorted, according to your own statement, to punishing your men within your own organization. I think it was a splendid thing to do.

Gen. O'RYAN. Of course, that did not apply to all cases. It applied to many of them.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It had a wholesome effect.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes; it had a wholesome effect because it was a terrible punishment.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It had a good effect in regard to discipline?

Gen. O'RYAN. It stopped the offense. We had no stragglers or shirkers. The punishment was pretty severe.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes. These Articles of War of ours were the articles that were in vogue in Great Britain in 1794?

Gen. O'RYAN. In a general way.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Well, as a matter of fact, the British articles of 1794 were adopted by the Continental Congress.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Practically without change, except to put in the word "Congress" where the word "King" occurred?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Those Articles of War have been changed very little, fundamentally, up to the present time. The British code has been changed to conform to more modern conditions, has it not?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And yet our country has clung to the old British system?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes; that is true.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Now, Mr. Chairman, may I insert something in the record here?

Senator WARREN. Before you do that, will you follow your line of examination by getting the opinion of Gen. O'Ryan upon the efficiency of the British system as now in practice, and perhaps the French and the Italian?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I will in a moment, if you will let me offer this.

Senator WARREN. Certainly.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I want to get this in. Under the administration of military justice in Great Britain the judge advocate general is different from the Judge Advocate General here. I suppose you are familiar with the British system?

Gen. O'RYAN. I am only familiar with it in an indirect way. We lived in the British section, but we were, as you know, pretty well occupied, and I really do not claim to have studied the British system. My information and knowledge of it is based upon casual conversation very largely.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The judge advocate general is entirely separated, as I recall it now, from the army. He is the legal adviser?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And the judge advocates of the army, with the army, are legal advisers and see that the courts adhere to the recognized rules of evidence. Now, that has all been done in England. They have gotten away from the old court-martial system of 1794. Originally in England the judge advocate's duties were in England as they are now in America, assimilated to those of the prosecutor. That is what the judge advocate is in America?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The judge advocate general in England was relieved of his duty as prosecutor in 1829, and in 1829 he became a quasi judicial officer, occupying the position of a legal adviser to the court, and they had to obey his observations as to the law. Did you observe its enforcement in the British Army?

Gen. O'RYAN. I never attended a court-martial in the British Army. I know that the discipline in the British Army was of a very high order; no question about it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It was quite different from ours. I hope you will look that up, because you may possibly modify your views somewhat as contained in the Kernan report, because you will find that the judge occupies an entirely different position in the British Army.

Gen. O'RYAN. But have we not, Senator—I know it is not proper to ask the court questions——

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, yes; certainly.

Gen. O'RYAN. I mean by that, have we not, in what we recommend in relation to section 1199, of the Revised Statutes, or the corresponding articles, vested in the Judge Advocate General of the Army functions that will correct these shortcomings?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It will improve the condition over what it is now, but it does not go far enough, because the Judge Advocate General and his department, whether in the field or here, is still a prosecuting institution. Under the British system he is not the prosecutor nor the judge advocate in the field.

Gen. O'RYAN. The system includes, among its functions, one of prosecution. But I think that a proper conception of the Judge Advocate General's department which will result from an amendment based upon that report, is really that the department will have three functions. One class of officers will be prosecuting attorneys. Another group will be consultants and advisers. They constitute the group assigned to the divisions. Then there is a judicial group back in Washington, or with the expeditionary force, which receives and revises the records of trials, and in the name of the President takes action thereon.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. No; but without power now.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes; I am speaking now——

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. About your proposal?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes; the proposal.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. Chairman, may I put in the record this matter in regard to the British system? I may say that it is prepared by the legislative reference bureau of the Library of Congress.

Senator WARREN. Let that be inserted.

(The matter referred to is here printed in full in the record, as follows:)

ADMINISTRATION OF MILITARY JUSTICE IN GREAT BRITAIN.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT.

The office and duties of the judge advocate general in England are described by the Encyclopedia Britannica as follows:

"The judge advocate general is an officer appointed in England to assist the Crown with advice in matters relating to military law, and more particularly as to courts-martial. In the army the administration of justice as pertaining to discipline is carried out in accordance with the provisions of military law, and it is the function of the judge advocate general to insure that these disciplinary powers are exercised in strict conformity with that law. Down to 1793 the judge advocate general acted as secretary and legal adviser to the board of general officers, but on the reconstruction of the office of commander in chief in that year he ceased to perform secretarial duties, but remained chief legal adviser. He retained his seat in Parliament and in 1806 he was made a member of the government and a privy councillor. The office ceased to be political in 1892, on the recommendation of the select committee of 1888 on army estimates, and was conferred on Sir F. Jeune (afterwards Lord St. Helier). There was no salary attached to the office when held by Lord St. Helier, and the duties were for the most part performed by deputy. On his death in 1905, Thomas Milvain, K. C., was appointed, and the terms and conditions of the post were rearranged as follows: (1) A salary of £2,000 a year; (2) the holder to devote his whole time to the duties of the post; (3) the retention of the post until the age of 70, subject to continued efficiency, but with claim of gratuity or pension on retirement. The holder was to be subordinate to the secretary of state for war, without direct access to the sovereign. The appointment is conferred by letters patent, which define the exact functions attaching to the office, which practically are the reviewing of the proceedings of all field general, general, and direct courts-martial held in the United Kingdom, and advising the sovereign as to the confirmation of the finding and sentence. The deputy judge advocate is a salaried officer in the department of the judge advocate general and acts under his letters patent. A separate judge advocate general's department is maintained in India, where at one time deputy judge advocates were attached to every important command. All general courts-martial held in the United Kingdom are sent to the judge advocate general, to be by him submitted to the sovereign for confirmation; and all districts courts-martial, after having been confirmed and promulgated, are sent to his office for examination and custody. The judge advocate general and his deputy, being judges in the last resort of the validity of the proceedings of courts-martial, take no part in their conduct; but the deputy judge advocates frame and revise charges and attend at courts-martial, swear the court, advise both sides on law, look after the interest of the prisoner, and record the proceedings. In the English Navy there is an official whose functions are somewhat similar to those of the judge advocate general. He is called counsel and judge advocate of the fleet."

ings, the convening or confirming authority may lawfully order a new trial by another court-martial.

Sentences involving death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge from the service shall not be executed pending revision. If in any case a sentence though valid shall appear upon revision to be unduly severe, the Judge Advocate General shall make a report and recommendation for clemency, with the reasons therefor, to the President or the military authority having power to remit or mitigate the punishment.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Under that provision which has just been inserted in the record the Judge Advocate General of the Army claims that under the power to receive and to revise there is no other power than an advisory power of the commanding officer.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Unless there is want of jurisdiction, or the court has been illegally constituted.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you agree with that?

Gen. O'RYAN. I agree with that as a proposition of law.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You agree to that construction of the statute?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you agree to the proposition that it is a wise construction of the statute?

Gen. O'RYAN. I think it is always wise to construe statutes in accordance with correct legal principles, and therefore I think it is a wise construction.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Surely.

Gen. O'RYAN. But I think that the result of that law, rather than the result of the interpretation, is unfortunate.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Well, now, that is what I am getting at. You think that is a proper construction of the law?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It is the contention now of the Judge Advocate General of the Army and of a good many others that it is a proper construction.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. On the other hand, it is contended that under the power to revise the Judge Advocate General's office has to examine into the record and not only to advise the commanding officer but to reverse the judgment, if he sees fit, or to modify it.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you not think, if that construction could have been conscientiously placed upon the statute, it would have resulted in good?

Gen. O'RYAN. I think it would have resulted in good; yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Gen. O'RYAN. But I think it would have resulted also in some conditions that would have been unfortunate in that it would vest in a staff officer of the War Department powers that are really judicial and executive; the powers, in other words, to be gleaned or to be gathered from the word "revise," if that is to be interpreted as meaning, as you have stated, to read the record, to reverse, to modify. Those are really powers that are judicial, but in executing them they become executive.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; but the judge advocate general himself is a military man.

Gen. O'RYAN. He is a military man in the sense that he holds a military commission.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And within the Military Establishment.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. So that it would not be a decision of the case by a nonmilitary tribunal.

Gen. O'RYAN. No, sir; that is correct.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Now, you rather speak of this system of severe sentences as a system in terrorem; that is, a man is punished severely not so much possibly because his act calls for severe punishment, but in order to discipline the mass?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Under the construction of the statute for which I contend, that the power to revise gives the power to reverse or modify, the Judge Advocate General might have, within the law, revised and modified this sentence and removed the stigma of conviction, might he not?

Gen. O'RYAN. Under that construction; yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Now, as it is, you take a young man convicted, whether he is a commissioned officer or an enlisted man he is severely punished, not because of the viciousness of the particular crime but to set an example. The judgment of conviction against him by a general court-martial is a punishment that can not be set aside. There is no way to get rid of the stigma of conviction except by the exercise of clemency.

Gen. O'RYAN. Unless the case is one where the court lacked jurisdiction or where its sentence was contrary to law.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; of course, then, that removes the stigma. But in the greater number of cases there is only one tribunal to relieve, and that is the President.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And that does not remove the stigma. That is simply mercy.

Gen. O'RYAN. But in these in terrorem cases, that would not result, because it is not the conviction that is set aside, but the severe sentence that is modified.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Are you not mistaken about that? We will take four cases that have been referred to in the press and by some witnesses, where four boys over in France were convicted under very extraordinary circumstances, two of them for sleeping on post, and the two others for disobedience of a command, and all four were sentenced to be shot. The record in those cases indicated that those boys had not had a fair trial. Probably two of them plead guilty; but there was no way in the world, under the construction of the Judge Advocate General, to revise, or to reverse, or to modify, or to change, or to set aside that conviction. Now, those boys were outlawed, under the strict military rule. The only way to reach that was through the clemency of the President. That does not remove the stigma of conviction.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes; I see your point. What I intended to say was that in the vast majority of these cases that are criticized, the criticism is based upon the extreme severity of the sentence, not upon the fact that the soldier was unjustly convicted.

In the cases you mention, perhaps the conviction itself was unjust, wholly aside from the severe sentences imposed.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But these sentences were all approved by the commanding officer; they were approved by the judge advocate, they were approved by the Chief of Staff; so that if the military rule had been strictly complied with, they would have been shot.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Now, the President intervened by an act of clemency and remitted the penalty of death, but still that did not relieve them.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes. I share your view about that, and I did on this board, and I think you will find in the report that the others were of the same opinion, and as the result of that, we seek, by what we have proposed in this report, to vest in the judge advocate, in terms that can not be questioned, this authority—of course it is in the name of the President—to do these things. I think if you will refer to the section, you will find it there.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; I am glad to hear you say that, General. Now, the Judge Advocate General of the Army proposed an amendment to the Articles of War in January, 1918, before our committee, which vested that power in the President. That is substantially what you propose to do.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But in the last analysis that power which is proposed to be vested in the President rests in military authorities below the President.

Gen. O'RYAN. As a result of routine practice?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Because the President can not review these cases.

Gen. O'RYAN. He can not, personally.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. No; so that in the last analysis the President is governed by his military adviser, who is the Chief of Staff. So that, in the last analysis, the Chief of Staff is the man who acts. In the very nature of things, the President can not do it. Is not that true?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Now, let us get back to the Articles of War. But before I reach that: Do you not think that there ought to be somebody somewhere along the line, from the time of the trial until the final lodgment of the case here in Washington, who can represent the legal aspect of it in an advisory capacity to the different courts?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes; I think there should be in relation to sentences that sufficiently affect the material rights of the accused. But, while I am making that statement, I have in mind the division commander in the mud and the rain, with his men, getting a little bit tired of war, a percentage of them showing a willingness to follow the line of least resistance; I have in mind that commander, seeing the necessity of driving their noses against the grindstone and making a little example here and there in addition to all the other stimulating things he is doing: I see the necessity of that officer being able to take these men and try them, and administer these punishments.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But you would want it done according to law?

Gen. O'RYAN. Oh, yes; certainly, I want it done according to whatever law is provided. But I can not help but view with alarm the prospect of having every one of those cases, before they are finally decided, going back through various stages to Washington here, to have some board review them.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I agree with you as to that, but that would not prevent the judge advocate saying to a court-martial, "Gentlemen, you are proceeding without any law. You have no authority to do this." Do you not think there should be some man with power to give that advice, right in the field, if necessary?

Gen. O'RYAN. I think we have that person in the trained law adviser of each division; that is, the staff judge advocate, who is a major or a colonel, who is away from the scenes that I have described or referred to, and whose specialty is law.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, General; but he has no power to act in the matter.

Gen. O'RYAN. He has no executory power. His power is that of an adviser. But might I interject here a thought that I think has a great bearing upon this matter, and that is, I find in discussing this subject with those who disagree, that there exists an attitude of mind in regard to a military man, that conceives that the officer is by virtue of his office in some way a man whom it is undesirable to vest with this character of authority in relation to his own men; that the men would seem to need protection from the officer. Now, I can tell you frankly I have a great regard for the men and their rights. I really have seen very little justification for that attitude. I think that any man fit to command a division appreciates even in a selfish way, aside from any other motive, that his success will be very largely dependent upon his men and their ability and their feeling toward him. If he is unjust toward them, they will not do things for him that he demands that they shall do, and some of the things he must do for them is to see that justice is done them in relation to discipline, and that they are fed and clothed. There is no man more concerned with these things than the division commander.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. As a rule, I think that is probably true; but if it is possible that there should be individual exceptions, it is unfortunate.

Gen. O'RYAN. It is, very.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. So that there ought to be some power lodged somewhere in cases where there are individual hardships or wrongs, if you please, to review and to inspect the record that is made, with the view of correcting it.

Gen. O'RYAN. In respect to that last point, Senator, I might say that I approached the service on this board with quite an open mind, and we looked into the statistics, which are not at my tongue's end now; but I was more concerned in finding out, not whether Pvt. Smith was almost shot, in an army of three and one-half million men, but what percentage of the vast number of court-martial cases had resulted in injustice; and my belief is, from the statistics given, that Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It may be—I will assume it for the purposes of the illustration—that there was an insufficiency of evidence in the first case, or that rules of evidence have been violated, and yet the same irregularities would come into the other three cases.

Gen. O'RYAN. Very probably; but that would not inevitably follow.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; but it would very naturally follow; do you not think?

Gen. O'RYAN. Very naturally, especially if the same judge advocate and the same president of the court tried all cases.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Now, speaking of your report, I have read it with some interest, but not as critically as I hope to be able to read it. The amendments proposed by the Kernan report make no really fundamental changes, do they?

Gen. O'RYAN. I think from what you have said, Senator, that you think the vital point—and I have thought that the vital point—of the whole system is to provide somewhere a body of trained men whose authority under the law would be adequate to correct errors of law and all injustices in relation to courts-martial.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Gen. O'RYAN. Now, in providing that, we considered this: Shall we make this court or body an appellate tribunal composed of lawyers to be appointed by the President? Shall we constitute it of officers detailed specially to constitute that court and to remain permanently on duty as members of that court, free from any superior authority? Or shall we provide that that body shall consist of officers in a department already existing, who shall act in an advisory capacity and in a recommendatory way? We concluded, first, to consider the matter from the constitutional point of view, and you perhaps remember that in the opening part of our report we discussed that question. I know that some members of the court were of the opinion that it might be unconstitutional for Congress to attempt to take from the President, in his rôle of Commander in Chief, the power to carry out the discipline of the Army through the agency of the courts.

We decided to merely raise that point for what it might be worth and to consider the matter aside from any constitutional point of view. We came to the conclusion that by amending the existing law we could vest in the Judge Advocate General's Department the authority to do—in the name of the President as Commander in Chief—those things which the Senator has mentioned and which are certainly desirable to have done in order to insure justice to officers and men who are tried. I think we have accomplished that, if that is the real meat of this needed reform.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is one of the most serious things, General.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Now, I am frank to say that I was amazed at the constitutional argument of your committee. For instance, you in effect hold that the functions which the King exercised as the Commander in Chief of the Army prior to 1794 descended to the President of the United States; in other words, that as Commander in Chief of the Army before the Constitution was adopted he inherited certain fundamental powers.

Gen. O'RYAN. I do not join in that part of the argument, if that argument was made.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is made.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I am going to call your attention to it just because I think it is fundamentally wrong, General. I am discussing it from a lawyer's standpoint.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Now, if that be true, the powers which the President inherited over our Army as the successor of a King in the Colonies, at least after the adoption of the Constitution, could be taken away by Congress, because the Constitution gives to Congress all power to make rules and regulations for the government of the Army, does it not?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Now, let me ask you if that does not follow from what your report contains? Mr. Chairman, I will not read it all, but may I ask to have this inserted in the record?

Senator WARREN. Certainly.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I will read from page 6 of this report, and I will mark the part which I want to be inserted in the record, and I have misconstrued the findings of your committee unless what I have just stated is correct. [Reading:]

The rules governing armies had their beginnings not in legislative bodies but in commanders, whether called kings or chiefs or generals, and in early times those who formulated the rules carried them out. With the evolution of governments the right of prescribing the most important or fundamental rules has lodged in legislative bodies, but the execution of those rules, their practical administration, has heretofore been left to commanders and their assistants down through the hierarchy of command to the very bottom. Courts-martial have always been agencies for creating and maintaining the discipline of armies, and in earlier times, and certainly until the adoption of our Constitution, were provided and administered by commanders as of inherent right. The King of England had and exercised this inherent right. The Continental Congress took over some of the duties of government in the rebellious colonies, but Washington, as Commander in Chief, appointed courts-martial as of right inherent in that office, without the express authority of that Congress. So that when our Constitution was adopted and the powers of the Federal Government were distributed among three great departments, and the President was made by the organic law Commander in Chief, the power to appoint courts-martial by virtue of that office was well understood. The power to make rules for the government of the land forces was at the same time confided to Congress. The earlier Articles of War continued or created under that grant of power did not expressly confer upon the President the right or authority to appoint courts-martial, but actually he exercised the power, and the validity of that action is well established. It appears, therefore, that before our Constitution was established a Commander in Chief was inherently competent to appoint courts-martial as incident to his office; that under the Constitution this right has been exercised and upheld, and, further, that the rules made for the Army by Congress have extended to subordinate commanders (who are, in fact, assistants to the President in his special capacity as Commander in Chief) the right to appoint and to make use of this agency.

The pending Chamberlain bill proposes to take out of the hands of those to whom command is confided, from the President down, the effective use of courts-martial as instruments to enforce discipline. It does this by providing a civilian court of military appeals and by injecting into the principal courts-martial a new functionary with powers so extensive and of such a kind as to constitute him the administrator of discipline, though he is not himself of the hierarchy of command. The net result in the more important cases would be to transfer the power to discipline our armies from the Commander in Chief, the President, and from his assistant commanders to civilian hands pure and simply, i. e., the court of military appeals, or to the quasi civilian legal hands of the judge advocates provided for general and special court-martial. In view of the history of the court-martial as an adjunct of armies and as an instrument the use of which inheres in the office of the Commander in Chief under our system of government, is it not possible that the proposition to take from the President in large measure the effective use of this instrument, as well as to take away from his proper assistants in the task of command a like use of the same instrument may be unconstitutional? It is not in effect an attempt to withdraw from command an essential part of that which belongs to it historically and in sound reason? Is it not open to be questioned as an attempt by law to emasculate the legitimate and heretofore undisputed authority of the President as Commander in Chief?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The logical conclusion to be drawn from that to me is that Congress has no power to do that.

Gen. O'RYAN. That was what was intended to be conveyed by the raising of that point. But I see nothing in what the Senator has read, or quoted, that indicates that the board thought that the President derives any of his powers from a King of England.

Senator WARREN. He has his powers under the Constitution.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes; and in part he derives them from the customs of war, which may be termed the military common law. I do not recall anything that would indicate otherwise in the report.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It is, practically, that it is an inherent power.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And the power that we have comes from the English articles of war of 1794, which vested this power in the King.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes. The Constitution makes the President the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, and the question then arises in relation to the performance of the President's functions, What are the functions of the Commander in Chief? They are not stated in the Constitution. We must go back of the Constitution to determine what the functions of the Commander in Chief are. They can only be determined by reference to the customs of war. What are those rights that are inherent in the office of commander in chief of an army?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I would say there are none, except as Congress gives them.

Gen. O'RYAN. Well, I was going to say the converse of that—that they are whatever the customs of war give, except as Congress may curtail them under its powers.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Well, possibly that is a correct statement of it, too.

Gen. O'RYAN. Then, of course, going on from there—well, assuming all that, has not Congress the power, in the exercise of its legislative power, to curtail the powers of the President as Commander in Chief.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I think there is no question about that power, under the general powers of the Constitution, which authorize the Congress to adopt rules and regulations.

Gen. O'RYAN. Rules and regulations?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Gen. O'RYAN. The question is whether rules and regulations for the government of the Army would include a court of this character to govern, in the last analysis, the discipline of the Army.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you entertain the opinion that Congress can not curtail those powers?

Gen. O'RYAN. No; I refuse to do more than to put that in the interrogatory form.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You would not give that as your opinion?

Gen. O'RYAN. No; nor would I say that I might not reach that opinion. I merely stated it would take too long to consider that, and we preferred to get down to what we wanted to do.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; I am glad you did that.

Gen. O'RYAN. We turned to the practical solution, which was to vest the authority to review, basically, in the President.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Getting back to this question—if I am not tiring you, General——

Gen. O'RYAN. No, indeed.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN (continuing). Getting back to the question of enlisted men serving on courts; you know that the Army we had in France was a slice taken out of the civil life.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It is representative of the whole country.

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Take a man on trial in a civil court; the jury that tries him is taken from the body of the same class of citizens from which the Army was taken?

Gen. O'RYAN. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you not think that men taken from the Army would be just as competent to sit in judgment upon a charge against a young man as would a jury under ordinary circumstances taken from the same body of citizens?

Gen. O'RYAN. Frankly, I do not, Senator. Whatever may be said in relation to the previous question, I have a firm conviction that that thing is wholly impracticable and undesirable in the Army.

Now, let me say this: The slice that comes out of our civil life in the United States undergoes a tremendous change before it goes into battle. I think it is one of the most interesting things about the development of an army to note the change that takes place in the personnel. There are men in the Army who are blacksmiths, mechanics, laborers, clerks, artists; everything. Nevertheless, in the Army they become in a measure children, due to the manner of the life they are leading. It is all regulated for them. They get their meals at regulated times; they eat what is put before them; they have no choice. They go to bed at a certain time. They never know what they are going to do in the next 24 hours. They may be marched to the front or marched to the rear, or they may go for a rest, go on leave on pleasure bent somewhere. That manner of life has a tremendous psychological influence upon those men. I know men in my own division who in civil life were men of affairs, although they were private soldiers, men who for one reason or another did not care for commissions, but that served as private soldiers throughout the war. They all underwent the same process of psychological change after they had been in the Army for a while; and I think to that extent, just as they became as children are, so their efficiency to serve as jurors would be adversely affected, due to the narrow life that they must necessarily lead.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Would not that same argument apply to all of the officers below the commanding officer of a regiment, say, or the commanding officer of a division? The lieutenants do not know one day what they are going to do the next.

Gen. O'RYAN. No; but, as you know, there is a big difference in the character of the work performed by a soldier—necessarily so—in an army, and the character of work that is performed by those who supervise and control and direct. I think, as a matter of fact, that it would be desirable to have as members of a court only those officers who are mature and experienced. But that is not always practicable. There are not enough of those men present or available to completely compose courts. But I think that putting the enlisted men on the courts would be undesirable. Besides, I have never heard any soldiers express the desire or the view that such practice would be desirable from the standpoint of their own interests.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. Chairman, I believe that is all that I care to ask the general.

Senator WARREN. Does anything else occur to you that you would like to add to your testimony, General?

Gen O'RYAN. No, sir; I think not.

(Thereupon, at 12.30 o'clock p. m., the subcommittee adjourned, subject to the call of the chairman.)

ESTABLISHMENT OF MILITARY JUSTICE—PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF THE ARTICLES OF WAR.

---

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to the call of the chairman, at 3 o'clock p. m., in the room of the Committee on Appropriations in the Capitol, Senator Francis E. Warren presiding.

Present, Senators Warren (chairman), Lenroot, and Chamberlain.

STATEMENT OF MAJ. GEN. C. P. SUMMERALL, UNITED STATES ARMY.

Senator WARREN. Gen. Summerall, this subcommittee has before it a bill the object of which is to provide for a revision of the Articles of War and the system of military justice, making a number of changes therein. We have before us the law as it stands, and so far we have the report of one committee which, on the part of the War Department, has been looking the subject over.

We would like to have you state what changes, in your estimation, should be made in the present law, and we would like to hear from you as to the application of the present law abroad as it has come under your control to some extent, and as it has come under your observation.

Gen. SUMMERALL. The present Articles of War were sent to me as well as to other officers, for study, while I was a battalion commander. I was in very close touch with the administration of discipline at that time, and went over them very carefully before they were presented to Congress.

During the war I have had occasion to administer discipline, altogether with combat troops, first a brigade, then a division, and then an army corps.

As far as it came to my observation or experience, the principles of the present Articles of War presented no difficulties and raised no objections in my mind. The only inconvenience experienced was that of applying them to general courts-martial in the case of a combat division that was intensely engaged, or was relieved from the line only for the short period required for replacements, and reentry into the line. We did find considerable trouble in assembling officers for general courts-martial during these short withdrawals, and it required especial energy and effort to dispose of such cases as had accumulated. As far as I know, however, all cases were cleared up during these periods of rest, and I do not recollect any cases where men suffered long periods of confinement without trial or where any unusual hardship was worked upon them in the application of the present Articles of War.

Senator WARREN. Have you noticed the differences between the proposed legislation and the present law?

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes, sir; I have had the present articles read and followed the new articles, so as to compare them.

Senator WARREN. Perhaps you might give us your opinion as to the adoption of some of those.

Gen. SUMMERALL. There are presented to me certain essential differences in the proposed articles from the existing articles. The first in order is the composition of a court in which it is provided that soldiers are competent to sit on courts-martial. I do not believe such a provision is wise, or that it would produce the results which perhaps are sought. I believe the sentiment is general with officers to secure fair treatment and considerate treatment to our men. In my own experience, there is every desire to minimize the punishment of men, to secure justice, to preserve their confidence in discipline, and to maintain high standards of morale, self-respect, and contentment in a command.

In the first place, I do not think that our enlisted men would be qualified by training or by their duties to sit as members of a court-martial. I doubt if the effect on them or on their associates would be such as to increase the confidence that they would have in a court, or increase their happiness in the command. Like any untried thing, it would be an experiment, and it is my opinion that it would not be a successful experiment.

Senator WARREN. What is your opinion as to the desire of the men themselves, if the matter was put before them whether they should have that duty?

Gen. SUMMERALL. I think a certain class would desire it, but it is my opinion that a great many would be opposed to it. Discipline is something that is peculiar to the military service, but it is the very foundation of the military service, and I am of the opinion that we should be very conservative in making radical departures from a system which has been vindicated in many varieties of circumstances. The change might succeed, but I doubt it.

Senator WARREN. There are two propositions, as I understand it—not in that bill, it is true, but yet in that bill in one sense, and in the minds of some people in another.

In the bill itself it is provided that a certain proportion of the members of a court on the trial of enlisted men shall be privates, and in the trial of officers that a certain number of members of the court shall be noncommissioned officers. I understand that others have the idea that in all trials of enlisted men the court should be like a jury in a civil court; that all should be enlisted men. What is your opinion of those two angles of the case?

Gen. SUMMERALL. I think it would be fatal to discipline to have a court composed entirely of enlisted men.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. This bill does not propose that, Senator, you know.

Senator WARREN. Yes, I understand that; but that has been proposed by others. This bill proposes that in the trial of enlisted men a certain number of members of the court shall be enlisted men; and the General has already stated, or at least I so understand him, that of the two alternatives he would prefer a court composed partly of enlisted men rather than one composed altogether of enlisted men.

Your opinion is, General, that a court should not be composed wholly of enlisted men?

Gen. SUMMERALL. It would be fatal to discipline.

Senator WARREN. To have any portion of it so composed?

Gen. SUMMERALL. I would not say to have any portion of it so composed; but to have a court composed altogether of enlisted men would be fatal to discipline. To have a court composed partly of enlisted men would be less injurious. The proportion here recommended might not have any effect upon the procedure at all.

Senator WARREN. How large do you feel that the proportion of enlisted men could be safely made? Or should such a change be made at all?

Gen. SUMMERALL. I do not think it would do any good, sir. I prefer the present Articles of War to those proposed, with respect to the composition and appointment of courts-martial.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What article is that?

Gen. SUMMERALL. I refer to articles 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11.

The next radical change is as to the judge advocate, in article 12. As I understand the proposal, it virtually converts the court into a jury and the judge advocate into a presiding judge. The judge advocate may or may not be an officer; but, at any rate, he would probably not be an officer responsible for the discipline of the command. I believe the soldiers receive more sympathy and more leniency from officers who are associated with them than from officers who are not so associated. I believe that a court-martial will arrive at a decision which is better for the service than will the most expert judge. I believe it is a good deal safer to intrust a case to a court-martial as at present constituted, and a good deal surer for the preservation of discipline and contentment in a command, than it is to transfer the administration of justice in the Army to single individuals in each case, however well informed they may be in the law.

I believe the result would be a greater number of convictions than are secured by a court-martial, with no appreciable difference in the application of the law to other cases.

If the administration of military discipline is taken away from the officers who are responsible for the training and the employment in combat of the troops, I believe it will have an adverse effect upon the morale and upon the discipline of the Army.

I do not consider that the administration of justice is parallel to the treatment of the sick and wounded, for example.

There is no doubt that we need more law in our courts, but I believe this is a difficulty which can be overcome by giving more attention to the study of law, or to supplying more liberally officers to act as judge advocates of courts-martial as now constituted.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You notice that that section does not undertake to take away from the military authorities the discipline, but simply deprives the judge advocate of the function of either a prosecutor or a defender, and leaves him simply as an adviser to the military court. He does not become a member of the court. He has nothing to do except to advise.

Gen. SUMMERALL. As I understand it, he organizes the court, rules upon all questions of law including challenges and questions touching the competency and impartiality of the court, advises the court and the convening authority, and so on.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is along the lines of the British system, where the judge advocate is really a representative of the judge advocate general of the realm.

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He sits as a legal adviser of the trial court, and the court is appointed by the commanding officer, just as before: and if you will notice, it provides that the judge advocate shall not be a member of the court, but shall sit with the court all the time that it is in open session, and shall fairly, impartially, and in a judicial manner perform the following duties and such others not inconsistent herewith as may be described by the President in virtue of article 41.

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Then it prescribes his duties under several subdivisions.

Gen. SUMMERALL. They are the ones that I referred to, where it seemed to me he virtually became a presiding judge.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you see any objection to a judge advocate sitting with the court, not being a member of the court, but advising the court rather than acting as a prosecutor or a defender, simply to see that the law and rules of evidence are complied with in the admission of testimony?

Gen. SUMMERALL. Those duties should be performed. I see no reason for making him an additional adviser, if the judge advocate of the court is competent, or if he became himself our present judge advocate.

In that connection I would add also that I would deplore very greatly the detail of an officer as prosecutor. I think the term itself, and what it implies, would be very objectionable in the military service.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Is not that what the judge advocate is now?

Gen. SUMMERALL. He is required to conduct the case, and to see that justice is done the accused. He brings out all the evidence. As a matter of fact, the first part of his duty is to bring out and develop the prosecution; but he is there to endeavor to see that the whole case is presented, and that justice is done.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Then why is a man ever appointed to defend a man who is on trial?

Gen. SUMMERALL. It is a concession to the defense. I do not consider that it should be necessary, if the judge advocate is really performing his duties, to have a counsel for the defense; but it is a consideration which is properly and habitually extended to the accused.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In accordance with the theory, under the old English system, the prosecuting attorney protected the interests of the defendant as well as the interests of the government. But he gradually drifted into the category of the man who prosecuted.

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Then the judge advocate, in all these prosecutions of the Army, really became an advocate for the cause of the Government.

Gen. SUMMERALL. He is to be an advocate for the cause of the Government, but he would also look out for the interests of the accused. That is his duty. Where there is counsel for the accused, that would naturally go to the counsel.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Does he, as a matter of fact, protect the interests of the defendant in a criminal case? Is he not rather a prosecutor than one who acts as an impartial judge between the Government and the prisoner?

Gen. SUMMERALL. I can not say that he is, Mr. Senator. I have been a judge advocate a great many times; and I have been on courts a great deal. Where there is a counsel, that counsel is expected to do everything he can to present the case of the accused, and the judge advocate protects the case of the Government.

Where there is no counsel, the judge advocate should present the case of the accused with the same sincerity and thoroughness as he presents the case of the Government. As a matter of fact, in nearly all cases the accused has a counsel who does that for him, and it is better that he should do it in that way. I think it is desirable for the accused to have a counsel; but I do not like the idea of an officer being appointed to prosecute a soldier or a person in the military service.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is the real objection that I have to the present system of administering the law by the judge advocate. He becomes really a partisan for the Government; not intentionally, perhaps, but in the very human side of it.

Gen. SUMMERALL. I have no doubt that he does at times.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; the records that I have show that in every case; that he really has drifted into the position that the district attorney in a civil tribunal occupies, looking more particularly after the interests of the side that the Government is espousing.

Senator WARREN. General, you were asked by Senator Chamberlain as to the British military system. If, when you have finished your other remarks, you feel like doing so, I should like to have you compare with our own the real effect in action of the British courts in combat regions; tell us how nearly they agree, and which you consider the more effective. Of course I understand that you do not want to give any evidence that would seem to attack the British system in any way; but we should like to have your opinion, before you get through.

Gen. SUMMERALL. I will answer, right here, that I am not familiar with the British administration of justice, but I gathered from conversations that we are very much milder in the administration of military justice in the field than was the British Army.

Senator WARREN. In that connection, there have been complaints that have come before the committee, quite in detail and in considerable number, against the severity of sentences of our military courts. Now, you represent more directly than anyone who has been before this committee the combat section of the Army, and if you have become acquainted with the way that courts have been conducted in this country preparatory to going to the other side, and how that conduct may compare with the conduct of courts over there, we shall be glad to hear from you on that angle of the case.

Gen. SUMMERALL. I feel sure that there never was any reason to complain of severity of sentences in the combat units with which I had to deal. On the contrary, the entire sympathy of officers is with their soldiers in combat troops. The evildoer is punished, but the whole sentiment is merely to vindicate discipline and preserve standards which will insure success in combat, and it has not been infrequent for an officer to express great regret that he was compelled to prefer charges.

The sentences of the courts coming before me were comparatively light; and yet I believe they maintained a high order of discipline.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. How did they get to you? You commanded a division?

Gen. SUMMERALL. I commanded a division and a corps. In the corps I convened the courts for the corps troops. In the division I convened the general courts for the division.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Were you connected with the Judge Advocate General's Department?

Gen. SUMMERALL. No, sir; I had a judge advocate.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did the sentences that were imposed by the special courts and by all the courts-martial come to your attention?

Gen. SUMMERALL. Only those that I convened.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did they come back to you?

Gen. SUMMERALL. They came to me, personally.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. All of them?

Gen. SUMMERALL. Those that I convened, the division courts, and the corps courts.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The division courts and the corps courts?

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes.

Senator WARREN. General, I think that the wish of this subcommittee is to get every scrap of opinion that you men who have been over there have to express on these matters, and while I have led you astray, somewhat, I hope you will give us any suggestions that you have, even if we do not ask the appropriate questions to bring them out.

Gen. SUMMERALL. Senator Chamberlain has just asked me with regard to these cases that came to me. You, of course, are familiar with the convening authority's procedure in a court-martial case. Every division and every corps had a judge advocate who was a professional lawyer. Both of mine were practicing lawyers in civil life, and I considered them as very expert. They reviewed the cases and presented them to me, pointing out errors for correction, or anything that required my special attention. I did give them my personal attention, and was generally guided, as I think most officers are, by the views and opinions of these men who have superior legal knowledge.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. None of the summary court cases came to you?

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes; my own summary court cases.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And did the regimental court cases come to you?

Gen. SUMMERALL. No, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did the brigade court cases come to you?

Gen. SUMMERALL. No, sir; each one went to its own headquarters.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. So that there really came to you only the cases which were tried by divisional courts-martial and corps courts-martial?

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What classes of cases did that involve?

Gen. SUMMERALL. Absence without leave during action, once; an officer giving liquor to a soldier and making him drunk, and while he was drunk wrecking a car, hurting individuals, and completely destroying a very valuable automobile. Those are two that I recall. There were cases involving offenses like that.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. On the part of officers?

Gen. SUMMERALL. On the part of officers and soldiers. I recall only one officer being tried. The cases were generally those of soldiers.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Can you state how many cases you reviewed while you were a divisional commander?

Gen. SUMMERALL. I can not. The cases, taking both divisional and corps, would make a very small number.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. As compared with regimental and lower commanders, the number would be very small?

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes. As a brigade commander I had a number of summary court-martial cases to act upon; and then there were some summary courts of the division and corps headquarters, too. But the total number was never very large, because we did not have any large number of trials.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Could you approximate the number of cases that came to you for approval or disapproval as division commander or as corps commander?

Gen. SUMMERALL. No, sir; I could not.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Your functions there would be to approve or disapprove, as the officer who appointed the court?

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes; or to do any of the other things that the reviewing authority has the power to do, under the law.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Can you give any idea how many sentences you disapproved, and your recommendations in those cases?

Gen. SUMMERALL. No; but it would be very few; not over two or three, perhaps.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you remember ever sending a case back after a party had been acquitted by a general court-martial, and directing a reconvening of the court?

Gen. SUMMERALL. I do not think I ever did that, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I am glad to know that, General. I think that is the most un-American part of the whole system.

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes; I think so.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And it subsequently led the President, I think, to issue a general order to forbid that course—convicting a man after he had been acquitted by a court.

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The number of cases was very much larger which came up to a regimental commander?

Gen. SUMMERALL. Undoubtedly.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And the captain of a company appointed a court too, did he not?

Gen. SUMMERALL. I think not, sir. I do not think we ever had any companies isolated enough for that. They were always with the regiments.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. So that was probably the lowest appointing commander?

Gen. SUMMERALL. The regimental commander was probably the lowest appointing commander.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Have you any idea how many sentences went up to the regimental commanders in your division for approval or disapproval?

Gen. SUMMERALL. No; I would not know that, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You could not, therefore, tell how many cases were approved or how many disapproved?

Gen. SUMMERALL. No, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You, of course from the very nature of your duties, could not examine into any other cases than those which came to you from divisional courts or corps courts?

Gen. SUMMERALL. No, sir.

Senator WARREN. You were in command of a brigade for a time. Was your experience there of any importance to consider with the other?

Gen. SUMMERALL. Only for the summary court, appointed by the brigade commander. As brigade, division, and corps commander I had summary courts for minor offenses, and very light punishments.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Shall I ask him a few questions, Mr. Chairman, or am I interrupting you?

Senator WARREN. No; not at all. There is no need that there should be continuity on either side, I think. We do not embarrass you by breaking in occasionally, General?

Gen. SUMMERALL. No, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I would not like to interfere with any course that you have mapped out.

Under the construction placed upon the act, or rather under the law, section 1199 of the Revised Statutes of the United States—

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN (continuing). The Judge Advocate General has no power other than to review a case that comes to him, and to send it back to the commanding officer with advice only. Assuming that the court had jurisdiction to try the case and that the proceedings were regular, the Judge Advocate General says that he has no power to reverse, modify, or review a sentence. Do you not think that there should be, somewhere, this power of examining a case and reversing or modifying it?

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes; I think that would be a very good thing. I think it should be vested in the Military Establishment, somewhere—in the higher authority.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. There seems to be a consensus of opinion everywhere that there ought to be somewhere this reviewing authority and this power to reverse or to modify or to change a sentence. Even the American Bar Association committee, the majority of that committee, recommend something of that kind; but they recommend the suggestion which the Judge Advocate General has made, that that final reviewing authority should be in the Commander in Chief. The minority committee of the American Bar Association recommend rather along the line of the British system. The Kernan report recommends some reviewing authority, but the Judge Advocate General has held that he had no such reviewing or revisory authority. You think that it ought to exist?

Gen. SUMMERALL. Oh, yes, sir; I do.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The great difference between Gen. Ansell and Gen. Crowder is right here: Gen. Crowder insists that he has no revisory power, but only advisory power, while Gen. Ansell insists that under the law as it exists, the Judge Advocate General possesses power not only to revise but to modify or change. Have you ever examined into that?

Gen. SUMMERALL. No, sir; I never have examined it, and I do not think that the Judge Advocate General is the one to exercise that authority except in his capacity as a legal officer of the War Department. I think that the functionary who does that should be a person who exercises command, like the Secretary of War or the President of the United States.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; but that leaves it altogether in a military status.

Gen. SUMMERALL. I think it should be. It is an element of command, I think.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In the last analysis that would leave the power, then, vested in the Chief of Staff, because he is the legal adviser, or the adviser in matters military, of the Secretary of War, and so of the Commander in Chief.

Gen. SUMMERALL. Except that it would seem to me that the Judge Advocate General of the Army would occupy a similar relation to the Secretary of War or the President that the judge advocate of a division or a corps holds to the commanding officer of that unit.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What objection have you to the British system, where the judge advocate general is disassociated from the army—that is, is a civilian—and holds his position for life?

Gen. SUMMERALL. The only purpose of discipline is to maintain troops in a condition for combat. The people who train and maintain them in condition for combat, and who employ them in combat, are the people who exercise command. If the basis of their employment in combat, which is discipline, is taken out of their hands, I do not think that our Army will be in a state fit for combat.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Was not the British Army in pretty good fighting condition, so far as discipline was concerned?

Gen. SUMMERALL. They fought well; there is no doubt about that; and they did well. I do not know what their administration of military justice is.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did you ever compare the discipline of that army with ours?

Gen. SUMMERALL. I have been in the British Army and I have seen them. I think they have very good discipline.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You spoke about being advised that there was some reviewing authority here somewhere that you approved of.

Gen. SUMMERALL. That is, I approve of the principle.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you know what that consists of?

Gen. SUMMERALL. No, sir; I do not know what it is.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Or who functions in it?

Gen. SUMMERALL. No, sir; I do not know what it consists of.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Have you in mind the so-called clemency board?

Gen. SUMMERALL. I think it is called that; yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That has been established since the armistice.

Gen. SUMMERALL. I do not know its history or its functions.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes. The difficulty with such a board is here, General: Take a man who has been convicted, say, before a court-martial. There may have been evidence admitted against him which was wholly inadmissible; or there might have been circumstances that were not considered by the court. Now, he is convicted by a military court. He is a criminal in the eyes of the law. There is no appeal for him from that. If his case gets to the Judge Advocate General, and the Judge Advocate General and the clemency board recommend clemency in his behalf, it simply disposes of the unexpired portion of the sentence. There is no way to get rid of the stigma of the conviction. Do you not think that that power ought to be lodged somewhere?

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes; if a man has been unjustly subjected to the disabilities and disadvantages that go with conviction, he certainly is entitled to restitution.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. There is no means under the law, as I understand it, to get rid of it now.

Gen. SUMMERALL. Our whole purpose is to do justice. I think we all want that, and there ought to be some way of accomplishing justice if injustice is done, so far as it is humanly possible.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you deem the imposition of severe sentences for minor infractions of the law as necessary in order to maintain discipline in the balance of the Army?

Gen. SUMMERALL. No, sir. On the contrary, I think that the only purpose of punishment is to vindicate discipline; to have it exercise a deterrent effect.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. As to the individual or as to the mass of the Army?

Gen. SUMMERALL. As to the mass; and as to the individual, too, as a part of the mass.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The degree of an offense in the military service is bound to vary with the conditions under which the offense is committed. An absence without leave at a military post now, around Washington, for a day, say, would be a very minor infraction; but there are other conditions where it would become a very serious offense, in war. In the face of the enemy, for example.

Gen. SUMMERALL. In the face of the enemy, yes, sir. And yet that man might have had no intention of deserting or of evading his part in the fight; he is not a coward, but he takes it into his head to go away and see his brother in another command. Yet he subjects himself to very severe punishment; so that in the military service we are compelled to differentiate degrees of the same offense, and we have got to consider from a military viewpoint, in the interests of the service and of the country, the conditions under which the offense was committed as well as the offense itself. In any case the punishment, of course, should not be any more severe than is necessary to vindicate discipline and to act as a deterrent.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Then you do not believe in the doctrine of imposing sentences in terrorem, to frighten the balance of the army? That is, if a man was guilty of a minor infraction of the law, to impose a heavy sentence against that individual in order to terrify the balance of the army against the commission of the same offense?

Gen. SUMMERALL. No; that is not my conception of discipline, at all. You do not impose these things to terrorize people, but in order to bring to their minds the gravity of them so that they will see that the offenses are so serious that they must not be committed; and the punishment should be a punishment intended to be served as commensurate with the offense itself.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What would you say about sentences imposed here by the Army in training, in the United States, of 10, 15, 25, and 50 years for absence without leave? Can you conceive of those offenses being grave enough to require such a sentence?

Gen. SUMMERALL. That is a new idea to me, sir. I would not have thought of such sentences.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think you would, General; but that condition has prevailed. There are cases where long-term sentences have been imposed for absence without leave for a few days, and sometimes a very heavy sentence had been imposed against a man where a lighter sentence was imposed against another for some time of absence without leave.

Gen. SUMMERALL. Those inequalities are bound to result, within limits, I think, under any system; but their differences should not be so great as to work a marked injustice on the men who suffer the more severe punishment.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did you ever see a case where a court imposed a heavy sentence against a man with the feeling that it would not be served; that leniency would be exercised?

Gen. SUMMERALL. Only where that sentence was mandatory. Only where the court considered it its duty to impose a sentence proportionate to the offense committed, although there may have been extenuating circumstances in the commission of the offense. That is the exceptional case, but I believe it has happened.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Speaking of letting enlisted men compose a part of courts under the court-martial system, you think it would not be wise to do that?

Gen. SUMMERALL. I think it is unwise, Senator.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you think it would be unwise if the judge advocate who attended the trial was not a member of the court, was not the prosecutor representing the Government, nor was he representing the defendant, but simply acting as the legal adviser, being there to steer the court, composed of commissioned officers and enlisted men, along the right legal course? Do you not think that the enlisted man could serve there under such instructions and guidance and leadership just as well as he could serve on a jury?

Gen. SUMMERALL. He could be guided by this adviser just the same as any other members of the court. But I am of the opinion that there are many things which will arise, in which he would not be as qualified to act as the officers.

I am of the opinion that he could be advised, and could be benefited just as any officer by the advice, but I do not think that the effect on the administration of justice would be in any way improved, and I do think that it would tend to a lessening of the efficiency of a court.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. There was some testimony before the American Bar Association Committee that wherever sergeants were placed on a court, their disposition was to impose severer sentences on the enlisted men.

Gen. SUMMERALL. I want to admit that in my statement. There is no doubt about it. There is no doubt about it, Senator; because I have the highest opinion of and the best relations with my soldiers, but I do not think that they belong on a court-martial.

Senator WARREN. Will you state your opinion as to what would be the result, General; whether it would result in less severity or greater severity?

Gen. SUMMERALL. I think it would result in greater severity.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. General, pursuing that thought a little further with reference to having the judge advocate disconnected with the court but simply sitting as a legal adviser of the court: One of the things that developed before the American Bar Association Committee—and I think it has developed before this committee—is where a prisoner is being defended by an officer of lesser rank acting as counsel, that counsel being called upon to cross-examine a superior officer on the stand, he was forbidden by the officer to cross-examine him touching questions affecting his veracity.

Gen. SUMMERALL. I think that would be a very exceptional thing. I never have experienced it, and certainly would not have allowed it on a court. Counsel has full right to perform all of his duties regardless of relative rank.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It ought to be so.

Gen. SUMMERALL. It is so, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is the only case I know of, that one case.

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes, sir. I dare say there have been exceptional cases where almost every kind of abuse could be pointed out, but in the great mass of cases we tried, I believe that the intention and the practice was to secure a fair and impartial trial, and justice, with consideration to the person being tried.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you have in mind many cases where the commanding officer, the officer who appointed the court, sent cases back with instructions to the court to reconvene and convict?

Gen. SUMMERALL. I do not recall any such case, Senator. It may have been, but I recall none. The reverse is correct.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is, to reduce the sentence?

Gen. SUMMERALL. Well, to reconsider the findings with reference to certain points. It might also carry a change in the sentence.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. Chairman, I interrupted Gen. Summerall. He was calling attention to the changes in the Articles of War, and I got off on another branch of the subject, here.

Senator WARREN. We shall allow him to proceed in his own way. I should like to get a little more emphasis upon one point. I understand from the general that he believes an enlisted man, no matter whether he is a private or a noncommissioned officer, in performing his duties before a court as attorney, we shall say, for the accused, has the same respect and attention as if he had a commission?

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes, sir.

Senator WARREN. Then if, in the examination of witnesses before courts on matters on which they might have had personal complaint, it seemed to this committee to be proven that in some cases there had been a rather continuous effort to cut them out, you would think it was more because of the personal nature of the man than because of the fact that he held a subordinate position, would you?

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes, sir. Such action is wholly inconsistent with the status or the duties of the members of a court, to restrain counsel or restrict him in any proper line of action, and it should subject a court to very serious censure on the part of the reviewing authority.

Senator WARREN. As to leniency, the particular points that the witness has brought up are the differences on mooted questions, one as to the service of enlisted men on courts-martial, and another, that of having a final court outside of the military.

Senator LENROOT. A military court of appeals.

Senator WARREN. And some other matters. I would like to have you, if you will—because Senator Lenroot was out of the room at the time and I fear he may not have time to read this record—repeat what you said about a court to appeal to as a matter of final appeal.

Gen. SUMMERALL. I said that there should be a power of review, and that it was very desirable in my opinion that it should be vested in some element of the military command; that nothing connected with our courts-martial should be taken away from the command which is responsible for the training and the employment of the troops in combat; that instead of putting it in the hands of the Judge Advocate General, it is my opinion that it should be vested in the Secretary of War or the President; and that I should assume that the relation of the Judge Advocate General to the Secretary or to the President would correspond to the relation of a judge advocate at a division or corps headquarters or an Army headquarters to the division, corps, or Army commander.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But the difficulty of that proposition, General, lies here: There have been over three hundred thousand court-martial cases between the time we went into the war and the time of the armistice, and it would be a physical impossibility for either the Secretary of War or the President to review these cases.

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes, sir; and that would apply to this court, I think, that is mentioned here, also. I calculated it would have had something over 50 cases a day. It would be necessary to empower certain commanding officers or the commander in chief of the Army in the field to carry out this function. I think, with the army in France, it is probable that justice was arrived at within all human possibility by the method that was followed there.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did the Judge Advocate General with the American Expeditionary Forces over there undertake to review and reverse and modify the decisions of the several courts-martial, from corps courts down to regimental courts?

Gen. SUMMERALL. I think that general court-martial cases were reviewed.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. When you say "reviewed" do you mean reviewed, reversed, or modified?

Gen. SUMMERALL. They approved or disapproved a great many.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I think if our Judge Advocate General had exercised the same authority and had placed the same construction on the law, this bill would not have been proposed.

Gen. SUMMERALL. I think you will find that he disapproved a great many of them.

Senator LENROOT. In case of disapproval, then what happened over there with the case?

Gen. SUMMERALL. Well, I presume the man was restored to liberty.

Senator LENROOT. Then do I understand you to say that the commanding officer exercised the jurisdiction to set aside the verdict of a court-martial?

Gen. SUMMERALL. That is my understanding.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. May it not be that you are mistaken about that, for this reason: I understand that the cases, the sentences of general courts-martial, all came through military channels to the Judge Advocate General here, and he was the man who reviewed them.

Gen. SUMMERALL. I think you will find that they were first reviewed at the headquarters of the A. E. F.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I hope that you are right about it.

Gen. SUMMERALL. You will find that from the Judge Advocate General of the A. E. F.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Who was that officer?

Gen. SUMMERALL. Gen. Bethel.

Senator WARREN. We will have him before us later.

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes.

Senator WARREN. He is one of those we expect to hear to-morrow or next day.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes. I hope that is true. That is not my understanding about it. I hope that he assumed that right.

Senator LENROOT. I do not want to ask the general to repeat anything that he has said, that has already gone into the record, but if you have not stated it I would like to have you go into what way you think a military court of appeals would impair efficiency.

Gen. SUMMERALL. On the contrary, I think it would increase efficiency.

Senator LENROOT. I mean such a court as you object to.

Gen. SUMMERALL. My main objection is that the court constitutes no part of our chain of command, and I believe that any part of its functions should be an element of command because command is responsible for the employment of troops in combat, and I do not believe we ought to divorce our discipline, which is all that courts-martial are intended to accomplish, from the element of command.

Senator LENROOT. In saying that, do you assume that the court of military appeals would attempt to substitute its judgment for the judgment of the court-martial upon the facts, and in that way interfere with discipline, or do you have in mind that such a court would only undertake to exercise jurisdiction where prejudicial error had been committed by the court-martial.

Gen. SUMMERALL. It is rather difficult to say how the facts would be affected. We must assume that they would attempt to make the same judgment as to facts as the court itself made, although we receive different impressions from reading things from what we do when we hear them stated. I think the main difference would probably lie in the degree of punishment inflicted.

Senator LENROOT. Suppose this court is given no jurisdiction whatever to pass upon the facts other than to ascertain whether there was any evidence on which the court-martial might exercise its judgment, but that it would have no power to substitute its judgment as to the correctness of the finding of a court-martial upon the evidence as distinguished from the court-martial review as to whether the court-martial had actually committed prejudicial error in the conduct of the case?

Gen. SUMMERALL. If it was confined merely to the correction of error, there could be no objection to it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is the point I wanted.

Gen. SUMMERALL. But I understood its functions were very much more.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. No, that is it.

Gen. SUMMERALL. If it is confined to the correction of error of law, there should be no possible objections to it. On the contrary, it would be a very desirable institution, because we want to do justice, and if injustice is done we all want to correct it. I think that no people are so sympathetic with the soldier as the officers who serve with him—certainly in action, in combat—and far from wanting to do him an injustice, they are the ones who are the keenest to see that he gets justice, and leniency, even.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Whether the appellate tribunal is within the military establishment or whether it is composed of civilians, there ought to be a greater power of review than is now exercised by the appellate power?

Gen. SUMMERALL. I think so, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Because Gen. Crowder and those who stand with him insist that they have no appellate power; that they have no other right than simply to review a case; and that if the court had jurisdiction and the proceedings were regular, that ends it with them. But now there may have been prejudicial error, there may have been reasons why the case should be reversed, and yet there is no power to reverse. Do you not think that power should be lodged some place?

Gen. SUMMERALL. I do, indeed, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is my insistence about it, all the time, that there should be some power lodged somewhere to reverse for prejudicial error.

Senator WARREN. Do you find anything else that you want to speak of concerning differences between the present law and the proposed law?

Gen. SUMMERALL. There are a number of minor changes which are relatively unimportant compared to the other issues.

With reference to the investigation prior to the filing of charges, so far as I know, substantially what is required in the bill has been carried out, and I doubt very much if any embodiment in the law will secure a more thorough investigation than is now being made prior to the forwarding of charges. It is proper that they should be investigated and that there should be reasonable grounds for a finding of guilt before charges are sent forward.

I have before spoken of my feeling in regard to a prosecutor. I think there is no objection to an officer being detailed by the convening authority, subject to the convening authority, to assist the court in its functions, and if for any reason a judge advocate should be considered not qualified for that work, he might be an extra officer. But I would very much regret to see an officer detailed specifically to prosecute an enlisted man, in terms and intention. I think the effect on the morale of the command would be injurious, and I do not believe it is consistent with the spirit in which most officers engage in their duties as judge advocate.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is what I asked you about a while ago.

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It seems to me that the judge advocate who is appointed by the commanding officer has drifted into the attitude of a prosecutor.

Gen. SUMMERALL. Well, he does, many times, undoubtedly; but I still think we ought to preserve, as far as possible, the standard of justice to both sides in the conduct of a case.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Could not the judge advocate do that better—carry out your views, which are mine——

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN (continuing). Could he not carry out those views better if he were simply sitting there, not as a member of the court, not as a prosecutor and not for the defendant, but simply to watch the proceedings and advise the court as well as counsel as to the law of the case?

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes, perhaps he could; but still, I would not want to call the other man a prosecutor. I would want to call him a judge advocate, or some name that would not imply that he was there to prosecute the soldier.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It would not make much difference what you called him.

Gen. SUMMERALL. I think it would, Mr. Senator.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You do not want the judge advocate to be a prosecutor, and yet that is what he is. All the records that I have examined show that he is a prosecutor. Now, calling him a judge advocate does not remove the fact that he is a prosecutor.

Gen. SUMMERALL. I would like to encourage and endeavor to instill into the officers the other idea, that they are there to find out the facts and to bring about justice.

I can speak briefly of some of the minor matters here. I do not believe that it should be contemplated that a civilian counsel should be employed by the judge advocate, except in very special cases. I think the terms here are too general.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You mean for the defense?

Gen. SUMMERALL. For the defense, yes, sir. I think the terms as to the employment of such counsel are too general, and would result in a civilian counsel—this is at the bottom of page 13 and is part of article 22. I prefer the present system of challenges to that provided in article 23.

I prefer the present oath to that prescribed in article 24.

I think the addition in article 26 is very good to protect the accused from the plea of guilty when he is not guilty.

Article 28 I think is also a very good article.

Article 29 is a good article.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is in the proposed law?

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes, sir.

Article 34 I think is not desirable, in that there might be a reason why a case should be reopened, and I do not believe any great hardship is worked upon the accused by the time that elapses, generally.

between the finding of the court and the reviewing of the sentence. I prefer the present system.

I do not think we should limit the punishment for contempt as is done in article 25; although punishment for contempt is a very rare thing for a court-martial.

I take it that in article 36, the proportion has been changed to conform to the new compositions proposed in here for a court-martial. I prefer the present court composition and the present ratios for conviction.

The whole question of punishments in articles 47 and 48 and the subsequent articles I believe would be adverse to the interests of the service in many cases. In time of peace I feel that the President is quite qualified to prescribe the limits of punishment, and I believe the limits of punishment prescribed in time of peace have been reasonable and lenient. But in time of war I think it is very dangerous to restrict a court in the punishment, since the offense will vary very greatly with the conditions under which it is committed. With the revisory power vested in higher headquarters, as I think so many have agreed upon, the interests of an accused will be amply safeguarded, and I think it is better not to try to fix the punishment for each offense, as is done in criminal law, but to continue as it now exists.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. General, do you not think there ought to be a maximum penalty beyond which they ought not to be permitted to go?

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes; in time of peace. I think that if the punishments laid down here go into effect in time of peace it will result in greatly augmented sentences for offenses, unless the President should intervene and make a lower limit. I think these limits are much too great for times of peace.

On the other hand, in time of war there are many of them that would not be sufficiently great, and for the reasons I have stated before, I believe it will produce more harm in time of peace than it will in war. I think the authority of the President now to fix the limit in peace times is correct, and in war the power that will probably be vested in superior commanders to mitigate and change sentences will protect men from excessive and unjust sentences.

Senator WARREN. You had given an illustration before Senator Lenroot came in, looking, I presume, to the proposition where different grades of punishment were prescribed for two different parties that committed the same offense, only that one might commit the offense in the face of the enemy while the other might commit it entirely away from danger or combat. The General need not go over that again, I suppose.

Senator LENROOT. No; of course not.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. General, there are men in the Army—and I would place you in that category—who would see that the rights of the enlisted man and also of the noncommissioned officer were safeguarded and perfected; but there are men in higher command who do not do that. They have not the personal touch with the men that induces a man to look after these things. It is out of that state of things that these complaints grow.

Gen. SUMMERALL. I understand, sir, and I am just as anxious as possible to see anything done that will protect from injustice.

• Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It seems to me that a properly arranged and organized tribunal will do more than anything else in that direction.

Gen. SUMMERALL. I think it is the greatest relief to be hoped for. As I said in the beginning, if we can increase the number of legal officers in the Army so that we can supply the courts with better legal advice as judge advocates, or in any capacity that Congress sees fit to give them—and I prefer that which is now constituted—we will undoubtedly avoid many of the errors of law that have been committed and complained of.

Now it so happens that the troops I have been dealing with had many lawyers among them, and I believe it was the rule to have good lawyers as judge advocates of courts-martial and judge advocates of the divisions, corps, and armies.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That would not be true in time of peace?

Gen. SUMMERALL. In peace times it is not true.

Senator WARREN. Not to the same extent.

Gen. SUMMERALL. But the same severity of punishment would not exist. Punishments are always very light in peace times.

Senator LENROOT. I do not know whether I understood you correctly. I thought you said the President in peace times fixed the limits of punishment.

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes.

Senator LENROOT. Is that by law?

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes; the President fixes the limits of punishment.

Senator LENROOT. How do those limits compare with the limits set out in this bill?

Gen. SUMMERALL. I have not compared them, but I think these are very much in excess of his limits; and as I say, it will work, undoubtedly, a hardship on men in peace times, because I think you have intended these to be the limits for war.

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Senator WARREN. Would the matter you spoke of, the limits of the President, come through regulations from the War Department?

Gen. SUMMERALL. They are probably formulated in the War Department, but they come from the President.

Senator WARREN. You have them?

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes; and when a case is tried reference is made to the limit for that case.

Senator WARREN. That is fixed by law?

Gen. SUMMERALL. That is within his power.

Senator LENROOT. Are there any other limitations in the regulations themselves further than as to the punishment—as to the punishment in time of war?

Gen. SUMMERALL. No; there are no limitations in time of war.

Senator LENROOT. There are no limitations in time of war?

Gen. SUMMERALL. No.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It is entirely in the hands of the court-martial.

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes; and of the reviewing authority.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Of course that is the commanding officer?

Gen. SUMMERALL. The commanding officer that serves with troops.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You have served in peace time. Do you not find a great difference between the enlisted personnel now and in the peace-time army?

Gen. SUMMERALL. I do not find the difference to be serious as affecting discipline.. The men from our peace-time army that we took into the war were fine soldiers, and in fact they formed the backbone of our force until we got the new men in. The new men poured in and they are also fine men. I have a very high idea of all of our men. They respond, they have high ideas, good morale, and fine traits. I have a very high idea of our peace-time army.

Senator WARREN. Now, you were at article 50, were you not, when you were interrupted, in going through the bill?

Gen. SUMMERALL. I was at article 48. There I began the discussion of the limits of punishment.

Article 49 has very good provisions.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is, the new one?

Gen. SUMMERALL. The new one; yes, sir. But I think that a provision for this review by superior command is necessary rather than have it wait for the President himself. I believe it impracticable to send all these cases to the President.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In death sentences?

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes, sir; and the commander in chief approved a number and executed them. It had to be so. I think you will find that the commander in chief approved and executed a number.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. There were 10 executions during the war with the Expeditionary Forces, but those cases all came here.

Gen. SUMMERALL. There, again, I was not at the headquarters; but I am only telling what I understood. Gen. Bethel will enlighten you on that, and I think you will find that the commander in chief himself approved death sentences; and I think it is necessary.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Well, it may be. That was a matter of regulation. Up to the time of the execution of those Texas negroes, the commanding officer exercised control.

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But after the execution of those men, within 48 hours, there was a general order issued by the commander in chief requiring that before execution such cases should come here.

Gen. SUMMERALL. Article 50, "Mitigation and remission," does not deal with the loss of files. I have read that rather hurriedly, and on the whole I prefer our present system, that which was in use in this country.

Article 52 contemplates the reviewing in the War Department of general courts-martial cases and is virtually mandatory, because I think that no accused would request that his case be not reviewed.

I do not believe it is possible for one board of three men to review the cases that would arise in war. But aside from all that, I believe as I stated before that unless this decision is confined to questions of law it should be vested in the element of command. But I do not believe it should be confined to law. I think it should have power to approve, disapprove, mitigate, and reverse, and do all those things that a reviewing authority can do. By vesting it in the War Department a number of persons could be assigned to the work, and the decision made by the Secretary or the President, as is done by a division or a corps commander.

Senator LENROOT. Let me ask you right there, General, with reference to the competency of the same man or men, who might be entirely competent to pass judgment, from a military standpoint, upon a fact and mitigation, and so forth, but would not be competent to pass upon prejudicial error of law.

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes, it would require people who understood the law.

Senator LENROOT. Then if this reviewing authority were confined to the command would you say that there would be that review by competent authority of errors of law?

Gen. SUMMERALL. It would be necessary to install a considerable number of officers in some part of the War Department for this work. It would take a very considerable number of officers and they would have to be fairly competent in the law. But the principal is sound, and it is a matter of arriving at some working basis upon a very great scale.

With reference to the punitive articles they are practically the same as those that now exist, and my only objection there is the placing of the limit of punishment for each article; and I will state again that I believe the effect would be to greatly increase the punishment in time of peace and to unduly restrict the administration of discipline in time of war.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In my opinion it is better to punish a man who is actually guilty, and whom a properly constituted appellate tribunal had said had had a fair trial and was guilty—it is better to punish him with a 10 year sentence than to punish an innocent man or a man who has not had a fair trial with a one-year sentence.

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. This is, the appellate tribunal should see that every man has a fair deal.

Gen. SUMMERALL. Yes. The principal is sound, but it is a question of arriving at a working basis for it, and I do not believe the court here constituted could handle the cases.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The judge advocate general is the revisory power under the law now. He does not attempt to do it all himself.

Gen. SUMMERALL. That is true, and in principle I think the decision should be in the name of some element of command, like the Secretary of War or the President. The effect on the Army is better. We have to consider the effect on the Army, the confidence that the Army has in the agencies created, and the effect on morale of everything we do in the matter of discipline.

Senator LENROOT. Under the bill proposed, General, do you think there would be a review in practically all cases?

Gen. SUMMERALL. I do not think any soldier would ask not to have his case reviewed. I should advise every man to have his case reviewed.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Where it involved a conviction practically of a felony.

Gen. SUMMERALL. I should insist that whatever could be reviewed should be reviewed if the law gives the right. I think that the accused should have everything that the law allows him. I should discourage in every way requests not to have those cases reviewed.

I do not think I have anything more of material bearing, Mr. Senator.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. Chairman, may I put in the record the letter of Mr. Gardiner? You remember I tried to get him to come down, but he could not get here very well, and he wrote Mr. Wadsworth a letter giving his views on the subject of courts martial. May I have that put in the record?

The Chairman. Yes. That is all right.

NEW YORK, September 11, 1919.

Hon. JAMES W. WADSWORTH, JR.,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In response to your telegraphic invitation, I have the honor to submit to your committee, the following comments on the Senate bill relating to military justice.

I am somewhat familiar with the administration of military justice, having graduated from West Point, and having served three years at the Military Academy as an Instructor in law.

I would say at the outset that I regard the criticism of the existing system, more as a symptom than as a disease itself. The disease is seated much more deeply and is much more malignant than the mere matter of court-martial reform would indicate. The thing that is basically wrong, in my opinion, is the extreme distinction that prevails in the Army between the enlisted man and the officer. This distinction is practically the same as was drawn in feudal times between the serf and the overlord. I do not think that this is an extreme view; when an American Army was first formed, in prerevolutionary times, it adopted in entirety the code, the traditions, the customs and the laws that prevailed in England at that time. We did even worse than this; one of the first instructors or drillmasters in Washington's army was Von Steuben. Von Steuben was a German with all of the German ideals of military caste and military discipline, and it is a strange fact that there has been but little change in ideas in this country during the hundred and fifty years which have elapsed since that time. The whole idea might be called the cult of the shoulder strap. It is practiced at West Point in an extreme degree, and West Point has set the standard for the Army in this, as in other respects.

We must remember that it has not been many years since there were but relatively few officers in the Army who were not West Point men, and it is the ideas, traditions, and customs handed down by these men that have fixed the Army standard. The result has been the perpetuation of an entirely false idea of the relation that should exist between enlisted man and officer. We need go no further than to state that at West Point the nickname or cadet name for an enlisted man is "bum"; at least so he was known in my time at the Academy and I presume is so known yet. Because of the kingly origin of our military conception, we have come to regard military discipline as resting very largely on fear, and the club which engenders this fear is the court-martial. That this is true is shown by the testimony of Maj. Gen. Glenn, before a committee of the American Bar Association, sitting in Washington last spring, and the testimony of Maj. Gen. O'Ryan, given but recently, I think before your committee, whereas discipline should be the discipline of leadership, both of these distinguished officers have pleaded for a discipline based on terrorism or fear. The fallacy of this becomes immediately evident when we realize that if a man is kept within bounds only through fear, he will pass without bounds, the minute the thing that causes fear is removed. In other words, if Gens. O'Ryan and Glenn have the correct idea of discipline, that an American soldier is not to be trusted, except under the immediate supervision of an officer, that in spite of the testimony of these distinguished gentlemen, it is nevertheless true that the least number of court-martials is found in the best disciplined command. It is my opinion that there is an important piece of work to be done by your committee at West Point, and the worship of the shoulder strap at that place be destroyed, before the evil of the court-martial system can be entirely corrected.

To take up specifically the matter of court-martial, the specific failure of the army to do substantial justice to the man in the ranks, is due almost entirely to the failure of the Army to appreciate and apply the meaning of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in what is known as the Grafton case. Previous to this decision of the Supreme Court, an army court-martial was regarded as an executive agency, and as an executive agency was entirely within the control of the executive representative, who was the commanding officer. It was not regarded as a court of law at all. In the Grafton case, however, the Supreme Court decided that the court-martial was not an executive agency but was a congressional agency, and placed it on exactly the same footing, in this respect, with other courts created by Congress. The application of this principle, however, the Regular Army has always resisted, and they have resented any attempt which has been made to divest them of supreme power, even of the power of life and death, over the men under them. The result is that up to the present time, a commanding officer, by virtue of his position of command, exercises an almost unrestrained discretion, in deciding who shall be tried, the legal sufficiency of the charge, the legal sufficiency of the proof, the composition of the court, and all questions of law that arise during the progress of the trial. He falls but little short in fact of being judge, jury and lord high executioner, all in one. Thus questions of pure law are decided solely by the power of military command. In other words, we have in our court-martial system that very failing which is most positively antithetical to every principle of American Government. A so-called legal system, controlled entirely by men and not by law. It has been my understanding that it is this very thing that we sent our men to Europe to kill and destroy, and it is not a little painful to find that having destroyed it in Europe, there are many who would still retain it in America.

There are a few points in connection with this proposed bill that, from such experience as I have had, I am not entirely in accord with. I do not think that general courts, or in fact any courts, should contain enlisted men. As courts-martial are at present organized, junior officers are frequently, if not invariably, influenced by the opinion of their seniors on the court. This condition would be much aggravated if enlisted men, whether privates or noncommissioned officers, were to sit in such capacity. Moreover, such a step leans toward running one department of the Army to a soviet, and is, therefore, drawing too close to Bolshevism. It is my opinion that if through a proper legal code, adopted by Congress, wise restrictions are thrown around the power of military command, in its administration of military justice, there will be no need for such a radical and questionable change in the Constitution of the court. I think, therefore, that in this particular the bill goes too far.

In the matter of counsel, it has, of course, most frequently occurred that the accused was inadequately represented. I do not think, however, that this furnishes sufficient grounds for giving an accused, in all cases, a right to civil counsel, as such a provision in the law, may readily become the subject of great abuse. I do think, however, that in all cases where charged with offenses, the punishment for which may include death, life imprisonment, or dishonorable discharge from the Army, this privilege should be granted, as no man should be deprived of his citizenship without the most ample opportunity having been given him for his own defense.

Articles 62 and 64 in the proposed law are to me not consistent. In the first place, for a strictly military offense, such as disobedience of orders. I do not think that either the death penalty or life imprisonment should ever be possible in times of peace. In the second place, a military order given by a military superior is just as binding, and may be just as important, whether given by a commissioned or non-commissioned officer. I can see no reason, therefore, why in one case the maximum punishment should be death, and in the second place, six months.

In general, I think that the tendency of all amendatory laws should be to definitely and positively fix a status of a court-martial as a congressional agency; make it truly a court of law in which the rules of evidence, nature of offenses, the offenses themselves, and the punishing power of the court, in each case, be made as definite as possible. Right of review (and by the term of "review" I do not mean General Crowder's interpretation) should be definitely fixed along some such lines as that provided for in all the bill. I do not think, however, that it would be feasible for the accused to state his desire for a review before the court, as it can very readily happen that a court has been dissolved by the time the court sentence had been approved by the reviewing authority, and, of course, an accused would have no reason for wanting a review until the sentence was determined.

In conclusion, I would say that I hope to send you to-morrow a copy of Collier's Magazine containing an article by myself on this subject, which fully expresses my view.

Very respectfully, yours,

J. B. W. GARDINER.

(Thereupon, at 5.10 o'clock p. m., the committee adjourned, subject to the call of the chairman.)

ESTABLISHMENT OF MILITARY JUSTICE—PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF THE ARTICLES OF WAR.

---

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to adjournment, in the room of the Committee on Appropriations, at 10 o'clock a. m., Senator Francis E. Warren presiding.

Present: Senators Warren (chairman), Lenroot, and Chamberlain.

Senator WARREN. Col. Rigby is here this morning, and we shall hear him now.

STATEMENT OF LIEUT. COL. WILLIAM C. RIGBY, JUDGE ADVOCATE, OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL.

Senator WARREN. Colonel, will you give the stenographer your name and rank?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. William C. Rigby, lieutenant colonel, judge advocate, at present on duty in the Office of the Judge Advocate General, room 129, State, War, and Navy Building; temporarily assigned to what is called the legislative section of the office.

Senator WARREN. Colonel, you have been on the other side, have you not?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes, sir.

Senator WARREN. How long did you serve over there?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I went over there, sailing on the 7th of April last, I think. I was not over there prior to that. I came into the service from civil life, from the practice of law, in August, 1918.

Senator WARREN. You came into the military service in August, 1918?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In August, 1918. I had been practicing law in Chicago, and I was assigned to duty in the Office of the Judge Advocate General, in the Military Justice Division of the office, and remained there until I left for Europe in April last.

Senator WARREN. Tell us of your service there.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I served in the different sections of the Military Justice Division, first in what was known and still is known as the retained-in-service section, reviewing the records of cases of the more minor character, where there was no dishonorable discharge, the man remaining in the Army.

Then I was transferred, after a while, to the disciplinary barracks section, reviewing cases of men sentenced to the disciplinary barracks.

From there I went to the penitentiary section and stayed in the penitentiary section for some time reviewing the cases of men sentenced to the penitentiary; and then I was transferred to what was known as the death and dismissal section, reviewing sentences of death and dismissals of officers, and I stayed there from, I think, November until I left, in April.

I was for a time chief or acting chief of that section, but about February was assigned to the work of examining the statutes and regulations and laws of Great Britain, France, and Italy, and that took me away to some extent from the work of the Military Justice Division proper, and I did not act as chief of the section after that.

Senator WARREN. Your work there was at different headquarters, or at the headquarters, or at Paris, or where?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In my work abroad an office was given me at Paris, from which I worked; and later on, just the last two or three weeks, I was given an office in the headquarters at London when I was there a good deal.

Senator WARREN. At London, did you say?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. At London, the last two or three weeks I was there, I had an office given to me. My work was chiefly at Paris and London, and then from those headquarters, visiting, where I needed to, the British and the French armies, and some little examination was made of the Belgian system.

Maj. W. Calvin Wells, Judge Advocate, was assigned to me as assistant. He had formerly been on duty in the Judge Advocate General's Office as the chief of the disciplinary barracks section of the Judge Advocate General's Office, and was sent to France and assigned to duty in the Military Justice Division of the office of the Acting Judge Advocate General at Chaumont, I think in January, and then was assigned to assist me after I went over there. I think he came to me in May. I might say that Maj. Wells has now returned to civil life. He is really quite a well-known, really a distinguished lawyer of Mississippi. I think that he was the secretary of Senator Harrison's campaign committee during the last senatorial campaign.

He did most of the work of the investigation in Belgium. I went up with him the first time, and we met, together, the Secretary of War and the other officials in Belgium; and then I turned that work over to him, so that really my information as to Belgium, outside of the statutes and regulations, comes to me from Maj. Wells's report.

Investigations outside of those countries were simply made by correspondence through military attachés who procured for me laws and regulations, and some rather fragmentary information in Italy, Switzerland, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, and Norway; and I was given some translators in the Paris office to translate them. That was all that I could do with that work.

Senator WARREN. I judge from your testimony that you know something of the administration of military justice in the English Army and in the French Army?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes, sir.

Senator WARREN. And in Belgium?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes.

Senator WARREN. If you feel free to tell us, what can you say as to the comparison of the American system, under the laws as they stand, with the systems of foreign countries?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I had thought possibly it might be most convenient to take it up somewhat by sections, and perhaps with relation to some of the things in the pending bill which is before you. I wondered how you would want it.

Senator WARREN. Well, Colonel, you are before this committee to inform the committee what your judgment is, based, of course, upon your experience, as to the necessity of changing our present Articles of War and how to change them, and we have before us the bill, which you have seen, which has been introduced by Senator Chamberlain. Of course you are familiar with the laws as they stand. I presume that Senator Chamberlain will understand, with other Senators, that if his bill is perfection, we want that, and if it is not perfection, and there is any way to improve that bill as well as to better the system, this subcommittee, of course, is open to hear about it. Am I right on that?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I would ask, Senator, whether in your judgment it would not make my testimony more valuable for me to take one section, say, as to the composition of the court, and speak of that.

Senator WARREN. Proceed in your own way.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I think perhaps I might make it a little briefer and clearer in that way.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What are you going to take up, the Senate bill 64 with the comparative print of the present law, or how do you take that up?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Suppose that I speak first of the composition of the court as it is proposed in this bill and as I find it in France and Great Britain.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Will you refer to the articles as you go along?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Certainly, sir. The articles of the proposed bill, of Senate bill 64, that as I understand relate to the composition of the court, are——

Senator WARREN. That bill is intended, as I understand it, to reform the entire Articles of War—the entire system of military justice.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Not all. Some sections are wholly unchanged.

Senator WARREN. Yes; I understand; but the intention is to substitute this bill in place of the present Articles of War, although some parts of the Articles of War are inserted unchanged in this bill. Am I right about that?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Senate bill 64 is a redraft of the Articles of War and has many articles which are not changed at all.

Senator WARREN. Yes, exactly; but the bill is intended to take the place of the Articles of War, although part of the Articles of War are unchanged in the bill.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. As I understand it, the outstanding features of the changes in the courts are those mentioned in articles 4, 5, 6, 10, 12, and 23, relating to special and general courts. The outstanding proposed changes as I see them are:

First, to make a court of a fixed number, of eight I think it is, for the general court and of three for the special court, instead of a number which may vary, as at present.

Second, that in both the general and the special court, enlisted men may be members, and in the case of the trial of privates by general court, at least three members of the court sitting on the trial must be private soldiers, and in the trial of a noncommissioned officer or warrant officer, at least three members of the court must be noncommissioned officers or warrant officers; and in the special court there must be at least one member who is a private or a noncommissioned officer under similar circumstances.

Third, that there is to be with every general or special court an officer to be designated as "judge advocate"; but whose functions are radically different from those of the present trial judge advocate; who is not to be a prosecutor at all, but is rather to be a judge.

Fourth, that the court is not to impose sentence, but is only to make findings of guilt or innocence, and that the judge advocate is to have the power and the duty to approve, or approve in part, and I assume to disapprove, the findings; and the power to impose sentence; and also the power to suspend in whole or in part any sentence which does not extend to death or dismissal.

Fifth, that the rulings and advice of the judge advocate are to govern the court.

Sixth, as to the organization of the court, the change is also that, instead of the members of a court being appointed directly by the convening authority, the convening authority is only to name a panel from which the judge advocate is to organize the court at the trial.

Seventh, that the right of peremptory challenge is to be introduced.

Before going on to compare that with the analogous laws, or the corresponding laws, rather, of the other countries, I might say that there are, as I understand it, really two different philosophies as to the functions and the powers and duties of courts-martial; and, as I understand it, the basic purpose of Senate bill 64 is to radically change the philosophy, if one may use that word, of the system of administration of military justice. I think it has been said by some that the proposal is to change the system from a system governed by the authority of military men to a system governed by law. As I understand it, I think it would be fairer to say that it is to change the authority in the matter of the government of the court and the administration of military law, as proposed, from military men to lawyers. I suppose that the law is—well I mean this, that somebody has to administer any system of law, so that in the end it is a question of who administers it. Everyone, even its severest critics, will concede that the present system is a system, in a sense, certainly, of law. It is administered within the laws provided; and the proposed system would have to be administered by somebody.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It is administered practically by the commanding officer.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The commanding officer has the power to approve or disapprove the sentences of courts. The men on the courts are officers of the Army.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Appointed by the commanding officer?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes, sir; and the proposal, as I understand it, is to place the predominating authority, both in the trial and in the review afterwards, in the hands, not of the commanding officer or of a military man, but of a civilian lawyer.

Turning, then, to the composition of the court as we find it in the other armies, first as to the place of the proposed judge advocate, I do not find that there is any other system, so far as my investigation went, that gives to any such officer nearly as broad powers, as are proposed in Senate bill 64. These proposed powers, to a large extent, are experimental; in the sense that they never have been tried before in any other army. The supposed model for the proposed judge advocate is, of course, the judge advocate of the British general court-martial.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Right in that connection, would you state who the judge advocate general is in Great Britain; how he is appointed, his tenure of office, and whether or not he is in the military establishment?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Surely, Senator. I was, of course, speaking of the judge advocate attached to the court, what we would call the trial judge advocate; but I will be glad to answer the other now.

The judge advocate general of Great Britain is a civilian. He is appointed by patent from the Crown and is appointed for life, with the right to retire at 65 years of age. He receives a salary of 2,000 pounds per annum. The present judge advocate general is Hon. Felix Cassel, who was a barrister, and a distinguished barrister, before his appointment. Judge Cassel went into the army on the outbreak of the war. I think he was a captain. On the death of Sir Thomas Milvain, the former judge advocate general, Judge Cassel was, in October, 1916, appointed judge advocate general, and has served as such since.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He resigned his commission in the army?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. He resigned his commission in the army, because he is required to be a civilian.

Senator WARREN. I understand the judge advocate general has a life commission and is retired at 65 years of age.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes.

Senator WARREN. He receives a salary of £2,000 a year?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. That is my understanding of the salary. The powers of the judge advocate general are advisory only, at present. They have, indeed, always been advisory; although it seems that up to about 1905, because the judge advocate general in those days tendered his advice directly to the Sovereign, his powers were sometimes considered as almost what might be called executive; although even then they were really only advisory, and back in 1873 Sir George Jessel and Lord Coleridge gave an opinion that the powers of the judge advocate general were only advisory. Nevertheless, in practice, in those times he sometimes acted almost as though the office were executive. And sometimes, in those days, his advice to the Crown was in the form "must be quashed," and similar expressions. In those days the judge advocate general had a seat in Parliament, and, as I said, tendered his advice directly to the Crown, so that the advice may, in a sense, have been almost tantamount to orders.

That was changed when Sir Thomas Milvain was appointed judge advocate general, in 1905. There was no change in the statute, but a change in the wording of the patent under which he took office. He was not made a member of Parliament, or rather he resigned his seat in Parliament, because he had been a member in Parliament before that time, and he became simply the adviser to the war department; and that new plan was continued on the appointment of Judge Cassel.

The result of it is that the judge advocate general is no longer a direct adviser to the Sovereign; but now reports in a "minute," as it is called, to the "S. of S.," which means the secretary of state for war. But that does not go directly to the secretary of state for war; it goes, in fact, to the deputy adjutant general, by whom it is reviewed, and who is the one who tenders the advice to the secretary of state for war. The present deputy adjutant general is Maj. Gen. Sir B. E. W. Childs, K. C. M. G., C. B.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Does he exercise the power, in reviewing the minutes of the judge advocate general, to reverse or change the recommendations of the judge advocate general?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes, sir; that is, he may or may not agree with the judge advocate general. Of course, in the great majority of cases he agrees. I have, among other papers, a signed statement by Gen. Childs, which I might put in evidence if you care to have it, in which that, among other points, is covered. I have the original here, which really belongs to the files of the Judge Advocate General's Office, but I have a copy which I can furnish.

Senator WARREN. Very well.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Gen. Childs speaks in the highest possible terms of Judge Cassel. Perhaps I misspoke when I said that I had a signed interview from Gen. Childs. What I have is the transcript of the interview, corrected by Gen. Childs personally, and his letter returning it with his corrections. He did not personally sign the interview; but he returned it with a letter with his corrections. I will put the letter in with the transcript.

(The document and letter referred to are printed in full in the record as a part of Lieut. Col. Rigby's statement of Sept. 25, 1919, infra, pp. 455-468.)

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Before leaving that branch of the subject, have you the laws fixing and defining the duties and powers of the judge advocate general in Great Britain?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Will you have that put in the record?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I will be glad to do so; there is really not very much about it in their statutes and regulations; that was one reason why I got these authoritative statements from Judge Cassel and Gen. Childs, which I am going to put in. And I will put in here also copies of some letters and "minutes" given me as specimens by Judge Advocate General Cassel, showing in just what form his advice is tendered, both as to charges before trial and upon reviewing the record after trial. I am putting in copies of three letters advising upon charges before trial and of seven "minutes" containing recommendations of the judge advocate general after trial. These are all copies of actual documents except that names are deleted. You will observe that the letters concerning charges before trial are not signed by Judge Cassel himself, but by his "military assistant." This is in pursuance of his policy of so dividing up the work in his office that the same man will not pass upon the charges before trial and also upon the record of the case after trial. In selecting the "minutes" of recommendation after trial, of which I have quite a number, I have chosen these seven, which, I think, fairly represent the different classes of cases that most often arise. I am putting in two general court cases, one where confirmation is recommended and one where it is not; two district courts-martial; and three field general court cases. In reading them you will notice that the judge advocate general tenders his advice in the form of an "opinion" in very much the language that a lawyer would use in giving an opinion to a client as to a title to real estate. His usual formula is, "In my opinion the evidence did not justify a conviction, and accordingly the proceedings should not be confirmed"; or, "I am of opinion that the conviction should be quashed and the accused relieved from all the consequences of his trial."

BRITISH LAWS AND REGULATIONS RELATING TO THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL.

REFERENCES OF CHARGES TO JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL BEFORE TRIAL.

12. At home stations in all cases of fraud the charge and summary of evidence must be submitted to the judge advocate general before the trial is ordered. This does not apply to cases of simple theft. (King's Regulations, par. 561A; printed in the Manual of Military Law, p. 396, as Note 12, to sec. 17 of the Army act.)

2. In the case of a general court-martial in the United Kingdom, the charge sheet and summary of evidence should invariably be submitted by the convening officer to the judge advocate general before the court is convened. (Note 2, to Rules of Procedure, 17; Manual of Military Law, p. 580.)

HISTORY OF THE OFFICE OF JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL.

58. By the side of the civilian officers above mentioned (i. e., secretary of war, third secretary of state, secretary of state—W. C. R.) there was the purely military administration, which remained under the direction of the sovereign as commander in chief, assisted by a board of general officers, till the establishment of the office of the general commanding in chief in 1793. The administration of military law was, however, checked by the judge advocate general, a privy councillor, and usually a member of Parliament and one of the ministers of the day, who advised the sovereign on the legality of the proceedings of courts-martial. (See Clode's Military Forces of the Crown, Ch. XXVII.) The office of the judge advocate general, having ceased to be paid, was, in 1892, made nonpolitical, and was, from that date down to 1905, held by the president of the probate, divorce, and admiralty division. In that year, on a new appointment being made to the office, the position of the judge advocate general was considerably altered. He is now a permanent official under the orders of, and acting as legal adviser to, the secretary of state; he is no longer a privy councillor, nor does he advise the Crown directly. (Manual of Military Law, p. 161.)

TRIAL AND AFTER.

103. The powers and duties of a judge advocate are as follows:

(b) At a court-martial he represents the judge advocate general. (Rules of Procedure, 103B; Manual of Military Law, p. 629.)

In the case of a general court-martial in the United Kingdom, the warrant to the convening officer does not give him power to appoint a judge advocate. Application must be made to the judge advocate general for the necessary authority. (Rules of Procedure, 101, note 1; Manual of Military Law, p. 629.)

165. The original proceedings of a court-martial, purporting to be signed by the president thereof and being in the custody of the judge advocate general, or of the officer having the lawful custody thereof, shall be deemed to be of such a public nature as to be admissible in evidence on their mere production from such custody; and any copy purporting to be certified by such judge advocate general or his deputy authorized in that behalf or by the officer having such custody as aforesaid, to be a true copy of such proceedings or of any part thereof, shall be admissible in evidence without proof of the signature of such judge advocate general, deputy, or officer; and a secretary of state, upon production of any such proceedings or certified copy, may, by warrant under his hand, authorize the offender appearing therefrom to have been convicted and sentenced to any punishment, to be imprisoned and otherwise dealt with in accordance with the sentence in the proceedings or certified copy mentioned. (Army act, sec. 165.)

592. When a general court-martial is held at home the proceedings are to be transmitted by the judge advocate direct to the G. O. C. in C. who convened the court, and the latter will forward them, together with his recommendation and remarks, to the judge advocate general. If the sentence awarded is one which requires to be confirmed by His Majesty the King, the judge advocate general will transmit the proceedings to the secretary of state for war for confirmation by His Majesty. If the sentence awarded is one which does not require confirmation by His Majesty, the judge advocate general will, after review, return the proceedings to the G. O. C. in C. for confirmation or such action as may be necessary, and, after completion, the G. O. C. in C. will forward the proceedings to the war office. If a general court-martial is held elsewhere, the proceedings will be forwarded to the officer having power to confirm the findings and sentences of general courts-martial, who, if from any cause he has no power to confirm the finding and sentence of that particular court-martial will forward the same to the judge advocate general for transmission to the secretary of state for war for confirmation by His Majesty. (King's Regulations, par. 592, as amended by Army Order No. 110, Mar. 17, 1917.)

SPECIMENS OF LETTERS FROM "MILITARY ASSISTANT" OF BRITISH JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL, ADVISING AS TO FORMS OF CHARGES AND REFERENCES OF CASES FOR TRIAL.

JULY 1, 1919.

Upon the evidence submitted, I am of opinion that the first charge (now submitted under section 40) should be laid under section 6(1) (b) framed as follows:

"Leaving his picquet without orders from his superior officer, ———, in that he. ——— at ——— on the night of the ——— whilst acting under the orders of ———, and in command of a picquet of the ———, left his picquet without orders to do so."

In support of this charge ——— must state clearly that the accused was acting under his orders, that he gave the accused no order to leave his picquet on the night in question, and that no one else had authority to give such order.

The evidence on the charge of drunkenness is not strong nor is it, in my opinion, sufficient to justify trial upon the second charge submitted under section 19 of the army act as now amended in blue pencil, unless one, at least, of the witnesses for the prosecution is prepared to state on oath that, in his opinion, the accused was drunk.

Otherwise the evidence outlined in the abstract is in order.

Kindly submit the name of a suitable officer for appointment to act as judge advocate at the trial.

H. D. F. MACGEAGH,
Lieutenant Colonel, A. A. G.

JULY 18, 1919.

The General Officer i/c Administration.

If, as appears from the evidence, the accused was at the time of the alleged offense attached to the royal air force, he would be subject to the air force act, as modified by section 179A of that act amended by the air force act (statutory amendments) order, 1919 (A. M. W. O. 603/19) and not to the army act. Before advising on the case it will be necessary for me to be definitely informed whether or not the accused was in fact attached to the royal air force, and to have before me a copy of the order of attachment, if any.

Documents returned herewith. Kindly resubmit.

K. MACMORRAN, Captain, S. C.,
For Lieutenant Colonel A. A. G.,
Military Assistant.

JULY 22, 1919.

The general officer commanding in chief, ———.
Second Lieut. ———.

Upon the evidence in the summary I am of opinion that the accused should be tried upon a charge under section 15 (1) of the army act in substitution for the charge submitted under section 9 (2), framed as follows:

"Absenting himself without leave, ———, in that he, ———, at ———, on the ———, absented himself without leave until the ———."

There is a discrepancy in dates between the evidence of the second and third witnesses. It would appear that the date to which Capt. ——— refers is the 24th of June and not the 23d. He should make this clear at the trial.

Otherwise the evidence as amended is in order.

Formal appointment of ——— to act as judge advocate at the trial is forwarded herewith.

H. F. MACGEAGH,
Lieutenant Colonel, A. A. G., Military Assistant.

SPECIMENS OF "MINUTES" ADDRESSED BY BRITISH JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL
TO "S. OF S.", THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR.

S. of S.

Herewith I forward proceedings of a general court-martial held at ——— on the ——— for the trial of ——— an officer of the regular forces, who was tried on the following charges:

1. Deserting His Majesty's service, ——— in that he, ——— at ——— on ——— absented himself from the ——— until apprehended by the civil power at Cork on the ——— dressed in plain clothes.

2. When concerned in the care of public money fraudulently misapplying the same, ——— in that he, ——— at ——— on ——— when he was concerned in the care of ——— the property of the public being the proceeds of three cheques for ———, ——— and ——— drawn upon public accounts applied the same to his own use with intent to defraud.

The accused was found guilty of both the charges and sentenced to be cashiered and to be imprisoned without hard labor for one year.

I have the honor to inform you for the information of His Majesty the King that the charges were well laid, that there was evidence to justify the findings of the court, and that the sentence was according to law.

The recommendation of the ——— is attached.

F. CASSEL, J. A. G.

J. A. G.'s OFFICE.

March 28, 1919.

S. of S.

Herewith I forward the proceedings of a general court-martial held at ——— on the ——— for the trial of Second Lieut. ———, who was tried on four charges, as follows:

1. Behaving in a scandalous manner unbecoming the character of an officer and a gentleman, ——— in that he ———, at ———, on ———, in exchange for £1 (one pound) in cash, gave ——— a check for £1 (one pound) on Messrs. Holt & Co., army agents, well knowing that he had not sufficient funds in the hands of the said agents to meet the said check, and having no reasonable grounds for supposing that the said check would be honored when presented.

2. An alternative charge under section 40.

3. A similar charge under section 16, relating to a check for £12, given to Lieut. ——— at ——— on ——— in payment of his mess account.

4. An alternative charge under section 40.

who was found not guilty of the first, second, and fourth charges and guilty of the third charge, and was sentenced to be cashiered.

I have to point out that in my opinion the evidence did not justify a conviction under section 16 of the Army act and that accordingly the proceedings should not be confirmed.

The recommendation of the general officer commanding in chief, ———, is attached.

S. of S.

In forwarding the proceedings of a district court-martial held at ——— on the ——— for the trial of Pvt. ———, I have to point out that there was no evidence before the court that Maj. A. either on ——— or on ——— gave any orders to the accused as alleged in the charges.

In these circumstances I am of opinion that the conviction on both charges should be quashed, and the accused relieved from all the consequences of his trial.

F. CASSEL, J. A. G.

SEPTEMBER 12, 1918.

S. and S.

In forwarding the proceedings of a district court-martial held at ——— on the ——— for the trial of Corpl. ———, I have to say that in my opinion the evidence before the court did not justify a conviction on a charge of desertion.

In these circumstances I am of opinion that the conviction should be quashed and the accused relieved from all the consequences of his trial.

I desire to add that there was no evidence before the court that the accused ever received A. F. 33959 and a free warrant.

AUGUST 14, 1918.

S. of S.

In forwarding the proceedings of a field general court-martial held at ——— on the ——— for the trial of Pvt. ——— I have to say that in my opinion upon the evidence given at the trial the accused could not reasonably or safely be convicted of willfully maiming himself.

Moreover, A. F. W. 3428 was not admissible in evidence and was prejudicial to the accused.

In these circumstances I am of opinion that the conviction on the first charge should be quashed and the accused relieved from all the consequences of his trial.

F. CASSEL, J. A. G.

AUGUST 15, 1918.

S. of S.

In forwarding the proceedings of a field general court-martial held at ——— on the ——— for the trial of ——— and ———, both of the ———, I have to say that in my opinion the special finding amounts to an acquittal of the charge as laid and a conviction of a different offense.

Under these circumstances I am of opinion that the conviction should be quashed and each of the accused relieved from all the consequences of his trial.

F. CASSEL, J. A. G.

JULY 12, 1918.

S. of S.

In forwarding the proceedings of a field general court-martial held ——— on the ——— for the trial of ——— I have to point out that contrary to the provisions of section 54(2) of the army act the court, after having arrived at their finding and awarded sentence, proceeded to take further evidence upon reassembly for revision.

Under these circumstances I am of opinion that the conviction should be quashed and the accused relieved from all the consequences of his trial.

I desire to add that the order for revision is not attached to the proceedings, but it appears from the attached minute from the major general commanding ——— that the court was reassembled for that purpose.

F. CASSEL, J. A. G.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Have you a copy of the articles of war of Great Britain?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. They do not have articles of war in that form any more. Their articles of war were merged into the army act of 1881, I think, which has been reenacted ever since. What they have is the army act, the annual act; and then they have the rules of procedure, which are promulgated under a provision of the army act quite similar to our thirty-eighth article of war, providing that rules of procedure may be enacted by the sovereign and must be submitted to Parliament (army act, sec. 70); and with that they also have "King's Regulations," covering minor details, so that they have the three sources of authority or law. There is statutory authority to enact "articles of war," (army act, sec. 69), but it has fallen into disuse.

Senator WARREN. You say the army annual act?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes, sir.

Senator WARREN. That is not connected with the support of the army—that is, the appropriations of the army—is it?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. No, sir; that inherits from the old mutiny act of 1689.

Senator WARREN. Do they undertake to reform it or reenact it in an act every year?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. It is reenacted every year. It automatically goes out of force, and if it were not reenacted the Army would go out of existence.

Senator WARREN. It is enacted each year as it stands or as it may be changed?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It is reenacted every year.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Every year; and they do change it somewhat from time to time. In the 1919 reenactment they put in a change that Judge Cassel suggested, giving general officers disciplinary power over officers; so that for minor offenses it will not be necessary to bring an officer before a general court-martial.

Senator WARREN. Now, why is not that a good idea? Have you thought of that, Senator?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I think the British system is generally a good one. When you come to revise your statement made here, Colonel, refer us to the last annual act for the British Army, so that we may have it printed in the record, and the Senate may have access to the statute.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I will do so, Senator. In fact, I have them right here, so that I can easily refer to it. The army act was revised and reprinted as a whole in 1918.

(The act referred to is here printed as follows:)

ARMY (ANNUAL) ACT, 1919 (9 GEO. 5, CH. 11).

CHAPTER 11.

An act to provide, during 12 months, for the discipline and regulation of the army.

Whereas the raising or keeping of a standing army within the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in time of peace, unless it be with the consent of Parliament, is against law; and

Whereas it is adjudged necessary by His Majesty and this present Parliament that a body of forces should be continued for the safety of the United Kingdom and the defense of the possessions of His Majesty's Crown, and that the whole number of such forces should consist of 2,650,000, including those to be employed at the depots in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland for the training of recruits for service at home and abroad, but exclusive of numbers actually serving within his Majesty's Indian possessions; and

Whereas it is also judged necessary for the safety of the United Kingdom, and the defense of the possessions of this realm, that a body of Royal Marine forces should be employed in His Majesty's fleet and naval service, under the direction of the lord high admiral of the United Kingdom, or the commissioners for executing the office of lord high admiral aforesaid; and

Whereas the said marine forces may frequently be quartered or be on shore, or sent to do duty or be on board transport ships or vessels, merchant ships or vessels, or other ships or vessels, or they may be under other circumstances in which they will not be subject to the laws relating to the government of His Majesty's forces by sea; and

Whereas no man can be forejudged of life or limb, or subjected in time of peace to any kind of punishment within this realm, by martial law, or in any other manner than by the judgment of his peers and according to the known and established laws of this realm; yet, nevertheless, it being requisite, for the retaining all the before-mentioned forces, and other persons subject to military law, in their duty, that an exact discipline be observed, and that persons belonging to the said forces who mutiny or stir up sedition, or desert His Majesty's service, or are guilty of crimes and offenses to the prejudice of good order and military discipline, be brought to a more exemplary and speedy punishment than the usual forms of the law will allow; and

Whereas the army act will expire in the year 1919 on the following days:

(a) In the United Kingdom, the Channel Islands, and the Isle of Man on the 30th day of April; and

(b) Elsewhere, whether within or without His Majesty's dominions, on the 31st day of July:

Be it therefore enacted by the King's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

1. This act may be cited as the army (annual) act, 1919.

2. (1) The army act shall be and remain in force during the periods hereinafter mentioned, and no longer, unless otherwise provided by Parliament: that is to say:

(a) Within the United Kingdom, the Channel Islands, and the Isle of Man, from the 30th day of April, 1919, to the 30th day of April, 1920, both inclusive: and

(b) Elsewhere, whether within or without His Majesty's dominions, from the 31st day of July, 1919, to the 31st day of July, 1920, both inclusive.

(2) The army act, while in force, shall apply to persons subject to military law, whether within or without His Majesty's dominions.

(3) A person subject to military law shall not be exempted from the provisions of the army act by reason only that the number of the forces for the time being in the service of His Majesty, exclusive of the marine forces, is either greater or less than the number hereinbefore mentioned.

3. There shall be paid to the keeper of a victualing house for the accommodation provided by him in pursuance of the army act the prices specified in the schedule to this act.

AMENDMENTS OF THE ARMY ACT.

4. In section 42 of the army act (which relates to the mode of complaint by officers), after the words "examine into such complaint, and" there shall be inserted the words "if so required by the officer."

5. In subsection (1) of section 46 of the army act (which relates to the proceedings upon investigation of a charge), after the words "for bringing the offender to court-martial," there shall be inserted the words "or, in the case of an officer below the rank of field officer, may refer the case to be dealt with summarily by a general officer under the provisions of this act."

6. After section 46 of the army act the following section shall be inserted:

"46A. (1) Any of the following authorities shall have power to deal summarily with a charge against an officer below the rank of field officer referred for that purpose, or for trial by court-martial, under the foregoing section of this act—that is to say, any general officer authorized to convene a general court-martial—and also, on active service, the general officer commanding in chief in the field, and any officer (not under the rank of major general) appointed for the purpose by him, or by the army council.

(2) The authority having power to deal summarily with the case may, with or without hearing the evidence, dismiss the charge, if he in his discretion thinks that it ought not to be proceeded with, or, where he thinks the charge ought to be proceeded with, take steps for bringing the offender to a court-martial, or may, after hearing the evidence deal with the case summarily by awarding one or more of the following punishments:

(a) Forfeiture of seniority of rank either in the Army or in the corps to which the offender belongs, or in both.

(b) Severe reprimand or reprimand.

(3) Where the authority having power to deal summarily with the case considers that he may so deal with the case, he shall, unless he awards a severe reprimand, or a reprimand, in every case ask the officer charged whether he desires to be dealt with summarily or to be tried by a court-martial, and if the officer elects to be tried by a court-martial, take steps for bringing him to trial by a court-martial, but otherwise shall proceed to deal with the case summarily.

(4) In every case where an authority has power to dispose of a case summarily, and decides so to do, the accused officer may demand that the evidence against him should be taken on oath, and the same oath or solemn declaration as that required to be taken by witnesses before a court-martial shall be administered to each witness in such case.

(5) An offender shall not be liable to be tried by court-martial for any offense which has been dealt with summarily under this section, and shall not be liable to be punished by a general officer under this section for any offense of which he has been acquitted or convicted by a competent civil court or by a court-martial."

7. Section 114 of the army act (which provides for the preparation of an annual list of persons liable to supply carriages and animals) shall be amended as follows:

In subsection (1A) the second paragraph shall be omitted.

After subsection (1A) the following subsection shall be inserted:

"(1B) With respect to horses, the following provisions shall have effect:

(i) It shall be the duty of the owner of any horse, and the occupier of any premises where horses are kept, to furnish, if so required, to the authority hereinafter mentioned before such date in each year as may be prescribed a return specifying the number of horses belonging to him or kept on his premises, and giving with respect to every horse such details as may be so prescribed; he shall also afford all reasonable facilities for enabling any horse belonging to him or kept on his premises to be inspected and examined as and when required by the said authority; if any person fails to comply with the said requirements of this paragraph, he shall be liable on summary conviction for each offense to a fine not exceeding £50.

(ii) The army council may, for the purposes of this subsection, make regulations prescribing anything which under this subsection is to be prescribed, and prescribing the forms to be used, and generally for the purpose of carrying this subsection into effect.

(iii) Regulations made by the army council may provide for excepting from the provisions of this subsection horses of any class or description specified in the regulations."

After subsection (3) the following subsection shall be inserted:

"(3A) If an officer is obstructed in the exercise of his powers under this section, a justice of the peace may, if satisfied by information on oath that the officer has been so obstructed, issue a search warrant authorizing the constable named therein, accompanied by the officer, to enter the premises in respect of which the obstruction took place at any time between 6 o'clock in the morning and 9 o'clock in the evening, and to inspect any carriages or animals that may be found therein."

For subsection (4) there shall be submitted the following subsection:

"(4) The authority for the purposes of this section shall be the army council or any authority or persons to whom the army council may delegate their powers under this section."

8. At the end of section 115 of the army act (which provides for the supply of carriages and animals in case of emergency) the following subsection shall be inserted:

"(10) A requisition of emergency issued under this section may prohibit, during such period as may be specified in the requisition, the sale and purchase of horses to or by any person other than a person appointed by the army council to purchase horses; and if any person sells or purchases or is concerned in the sale or purchase of a horse in contravention of such prohibition, he shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding one hundred pounds or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months, or to both such imprisonment and fine."

9. The following provision shall be added at the end of subsection (2) of section 131 of the army act (which provides for arrangement as to prisons with colonial governments):

"Notwithstanding anything in this act, a secretary of state may arrange with the governor of a colony that any person or class of persons enlisted in the colony shall, if sentenced under this act to penal servitude, be transferred to or kept in the colony and there undergo his sentence in any prison or place in which persons sentenced to penal servitude by a civil court in the colony can for the time being be confined or, if there be no such prison or place, in an authorized prison as defined by section 65 of this act."

10. (1) Where an order had, before the commencement of the army (annual) act, 1918, been made under section 145 of the army act authorizing deductions from pay, a further order may be made increasing the amount of the deduction to be made after the commencement of this act under the former order up to the limit authorized by section 10 of the army (annual) act, 1918.

(2) This section shall, notwithstanding anything in section 14 of the army (annual) act, 1904, come into operation, both within the British Islands and elsewhere, on the passing of this act.

11. Section 153 of the army act (which imposes a punishment for inducing soldiers to desert) shall be amended as follows:

(a) For the words "any soldier," "a soldier," and "such soldier," wherever those words occur, there shall be substituted respectively the words "any officer or soldier," "an officer or soldier," and "such officer or soldier."

(b) After the word "desert," wherever that word occurs, there shall be inserted the words "or absent himself without leave," after the word "deserting" there shall be inserted the words "or absenting himself without leave," and after the word "deserter" there shall be inserted the words "or absentee without leave."

12. Subsection (1) of section 156 of the army act (which imposes penalties in respect to the sale of military necessaries) shall be amended as follows:

(1) For the words "an officer or soldier or any person acting on his behalf" in paragraph (a), and for the words "an officer or soldier" in paragraphs (b) and (c) there shall be substituted the words "any person."

(2) After the words "or clothing" there shall be inserted the words "issued for the use of officers or soldiers."

(3) For the words "or of the person with whom he dealt being or acting for a soldier, or that the same was sold by order of the Army Council or some competent military authority," there shall be substituted the words "or that the same was sold by order or with the consent of the Army Council, or some competent military authority, or that the same was the personal property of an officer who had retired or ceased to be an officer, or of a soldier who had been discharged, or of the legal personal representatives of an officer or soldier who had died."

In subsection (2) of section 156 of the army act, for the words "to a penalty not exceeding five pounds" there shall be substituted the words "to the same penalties as are prescribed in the case of a contravention of the last preceding subsection."

13. After section 156 of the army act, the following section shall be inserted:

"156A. If—

(a) any unauthorized person uses or wears any military decoration or medal, or medal ribbon, or any badge, wound stripe, or emblem supplied or authorized by the army council, or any decoration, medal, or medal ribbon, badge, wound stripe or emblem so nearly resembling the same as to be calculated to deceive; or

(b) any person falsely represents himself to be a person who is or has been entitled to use or wear any such decoration, medal, or medal ribbon, badge, wound strips, or emblem as aforesaid; or such person shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £20 or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months:

"Provided, That nothing in this section shall be deemed to prohibit the wearing or supply of ordinary regimental badges or any brooch or ornament representing the same."

14. In paragraph (j) of subsection (1) of section 163 of the army act the words "or by whom the arrest" and the words "or arrest" shall be omitted.

15. The following paragraph shall be substituted for paragraph (3A) of section 175 of the army act.

"(3A) Officers of the territorial force other than members of the permanent staff, if on the active list at all times, and if on the territorial force reserve, at any time when they are doing duty with any body of troops for the time being subject to military law or are ordered on any duty or service for which as such reserve officers they are liable."

16. (1) Section 179A of the army act (which makes provision as to officers or airmen of the air force attached to or seconded for service with the regular forces) shall be amended as follows:

Paragraphs (a) and (b) of subsection (2) shall be omitted.

The following paragraph shall be substituted for paragraph (c) of subsection (2):

"(c) The finding and sentence of any general court-martial for the trial of any such officer or airman may be confirmed by His Majesty or by an officer authorized to confirm the findings and sentences of general courts-martial under the air-force act, and not otherwise, except that when such officer or airman, while subject to this act, is serving beyond the seas with a military force, and in the opinion of the general or other officer commanding that force (such opinion to be stated in the confirmation and to be conclusive) there is not present any officer authorized to confirm the findings and sentences of general courts-martial under the air-force act, the findings and sentences may be confirmed by a general or other officer authorized to confirm findings and sentences of general courts-martial under this act."

After paragraph (f) the following paragraph shall be inserted:

"(g) The power of a court-martial to inflict on an officer the punishment of forfeiture of seniority of rank shall include power to inflict a punishment of forfeiture of seniority of rank in the air force, or any corps or unit thereof, or both."

At the end of the section the following section shall be inserted:

"179-B. In the application of this act to officers of His Majesty's naval forces who are subject to military law, the power of a court-martial to inflict the punishment of forfeiture of seniority of rank shall include power to inflict the punishment of forfeiture of seniority of rank in the navy."

(2) The finding and sentence of any court-martial convened before the commencement of this act, under section 179-A of the army act, may, after that date, be confirmed in the manner provided for by this act.

17. In paragraph (e) of subsection (2) of section 180 of the army act (which relates to the application of the army act to His Majesty's Indian forces), after the words "court-martial," there shall be inserted the words "or where the case is dealt with summarily under the provisions of this act. the authority having power so to deal with the case."

18. (1) In paragraph (4) of section 190 of the army act (being the definition of "officer"), after the words "or part thereof," where they occur for the third time, there shall be inserted the following words:

"It also includes any officer of His Majesty's naval or air forces who is for the time being subject to military law."

(2) This section shall, notwithstanding anything in section 14 of the army annual act, 1904, come into operation, both within the British Islands and elsewhere, on the passing of this act.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Does that contain all that would ordinarily be termed articles of war?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. No, sir. You have to take with that these rules of procedure. There is the army act; with these amendments of 1919 printed in a separate pamphlet. Then with that you have to take the rules of procedure and the King's Regulations, and one or two separate statutes. Those are all collected in what they call the Manual of Military Law. The last edition of that is the one of 1914, which covers everything; and then you have to pick out from the circulars the amendments since 1914—amendments to the King's Regulations and amendments of the rules of procedure.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Have you those so that you can submit them?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Would you not like to have him leave them with us, Senator?

Senator WARREN. Yes; if you can get it all in concrete form, so that we may not have to spend a great deal of time in examining it. It looks as if it were rather involved, the way Col. Rigby states it. Please get it in the shortest form you can for us to examine. I think that it is highly important that we have access to it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I think I might make a compilation—in fact, I have already done that in connection with my report which I am getting up for the judge advocate general—of the regulations on the different subjects.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Of course, I do not wish to interfere now with your course that you have mapped out in your own way for addressing this committee, but I am anxious to ascertain the powers and the functions of the judge advocate general of Great Britain. You say that he was formerly an executive officer and later that function was changed?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. No; he was never an executive officer; but in the old days he may sometimes have been treated as almost so, in practice, up to 1905.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. As executive officer, he exercised the power of control over the sentences of court-martial?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The difference was that at that time he tendered his advice direct to the Sovereign, so that really there was no higher authority to check it over; whereas now he tenders his advice to the secretary of state for war through the deputy adjutant general, and it is checked over in every case by the deputy adjutant general.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What is the course of a sentence of a court-martial in Great Britain in the field? Does it go through military channels to the judge advocate general of Great Britain?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. When you say "in the field," you mean outside of the United Kingdom?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Because they make a distinction in that—between the United Kingdom and outside.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Outside, it goes to the confirming authority, who would probably be the commander in chief of the particular expeditionary force, although not necessarily; that is fixed by the patent or warrant issued by the Crown; but it would probably be the commander in chief of the expeditionary force. He would be advised by the deputy judge advocate general on his staff, who is appointed on the recommendation of the judge advocate general.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Is he a civilian?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. No; he is a military officer. He may be appointed from civil life. He may be a barrister, appointed to that position, but he is given military rank.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But the judge advocate general appoints him to attend each court-martial proceeding?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. No; not the deputy judge advocate general; no, sir. I am speaking of the review. Perhaps, to get it perfectly clear, I might begin with the history of a case and trace it through.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; I would like to have it.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. If you will allow me, before I do that, I want to say just a word more about the course of the proceeding through the deputy adjutant general's office, so as to have that complete at this time.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The record, after being reviewed, with the minute containing the recommendation of the judge advocate general, goes to Gen. Childs, as it is now; the deputy adjutant general. He always carefully and personally reviews the whole record, reads the whole record. What he says is that he has the very highest possible respect for the ability of Judge Cassel—speaks of him as a brilliant man, even said to me once in conversation that he considered Judge Cassel probably the foremost living military lawyer—but nevertheless he feels that it is his duty to himself examine the records, for two purposes; one, because he feels that he ought to examine them, and not pass them blindly; and the other, that by doing that he keeps in close touch with the discipline of the Army, and he thinks that of value.

If he agrees with the judge advocate general, then it is passed to the secretary of state for war, as a matter of course, for signature. If he disagrees or does not fully concur, he usually has a conference with Judge Cassel; they get together and see whether they can not agree. If they can not agree, then it is referred to the attorney general for his opinion—at present, Sir Frederick E. Smith—and they usually get together and try to agree. If, however, they are unable to agree, the theory is that the opinion of the attorney general, rather than the opinion of the judge advocate general, will be the one that will guide the secretary of state for war, on the theory that the judge advocate general is the adviser only to the war department, whereas the attorney general is the adviser to the whole Government.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He is a civilian?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. He is a civilian, also; but the ultimate decision is wholly in the hands of the secretary of state for war, and he is not bound to follow the advice of either of them. He may do as he pleases.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Of course, in almost every case where it is purely a legal question, the advice of the judge advocate general is followed. There has been one class of cases on which Judge Cassel and Sir Frederick Smith differed, and there were quite a number of cases of that class which came up during the war, and of course all of those went in that way—that is, the judge advocate general was overruled on all of these cases. Outside of that particular class of cases, there were very few where, on legal questions, they differed.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Does the judge advocate general assume the right to reverse a decision of a court-martial?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The Sovereign has the power to quash, as it is called, at any time; and after confirmation the judge advocate general may advise what they call quashal. That may come up better with relation to tracing a case through the courts outside of the United Kingdom, because that is the kind of case where that power more often comes in. In the United Kingdom, general court cases are all submitted to the judge advocate general, before confirmation, because the Sovereign is usually the confirming authority for general courts within the British Isles.

Senator WARREN. The British secretary of state for war corresponds to our Secretary of War?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes, sir. The present secretary of state for war is Winston Churchill.

Senator WARREN. He is like the commander of the army, who relies upon the military authorities here; and I presume the Sovereign there would rely upon the military authority there.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Of course, Winston Churchill personally signs without asking King George to sign; in most cases, at least, I take it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Now, as I say, the general course within the United Kingdom is that the record goes directly from the court to the judge advocate general.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Does that mean every record?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Every record of a general court within the United Kingdom.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Whether of an enlisted man or of a commissioned officer?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes; but, of course, you must remember that their general courts are practically all officers' courts. They scarcely ever use general courts for any other cases except officers' cases, except that, since the district court can not impose the death sentence and can not impose penal servitude (that is, a penitentiary sentence), the general court must be used where those sentences are contemplated. During times of peace the general court is practically never used except for officers' cases; because in time of peace they turn practically all civil offenses over to the civil courts for trial. During the war there have been, of course, some serious cases where it was anticipated that the death sentence would have to be imposed, or a sentence of penal servitude; but outside of those, they sent enlisted men before the district court.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. So that the system differs radically from ours, in time of peace, in that infractions of law on the part of enlisted men are turned over to the civil courts for disposition?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. For what we call civil crimes; yes, sir. But that is not restricted to enlisted men. They would turn over an officer charged with a civil crime, to the civil courts.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Like larceny or embezzlement?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes, sir. I can not quote now the statistics since the war began, because of the confidential character in which they were turned over to me by the British authorities, but for the nine years prior to the war I have examined the statistics, from 1905 to 1913, inclusive; and there were but 12 general courts-martial held within the United Kingdom in that time, an average of only one and one-third cases per annum; which means, of course, that all of the work, practically, was being done by the district courts.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is, the civil courts?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. No; the district court is a military court, too. It is the court that corresponds in a way to our special court; but it may punish with confinement up to two years. They held on an average about 3,800 district courts-martial every year during that time, when they were holding only one and one-third general courts per annum. I am talking, now, about within the United Kingdom.

Senator WARREN. And both within the army?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes; and both within the army.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you know how many cases were decided by the civil courts?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. No, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But that differs essentially from our system, where the military courts, even in time of peace, have jurisdiction of all those things.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. It is rather a difference of policy and practice than of law; because their military courts would have the power, with some limitations as to the gravest crimes, to try these offenses by soldiers. But in practice, they do not. They turn over everything that they can in time of peace to the civil courts.

Now, of a general court outside of the United Kingdom, the record goes, as I said, to the general commanding, for confirmation.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is, cases against officers?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes, sir; of course, any general court. Of course, the general court is used outside of the United Kingdom just as within.

At the general court, whether sitting in the United Kingdom or outside of the United Kingdom, wherever the general court sits, there is attached to it a judge advocate. I might say, to be perfectly correct, that what I am saying does not necessarily apply to India. There is a separate judge advocate general in India, who functions separately.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. We do not care so much about that.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I will omit India, then.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The judge advocate is appointed by the judge advocate general?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Within the United Kingdom.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He attends these general courts outside of the United Kingdom?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Outside of the United Kingdom the commander in chief appoints the judge advocate. Within the United Kingdom the judge advocate would be appointed by the judge advocate general on the recommendation of the convening authority.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He attends all courts outside of the United Kingdom?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. At every general court, whether in France or elsewhere abroad, or in the United Kingdom, there is a judge advocate. We might call him a trial judge advocate for distinction.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He is not a member of the court?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. He is not a member of the court.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He does not participate in the trial?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. He does not participate in the trial; no, sir: that is, he is not a member of the court.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He simply advises the court as to the admissibility of evidence?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes, sir. Now, the history of that is this. Of course, the trial judge advocate arose out of an officer who was substantially the same as our judge advocate; because if you go back to the time when we took the old 1774 articles, and practically adopted them in 1776, they then contemplated the kind of trial judge advocate who was also a prosecutor.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The systems were the same?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The same, substantially.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. They modified theirs, and ours remain the same until now.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Theirs remained the same until in 1829, and in 1829 an act was passed permitting—not requiring, but permitting—the appointment of a separate prosecutor and providing that where such a prosecutor was appointed, in those cases the judge advocate should not prosecute, but should limit himself to advising the court. That left a double system running. That continued until 1860, if I remember correctly. I am quite sure it was 1860 or 1861. During that time there was, of course, a great deal of discussion, and in 1860 or 1861 the act was further amended forbidding the judge advocate from prosecuting in any case, which left him as simply the adviser to the court; and as the law has stood since, and in the form it now stands, he is the adviser to the court and is required to have substantially the same qualifications as to impartiality as a member of the court. He may be a civilian or he may be an officer. I have attended general court trials where a civilian was sitting as judge advocate, and I have attended general court trials where an Army officer was sitting as judge advocate; but in any event he would be a man skilled in the law.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He rules on questions of law and upon the admissibility of evidence and acts as general adviser to the court?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. It is not accurate to say that he rules. He does not do that. His powers and duties in that regard are fixed by rule 103 of the Rules of Procedure, which is not long, and I might perhaps read it here.

Senator WARREN. You may do so.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY (reading):

POWERS AND DUTIES OF JUDGE ADVOCATE.

103. The powers and duties of a judge advocate are as follows:

(A) The prosecutor and the accused, respectively, are at all times, after the judge advocate is named to act on the court, entitled to his opinion on any question of law relative to the charge or trial, whether he is in or out of court, subject, when he is in court, to the permission of the court.

(B) At a court-martial he represents the judge advocate general.

(C) He is responsible for informing the court of any informality or irregularity in the proceedings. Whether consulted or not, he will inform the convening officer and the court of any informality or defect in the charge or in the constitution of the court, and will give his advice on any matter before the court.

(D) Any information or advice given to the court on any matter before the court will, if he or the court desire it, be entered in the proceedings.

(E) At the conclusion of the case he will, unless both he and the court consider it unnecessary, sum up the evidence and give his opinion upon the legal bearing of the case before the court proceed to deliberate upon their finding.

(F) Upon any point of law or procedure which arises upon the trial which he attends, the court should be guided by his opinion, and not overrule it, except for very weighty reasons. The court are responsible for the legality of their decision, but they must consider the grave consequences which may result from their disregard of the advice of the judge advocate on any legal point. The court in following the opinion of the judge advocate on a legal point may record that they have decided in consequence of that opinion.

(G) The judge advocate has, equally with the president, the duty of taking care that the accused does not suffer any disadvantage in consequence of his position as such or of his ignorance or incapacity to examine or cross-examine witnesses or to make his own evidence clear or intelligible, or otherwise, and may for that purpose, with the permission of the court, call witnesses and put questions to witnesses which appear to him necessary or desirable to elicit the truth.

(H) In fulfilling his duties the judge advocate will be careful to maintain an entirely impartial position.

That defines his position, and it defines it, I think, fairly, as it actually is in practice.

SENATOR CHAMBERLAIN. That differs from our Judge Advocate General in that the practice as to the Judge Advocate General in our Army has grown to be that he is a man who represents the Government?

LIEUT. COL. RIGBY. You said "Judge Advocate General," Senator. You meant the judge advocate.

SENATOR CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

LIEUT. COL. RIGBY. It does. Our judge advocate is expected to prosecute, and also to some extent to represent the accused. It is, of course, very difficult to hold those two positions fairly, balancing the two interests; and in reviewing the records of cases, one can not help but be struck by that. Some judge advocates go to one extreme and are too favorable to the accused, and others go to the other extreme and are practically prosecutors.

SENATOR CHAMBERLAIN. The grave consequence of that is that if a court disobeys the advice of the judge advocate in Great Britain he subjects himself to civil damages, does he not?

LIEUT. COL. RIGBY. No; that is putting it a little stronger than it should be. The accurate way, I think, Senator, to state that, is, that in case an action for damages is brought, if the court is able to say that it did follow the advice of the judge advocate in acting as it did, that may, in a doubtful case, be a protection to them.

SENATOR CHAMBERLAIN. Otherwise, they incur the risk of a judgment?

LIEUT. COL. RIGBY. That is, if they do not follow his advice, in that case, the failure to follow the advice is not anything one way or the other; whereas it may be a shield to them if they can show that they followed his advice.

SENATOR CHAMBERLAIN. Have you finished with that regulation?

LIEUT. COL. RIGBY. I have finished with that.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Go right along.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. As I see it, the difference between the judge advocate under that regulation, and the proposed trial judge advocate under Senate bill 64, is that the British judge advocate does not by his rulings bind the court at all. He is only an adviser to the court. While the court are to listen to his advice, and are cautioned not to overrule it except for very weighty reasons, still the power resides in the court, and not in the judge advocate; and a court, of course, composed wholly of army officers; so that, in the last analysis, it is the military men, the Army officers, who have the power, advised by the impartial lawyer attached to the court.

Furthermore, the British court imposes its own sentence, instead of simply making a finding and letting the judge advocate impose the sentence, as is proposed in Senate bill 64; and the British judge advocate has no power to in any way approve, or to approve only partly, or to disapprove, the finding of the court—has no jurisdiction similar to that of a reviewing authority, or of a civilian judge. He has no office of that kind, at all. And he has, of course, no power to impose sentence.

Then, the British judge advocate has no power to suspend or modify a sentence, such as is proposed to be given to the judge advocate by Senate bill 64.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. They usually follow his advice, though, do they not?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Undoubtedly they usually follow his advice; but the decision lies with the military officers of the court and not with the lawyer who is the adviser. Pardon me, Senator, for interrupting you.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Before leaving that: Where is there lodged, anywhere in the military system of jurisprudence, the appeal jurisdiction? Is there anything—

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. You are speaking of the British system?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; of the British system.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Nowhere; any more than with us; except that there is a practice which you might call, in effect, a kind of appellate jurisdiction. There is nowhere in the statutes or in the regulations any appellate jurisdiction provided for; but, in practice, petitions are entertained by the War Office, really at any time after a conviction. A man may petition, or his relatives or anybody may petition for him, and that petition, if it involves any legal questions, as it usually will, is turned over to the Judge Advocate General for examination; and, in that case, Judge Cassel says in his statement here that he will again review the record in the same way as if it were coming up as an original case, although he has reviewed it before; and will tender a recommendation, if he thinks one ought to be tendered, to the Sovereign, through the secretary of state for war.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Does that take in the general courts only, or does it take in the minor courts also?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes; any petition will be examined; and he has the power, because the Sovereign of England has the full power to quash; so that there is, in effect, a kind of appellate power there.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. To quash or to modify?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes; to do anything with it.

Senator WARREN. How does the power of the commander in chief compare with that of the President of the United States to veto or quash and set aside, as they call it?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The power of the President of the United States is limited to clemency, after the sentence has once been finally approved, and confirmed, if confirmation be necessary.

Senator WARREN. To pardon?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. To pardon.

Senator WARREN. Or to a partial reduction of the sentence?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes; whereas the British Sovereign may exercise, really, by what is called "quashal," an appellate power, and wipe the whole thing out.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Where is the appellate power under our system?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Of that kind, there is, of course, no appellate authority after the final confirmation of the judgment.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. By the commanding officer?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. By the commanding officer; if he has power to finally confirm, or by the department commander, or by the President, as the case may be, in those cases which require additional confirmation.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. So that, as I understand it, there is really no appellate power vested in anyone, here, under our system?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Not in the sense of a power exercised after the regular review is finished and the sentence has been finally approved and confirmed; and at the request or petition or appeal, if you please, of the accused. We have, under our reviewing powers and confirming powers, a system of what has been called automatic review, under which every general court-martial record is reviewed, and I may say carefully reviewed, by lawyers attached to the staff of the reviewing authority, and then in the office of the judge advocate general. But that is a different thing, perhaps, from what would be strictly called appellate power.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Does the judge advocate general, even after these cases have been reviewed, assume to exercise any power over the sentence except a revisory power, except in cases where there is an entire lack of jurisdiction, or there have been errors in the trial?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Of course where there has been entire lack of jurisdiction, we can recommend setting the proceedings aside, just as can the British judge advocate general, and in any case, so far as the judge advocate general is concerned, there is not much difference, really, between our judge advocate general and the British judge advocate general; because the British judge advocate general, like our judge advocate general, simply recommends and advises the Secretary of State for War, or the commanding general; just as our judge advocate general recommends to and advises the Secretary of War or the President, or the commanding general, as the case may be. I think really that our power is quit analogous, and its method of exercise is quite analogous, to that of the British judge advocate general, in the review. His powers are advisory, and ours are advisory. I have submitted to you the forms of the minutes that they use. They are in the shape of recommendations. Ours are recommendations. The Secretary of State for War in Great Britain is not bound to follow the recommendations of the judge advocate general. The Secretary of War, the President, and the commanding general, as the case may be, are not bound to follow the recommendations of our judge advocate general.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. They usually do in both countries?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. They usually do in both countries, and there is usually not much difference between the percentages in which they follow them in the two countries. Perhaps the percentage is a little higher there, but it is almost unanimous with us.

I made some investigations as to those figures last winter, at the direction of the Judge Advocate General; and, as I remember it, it ran that something about 98 per cent of the recommendations of the Judge Advocate General for reversal or modification—anything of that kind—had been followed, both by the Secretary of War and the commanding generals, with us. I do not want to attempt to speak accurately, but it is around about that figure. Practically always, they follow the recommendations.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You were going to illustrate the proceedings over there by the progress of a case, from step to step.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes; and speaking of the general court in the field—because in the field and at war the general court is a thing that was but little used—I would rather use the field general court, which is the court that is used very largely. It is the usual trial court for the Army outside of the United Kingdom, in time of war. The field court has all of the powers of the regular general court. It is appointed in instances where the officer with the power to convene a general court finds that it is not practicable to appoint a full general court; and, therefore, he appoints a field court. The field court may consist of any number of officers, from three (3) up. It usually consisted, during the late war, of three (3) and sometimes of five (5). In emergency it might have but two members, but then it could not impose death nor penal servitude.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. All commissioned officers?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. All commissioned officers. Since September, 1916, they got into the habit of attaching to the field courts an additional member whom they called the "specially qualified member," who was a lawyer, and was a member of a body of officers which they created in September, 1916—lawyers, called "court-martial officers."

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. They were independent of the judge advocate that accompanied the field court?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. No judge advocate accompanies the field court at all, Senator; and it was to fill that gap in serious and difficult and complicated cases that this habit grew up of appointing an additional member of the court. So that, during the latter part of the war, when a general appointed a field court of, say, three officers, he would also appoint a fourth member, an officer who was a court-martial officer—that is, a lawyer. These court-martial officers were appointed under a circular. I think I have a copy of that little circular here. It is a war office letter. That was issued in September, 1916, by the war office.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You can just insert that in the record.

Senator WARREN. Yes.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I wanted to find it, if I could.

Senator WARREN. It is just a general order?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. It is, in effect, a general order. It is what they call a "War Office Letter of Instruction"; but it is the same thing as a general order of our War Department.

Senator WARREN. If you have it, you may insert it later.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes; I have it, and will read it in a few moments. But under that order this corps of court-martial officers was established, and as it finally came into practice, perhaps after some little time in practice, they attached two of those officers, as a rule, to every division. They would use one of them as a staff judge advocate and use the other one as this additional member of the field court.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Were they civilians?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. They were appointed from civil life, just in about the same way that our temporary judge advocates were appointed to the Judge Advocate General's department.

Senator WARREN. But they were commissioned?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. They were commissioned and were given field rank usually. They used them at home, also, by the way, as presidents of district courts-martial, and as general legal advisers to the commanding generals. In a division there would be appointed, as with us, quite a number of field courts—their field courts corresponding to our general courts in active service at the front. Then one court-martial officer would be appointed as the additional member of each of those field courts within that division. He was not required, and was not expected, to be present at every session of each court of which he was a member; but the regulations, which were finally, after some fluctuation, compiled in a "circular memorandum" gotten out August 1, 1918, provided that no case of a serious, difficult, or complicated nature should be tried without the presence of that "specially qualified member" of the court, the court-martial officer; but the little ordinary cases of absence without leave and the ordinary run of little stuff the court would try without his presence.

The commanding general—the convening authority, of course usually advised by his staff judge advocate in practice—directed what cases this "specially qualified member" should sit in at and should attend. I have, for instance, in my files, a telegram—that shows the way it was generally done—received by the court-martial officer in the Cologne district, directing him to be present on such and such a day at such and such a town for the trial of a case.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Did those courts try enlisted men?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. They tried enlisted men and officers.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It was practically the only court?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Not quite that; but it was the court that tried a great deal more than a big majority of the cases during the war, outside of the United Kingdom. There were some general courts convened in France, but not very many.

Now, at trials where that additional member was present, the regulations provided that he should advise the court on legal questions, in the same manner and with the same effect as their judge advocate at their general courts.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Under rule 103?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Under rule of procedure 103; so that he acted in a dual capacity. He was an ordinary member of the court and voted as a member of the court, but on legal questions he advised the court, the other members being free, under rule 103, to follow his advice or not, but being warned not to disregard his advice on a legal point except for weighty reasons.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The others being lawyers or not?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Probably not. They were Army officers.

Now, that system is said to have worked very well. You will see, in looking over Judge Cassel's statement, that they think very highly of it; and Judge Cassel expected to recommend it to their court-martial committee as a thing to be adopted as a permanent thing in the British Army. The "specially qualified member" of the court acted exactly the same as their judge advocate, except that he did not sum up in open court. Being a member of the court, that would seem unnecessary, and as a matter of practice he did not do it. I think, balancing between the two plans of the judge advocate who is not a member of the court and of the "specially qualified member" who is a member of the court, Judge Cassel is rather inclined to favor the plan of the judge advocate not a member of the court.

You will see in the statement that Judge Cassel makes that he recognizes that some arguments can be made on both sides; but, balancing them, his mind inclines rather that way, that is, toward the judge advocate. But, in any event, as to the plan of having this body of court-martial officers attached to the Army, they say it has worked well in practice; and it seems to be the opinion of officers, practically the opinion of every one that I have talked with, that it ought to be in some way or other perpetuated and made a permanent part of their military system. Was there something further on that?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. No; I think not.

Senator WARREN. If you have come to a pause, let me ask you this: Take these Army officers that are educated at West Point; what, if any, law course do they take?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Of course, I have no personal knowledge of that.

Senator WARREN. Perhaps I might put the question in another way. Is there an appreciable difference, in your judgment, as shown in these trials, in the knowledge of law of officers who have been graduated from West Point and of those who have gone in from civil life?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I should not say, Senator, that I could discern, in reading the records, any difference as to knowledge of law. I think it is fair to say that one can see something of a difference as to the mental attitude, one might say the sureness with which they sit in the saddle. In other words, as it seems to me, a good many of the judges in courts-martial without experience are not very sure of themselves, and are a little inclined—well, to put it that way, to "pass the buck." I have in mind a particular case that I remember when I was reviewing officers' cases, where an officer was charged with being absent without leave. I think he was gone five or six days. The circumstances were that he was directed to be away for a day or two. He was just reporting, and they had not quarters for him and sent him away temporarily, and he was taken down with the "flu"—it was while there was that epidemic of "flu"—and was sick in bed. He was sick, I suppose, was the reason, but, at any rate, he did not take the trouble to have anybody telephone, and no report was made of the cause of his absence, and he came back five or six days late. He was charged with absence without leave, and was tried. The court, of course, could have given him any sentence, from a reprimand up. They gave him the heaviest sentence possible, dismissal from the Army; and then turned around, and every one of them joined in a recommendation of clemency. Now, the only way that I could understand that at all, was that those men simply did not know what ought to be done, and they were giving the heaviest sentence possible, thinking it could then be cut down to what was right, forgetting that it had to go clear up to the President, through all the machinery.

Senator WARREN. There is nothing in the law requiring that kind of a sentence?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Nothing at all. It was simply one of those foolish sentences, because the men did not know what to do.

Senator WARREN. Another question along the same line: Have you observed, in the course of your service, differences as to severity or leniency in the courts predominated over by those fresh from civil life and those in the Army—those longer experienced, perhaps?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. No; unless one could deduce that from the statistics. It is pretty hard to tell; but it is true that for one reason or another during the progress of the war the sentences were getting heavier, and, of course, it is also true that the number of Regular Army officers sitting on the courts was necessarily progressively getting smaller in proportion as the Army increased in numbers. Now, whether those two things are connected, and how far they may be connected, I would not have any way of judging.

Senator WARREN. Another question: In selecting the court, it may or may not have been in the mind of the commanding officer to have a part of the court made up of experienced officers and the rest from civilian life. Were the courts generally made up of both elements, or was there an absence of such intent, and were the courts made up just as they happened to be?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I could not answer that question, except from general observation.

Senator WARREN. That is what I want.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. It seemed to me, from what I could observe, that in the earlier part of the war that was true. Of course, later on most of the regular men were overseas, and the courts here at home were necessarily made up almost exclusively of temporary officers. My own experience in reviewing records has been on this side. I have not reviewed any records overseas, so that I would not be able to know how that was after they got over there.

Senator WARREN. They are all here now.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes; they are all here now, and of course during the latter part of last year, during the time I was reviewing records here at home, there were very few Regular Army officers here at all to put on the courts.

I was going, then to pass to the French system as to the composition of the court, unless there was something further on the British system.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Before you pass from that: The records of all these general courts were made by stenographic reports?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Of the general courts, yes, sir. And, by the way, I have, if it should interest you, copies of quite a number of records that were given to me by the British Judge Advocate General's office and others, as samples of the way they do it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you have printed records?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. No, sir; they are typewritten. I forgot a little what I was going to do with them. I was going to trace the history of a field general court case for you.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I have, for instance, here, a printed verbatim copy of two field general court records. These happen both to be cases—both of them are actual cases—that were presented in the course of the testimony before the British Court-Martial Committee, and this particular document has been released by Judge Cassel from the confidential status, so that I am permitted to show it to you.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Why could we not put that into the record?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. That could go right in the record; that shows just how they do it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. If it is released from confidence, we would like to have it go in the record.

Senator WARREN. Let it be inserted here.

(The document referred to is here printed in full in the record, as follows:)

FORM FOR ASSEMBLY AND PROCEEDINGS OF FIELD GENERAL COURT-MARTIAL (A).

PROCEEDINGS.

At Chateau Combreux, Tournan, this 6th day of September, 1914. [If troops are on active service.]

Whereas it appears to me, the undersigned, an officer in command of — Army Corps, on active service, that the person named in the annexed schedule, and being subject to military law, has committed the offenses in the said schedule mentioned.

And I am of opinion that it is not practicable that such offenses should be tried by an ordinary general court-martial.

I hereby convene a field general court-martial to try the said person, and to consist of Col. J. K., president, O. C. — Army Corps troops; Capt. L. M. — Regiment; Lieut. N. O., — Regiment.

(Signed) H. L. SMITH-DORRIEN,
General Commanding — Army Corps.

First witness, C. D., being duly sworn, states: At Tournan on 6th September, 1914, about 8.15 a. m., I was in search of my bicycle which I had lost; and from information received I went toward the Medlin and found there the accused here present before the court, dressed in civilian clothes. I asked him what he was doing, he answered "I have lost my Army and I mean to get out of it," or words to that effect. I asked him where his clothes were and what regiment he belonged to. He said, "the — Regiment." I searched him and found on him the book which I produce. I conducted him to the place where he thought he had left his clothes, rifle, and cartridges. We found his clothes in a woodshed, the rifle and cartridges were missing. I took him to the Mairie and gave him up to the French police. I also produce his uniform, which is marked —, — Regiment.

Question by the accused: Did I say I wanted to get out of it, or, that I wanted to find my way out of it?—A. He said "I have had enough of it, I want to get out of it, and this is how I am doing it."

The accused declines to further cross-examine this witness, who withdraws.

Second witness, Captain E. F., — Regiment, being duly sworn, states:— When I arrived at Chateau Combreux, near Tournan, on the morning of the 6th September, 1914, I received a telegram (which I produce) and an order to go to the farm of Mons. —, Rue du —, Tournan, and arrest a deserter. I obeyed and then went to the Mairie, and was given the uniform and Active Service pay-book of Private A. B., — Regiment. The uniform was marked with his number. I took over the man and handed him to the Provost-Marshal. The man, the accused here present, was dressed in plain clothes, just as he is now, as well as I can remember, or perhaps he had a coat on. I asked him why he had run away. He answered that he left his bivouac this morning and remembered nothing more.

The accused declines to cross-examine this witness, who withdraws.

The prosecution is closed.

The accused, No. —, Private A. B., — Regiment, has no witnesses to call, but elects to give evidence on oath, and states after being duly sworn: I came out of bivouac with my regiment this morning; we halted on the side of the road. I fell out on the right to ease myself. The regiment went on before I was finished. I went on, but could not find them; got strolling about; went down into a farm, lay down in an empty house, and have a slight remembrance of putting some civilian clothes on, but do not remember exactly what happened until the man came down to arrest me. I was coming back then to see if I could find my clothes and my regiment, but I was taken to the police station before I could get back. When I was asked by the man who arrested me who I was I answered him at once and told him who I was.

Cross-examined by the prosecutor (A. P. M., — Army):

Q. Why did you say to C. D. you "wanted to get out of it and that was how you were doing it," or words to that effect?—A. When he came to me I told him that I was trying to get out of it, meaning that I had lost my way—wanted to get out of the place in which I was and wanted to rejoin my regiment. I can not say why I was in civilian clothes.

The court is cleared.

Exhibit II, the A. B. 64 of the accused is attached to the proceedings.

I certify that the above court assembled on the 6th day of September, 1914, and duly tried the person named in the said schedule, and that the plea, finding, and sentence in the case of such person as stated in the third and fourth columns of that schedule.

Signed this 6th day of September, 1914.

J. K.,
Colonel, O. C. — Army Corps Troops,
President of the Court-Martial.

I have dealt with the findings and sentences in the manner stated in the last column of the above schedule, and, subject to what I have there stated, I hereby confirm the above findings and sentences; and I am of opinion, with reference to the sentences of summary punishment mentioned in the schedule, that imprisonment can not, with due regard to the public service, be carried into execution.

(And I am of opinion that it is not practicable, having due regard to the public service, to delay the cases for confirmation by any superior qualified authority.)

Signed this — day of — 19—.

— CORPS.

Reference proceedings of F. G. C.-M. herewith attached, on No. 00000, Private A. B., — Regiment. I consider that the crime was deliberately committed, and can find no extenuating circumstances in the case, further than that the accused has served in France for more than two years. I recommend that the extreme penalty be carried out.

I. Commanding officer's opinion of character from a fighting point of view. Attached, marked "A."

II. Discipline of battalion. Very good.

III. Commanding officer's opinion as to deliberate nature of crime. Attached marked "B."

IV. I recommend that the extreme penalty be carried out for the following reasons:

(a) Private A. B.'s action was deliberate.

(b) He has previously attempted to desert unsuccessfully. See C. O.'s remark, 25.10.18.

(c) He is worthless as a soldier.

(d) During an action he deliberately abandoned his comrades.

To — Infantry Brigade.

Reference my previous memo. My reason for stating Private A. B.'s desertion was deliberate is, that this was the second occasion within two days, that Private A. B. had come away from the line without permission. Two days prior to the date on which he was charged, he had made his way back to — Echelon without permission and been sent up by the quartermaster. This, together with the man's record, induced me to form the opinion I have already stated.

I. No. —, Private A. B. has not got a good record in this battalion. His fighting value is nil.
III. I have very little knowledge of this man, but I have questioned several officers, and in their opinion his deserting was deliberate. When I remanded him for court-martial I considered his case one of deliberate desertion. I am still of that opinion.

FORM FOR ASSEMBLY AND PROCEEDINGS OF FIELD GENERAL COURT-MARTIAL ON ACTIVE SERVICE.

PROCEEDINGS.

On active service, this 6th day of October, 1918.
Whereas it appears to me, the undersigned, an officer in command of — Infantry Brigade, on active service, that the person named in the annexed schedule, being subject to military law, has committed the offense in the said schedule mentioned.
And whereas I am of the opinion that it is not practicable that such offense should be tried by an ordinary general court-martial.
I hereby convene a field general court-martial to try the said person, and to consist of the officers hereunder named.
Maj. Z. A., — Regiment, president.
Capt. V. M., — Regiment.
Capt. B. C., C. M. O., — Corps, H. Q.

(Signed) J. M. HOPE,
Brigadier General, Commanding — Infantry Brigade,
Convening Officer.

Schedule.

Number, rank, name, and unit of accused.	Offense charged.	Plea.	Finding and, if convicted, sentence.	How dealt with by confirming officer.
No. —, Private A. B., — Regiment.	AA, section 4 (7): "Misbehaving before the enemy in such a manner as to show cowardice."  Alternative charge.	Not guilty.	Not guilty.	Reserved. J. M. HOPE, Brigadier General, commanding — Infantry Brigade. Confirmed. D. HAIG, Field Marshal. 3d November, 1918.
	AA, section 12 (1): "Deserting His Majesty's service."	Not guilty.	Guilty. Death. Opinion unanimous.

TRIAL OF NO. —, PRIVATE A. B., — REGIMENT.

Prosecutor: Captain D. E., — Regiment.
Accused's friend: Lieutenant F. G., — Regiment.

PROSECUTION.

First witness, No. ———, Sergeant H. I., ——— Regiment, sworn, states:

On the night of the 2d September, 1918, the battalion was preparing to make an attack from ——— on ———. The accused was present at the assembly point. On reaching our objective, I called the roll and the accused was absent. I did not see the accused again until he was brought up at orderly room at ———. I can not remember the date; it was about seven or eight days later, I think. The battalion made the attack on ———.

Not cross-examined.

Not cross-examined by the court.

R. P. 83 (6) complied with.

Second witness, No. ———, Private J. K., ——— Regiment, sworn, states:

On the night of the 2d September, 1918, during the advance from ——— to ———, I was in charge of a Lewis gun team. The accused was attached to my gun team. During the advance we halted a short while in some shell holes. There the accused dumped his haversack, mess tin, and oil sheet. We got the order to take our final objective, but the accused hung back. On reaching our final objective, the accused was missing. I never saw him again until he was before the colonel. I should think it was about three weeks after. The accused was never with my team from the time he went away. There was practically no opposition to our advance. There were only a few German patrols knocking about. We took one prisoner. There was no firing on us whatever.

Cross-examined.—I did not speak to accused when he dumped his kit.

Not cross-examined.

Not cross-examined by the court.

R. P. 83 (6) complied with.

Third witness, Lieutenant L. M., ——— Regiment, sworn, states:

At 11 a. m. on the 3d September, 1918, I was at ———, echelon of my battalion at ———. I saw the accused. I asked him what he was doing there; in consequence of his reply I placed him under arrest.

Not cross-examined.

Not cross-examined by the court.

R. P. 83 (6) complied with.

DEFENSE.

The accused declines to make any statement in his defense.

AFTER FINDING.

The prosecutor, Captain D. E., ——— Regiment, duly sworn, states:

I produce certified true copy of A. F. B. 122, relating to the accused.

(Copy marked X, signed by president and attached hereto.)

Not cross-examined.

The accused calls no witnesses to character.

The accused in mitigation of punishment, states:

I joined the Army in early 1915. I was discharged in England as unfit. I rejoined the Army in the beginning of 1916. I came out in March, 1916. I have served in this country since 1916. I am 23 years old. Not married.

I certify that the above court assembled on the 19th day of October, 1918, and duly tried the persons named in the schedule, and that the plea, finding, and sentence in the case of each such person were as stated in the third and fourth columns of that schedule.

I also certify that (1) the members of the court, (2) the witnesses, were duly sworn.

A. F. W. 3996 has been handed to the accused by me.

S. S. 412 (b) was before the court.

Signed this 19th day of October, 1918.

Z. A.,
Major, President of the Court-Martial.

I have dealt with the findings and sentences in the manner stated in the last column of the Schedule, and, subject to what I have there stated, I hereby confirm the above findings and sentences.

W. GIBSON,
Lieut Col., Commanding ——— Regiment.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I also have now, and want to put in, if I may, this war office letter of September, 1916, creating the body of court-martial officers. It is war office letter No. 1852, entitled "Officers attached to certain formations for duty in connection with courts-martial, etc." And also a table prepared in the office of the British Judge Advocate General, showing the normal progress of a case through their different courts-martial.

Senator WARREN. Let that go in.

(The letter and table referred to are here printed in full in the record as follows:)

1852.—Officers attached to certain formations for duty in connection with courts-martial, etc.:

1. Approval has been given for the attachment to the staff of certain formations of an officer for duty in connection with courts-martial. List of formations printed as Appendix 159 to these Instructions.

2. The appointments are of a temporary nature and the officers appointed will be seconded from their units and will receive extra-duty pay at the rate of 2s. per diem.

3. The duties of this officer, who should be a barrister or solicitor and well acquainted with military law, will be to assist and advise the commander of the formation, to which he is attached, on all matters in connection with courts-martial, including the reviewing of the proceedings, as also any other questions of military law which may arise. When a court-martial is being convened in a case which appears to present unusual difficulty, the officer attached for court-martial duties may, if available, be detailed as a member of the court.

4. It is to be distinctly understood that this officer is not a staff officer and is not entitled to wear staff distinctions.

5. The names of officers whom it is desired should be appointed will be forwarded by the G. O. C. in C. of each command to the war office without delay, and will be considered with others.

6. A report should reach the war office from the G. Os. C. in C. by the 14th February, 1917, stating whether there is justification for the continuance of these appointments.

<sup>1</sup> It is quite impossible to make a useful estimate for courts held in a "forward area," as military exigencies are so various.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I would like to call attention to the third paragraph of that, in regard to the duties of the law officer.

(Lieut. Col. Rigby here read again paragraph 3 of the above letter.)

I should also like to put in the record this "Circular Memorandum on Courts-Martial for Use on Active Service," under date of August, 1918.

Senator WARREN. The whole of that is pertaining to the subject?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I think the whole of this might interest you.
This was practically a court-martial manual for these field courts-martial.

(The circular referred to is here printed in full in the records as follows:)

CIRCULAR MEMORANDUM ON COURTS-MARTIAL FOR USE ON ACTIVE SERVICE.

[For official use only. This document is the property of H. B. M. Government.]

FORMS OF OATHS.

SWEARING COURT.

(a) "You —— do swear that you will well and truly try the accused person (or persons) before the court according to the evidence; and that you will duly administer justice according to the army act now in force, without partiality, favor or affection, and you do further swear that, except so far as may be permitted by instructions of the army council for the purpose of communicating the sentence to the accused, you will not divulge the sentence of the court until it is duly confirmed, and you do further swear that you will not, on any account, at any time whatsoever disclose or discover the vote or opinion of any particular member of this court-martial, unless thereunto required in due course of law. So help you God."

WITNESSES' OATH.

(b) "The evidence which you shall give before this court shall be the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth. So help you God."

INTERPRETER'S OATH.

(c) "You do swear that you will, to the best of your ability, truly interpret and translate, as you shall be required to do, touching the matter before this court-martial. So help you God."

OATH FOR OFFICER UNDER INSTRUCTION.

(d) "You do swear that you will not divulge the sentence of this court-martial until it is duly confirmed; and that you will not, on any account, at any time whatsoever disclose or discover the vote or opinion of any particular member of this court-martial, unless thereunto required in due course of law. So help you God."

JUDGE ADVOCATE'S OATH.

(e) "You do swear that you will not, unless it is necessary for the due discharge of your official duties, divulge the sentence of this court-martial until it is duly confirmed; and that you will not, on any account, at any time whatsoever disclose or discover the vote or opinion of any particular member of this court-martial, unless thereunto required in due course of law. So help you God."

CIRCULAR MEMORANDUM ON COURTS-MARTIAL.

This pamphlet, S. S. 412 (b), takes the place of S. S. 412 (a).

The distribution is much wider than was the case with S. S. 412, but it should be clearly understood that this fact in no way alters the incidence of responsibility for the correctness of court-martial procedure. Convening officers will continue to be solely responsible for the legality of charges, evidence, etc., and will insure that their staff officers are fully qualified to give them all the assistance required. The fact that a unit is in possession of the pamphlet in no way diminishes the necessity for strict supervision at every stage of a case.

Convening officers will see that a copy is laid before every court-martial.

Commanding officers of all units, to which copies are issued, will take steps to insure that all officers under their command make themselves acquainted with the contents.

If a copy is lost, the unit concerned will at once apply to the Publications Department, Army Printing and Stationery Services, Boulogne, for a copy in replacement.

S. S. 412 (a) is canceled.

The notes and instructions contained in this pamphlet are in no sense intended to be a substitute for the Manual of Military Law, but are meant to supply information on points which are not dealt with in it, or are found in practice to require further explanation. Officers dealing with courts-martial will continue to make constant reference to the manual in the course of their duties.

The contents have been drawn up with regard to the conditions of warfare which have existed in France for a long time past and still prevail. If and when these circumstances change materially it may be found difficult or even impossible to comply with many of these requirements, local commanders will then have to take the responsibility for any departure from what is laid down, bearing only in mind that these instructions represent the standard to be kept in view and that only such deviations are to be made as are dictated by the circumstances of the moment.

Under present conditions a large proportion of officers have little or no knowledge of military law, and every opportunity should be taken to instruct them in court-martial duties. Staff officers, whose duty it is to deal with courts-martial, should therefore endeavor to give lectures or less formal instructions on the subject as frequently as possible. The pamphlet affords ample material for the groundwork of such lectures, to which examples and comments should be added.

PART I.—PROCEDURE BEFORE TRIAL.

NOTE.—Rules of procedure 1-104 do not, in terms, apply to field general courts-martial. Many of the principles underlying these rules, however, have to be observed in conducting the proceedings of courts-martial of all kinds, and whenever, in the course of these notes, it is necessary to refer to any principle which is clearly stated in a rule, a reference is made to that rule: not because of a legal obligation to follow the rule itself, but for convenience of reference.

New matter inserted in this edition is marked by a marginal line.

CH. I.—PRELIMINARY PROCEDURE.

1. Expedition.—Every effort should be made to expedite court-martial cases at every stage. The main object of a F. G. C. M. is to bring an offender to justice with the least possible delay, and for this reason the rules of procedure are specially framed to make the procedure of a more expeditious character than that of an ordinary court-martial. (See G. R. O. 3232.)

2. Arrest.—(a) An accused when under close arrest can only be called upon to perform such duties or obey such orders as are necessary for his personal cleanliness and well-being.

(b) When men are in the trenches, arrest is neither appropriate nor necessary, except in cases where a man is behaving in such a way that he would be dangerous unless an armed sentry were placed over him. If, therefore, when a battalion goes into the trenches, or a battery into action, it is thought desirable, having due regard to the circumstances of each case, to release soldiers from arrest for the performance of their duty, this may be done, without prejudice to rearrest when the period of duty terminates.

(c) In serious cases, if information is received that the witnesses will not be available for some time, the accused can be released from arrest, without prejudice to rearrest when it becomes possible to proceed with the case. Unless, however, it is imperative to try by court martial, the case should be disposed of summarily.

3. Application for F. G. C. M.—The following documents should be forwarded by the unit to the convening officer (usually an infantry brigade commander or an officer holding an equivalent command):

- (a) Summary or statements of evidence.
- (b) Proposed charges, whether in form of charge-sheet or otherwise.
- (c) Certified true copy of conduct sheet.

The use of unnecessary documents when applying for a F. G. C. M. should be avoided; e. g., duplicates of above, Army Form B. 116 (Form of Application for a Court-Martial), Army Form B. 296 ("Statement of character and particulars of service of accused"), lists of witnesses or routine medical certificates.

4. Summary or statements of evidence.—(a) For a F. G. C. M. a summary should be taken, if practicable, and in all cases, whether a summary is taken or not, sufficient statements in writing are required to show the convening officer and the accused the nature of the evidence which will be given by each witness. As a general rule it is not necessary to bring a witness from a long distance for the purpose of a summary, provided that a statement of his evidence (signed if possible) is obtained. For instance, it is never necessary to bring a military policeman from a distant town merely to prove the arrest of the accused. In such a case either the statement on the back of the crime sheet (A. F. B. 252) should be attached, or a statement such as the following:

No. _____. Sgt. _____ M. M. P., will prove the arrest of the accused at _____ at _____ p. m. on _____.

(b) The accused will be present if a summary is taken, and all statements of witnesses not taken in his presence will be shown to him. The nature of the charge or charges on which it is proposed to try him should be explained to him by an officer when the summary is taken or the statements are shown, and as soon as the convening officer has signed the convening order a copy of the charges should be given to the accused.

(c) The utmost care should be taken to insure that the accused fully understands the nature of the offense and of the evidence, and that all reasonable requests in connection with his defense are granted.

5. Defense of accused.—(a) When a court-martial is to be held for the trial of an offense of so serious a character that a death sentence is likely to be awarded, the convening officer, whenever practicable, will arrange for the attendance at the trial of an officer to act as friend of the accused. Care will be taken to select from the officers available one who is a barrister or solicitor or, if in special circumstances this is not possible, one who by reason of ability and discretion will be able to present the case of the accused adequately to the court.

(b) This must not be taken in any way to derogate from the right of the accused to be assisted or represented by such friend or counsel as he may himself select.

(c) The friend of the accused should be notified and a copy of the evidence given to him in sufficient time to enable him to give due consideration to the case and to consult with the accused.

(d) The attendance of a friend of the accused in no way relieves the court of the responsibility for safeguarding the interests of the accused and eliciting all facts which may tell in his favor.

(e) If assistance has been offered to the accused and has been declined, that fact will be stated in the proceedings.

6. Attendance of witnesses.—(a) As early as possible he should be asked for the names of any witnesses he may wish to call, and steps should be taken to secure their attendance.

(b) Before application is made for the attendance of a witness from a distance, care should be taken to ascertain that his evidence really is material, and in forwarding an application to superior authority, the facts should be stated which the witness is expected to prove.

(c) It should be remembered that written evidence as to character can always be accepted for the defense, and this will often obviate the necessity for the attendance of a witness.

7. Notes on taking summaries.—(a) Witnesses are not sworn unless the accused specially demands it.

(b) The warning given to the accused before he makes a statement is to the effect that he is not bound to make a statement, and that if he does make one it may be used in evidence against him.

(c) A summary will contain all material facts, stated shortly and to the point. All hearsay and other inadmissible evidence must be excluded.

(d) On a charge of drunkenness a witness will definitely say that a man is "drunk" or "sober," and will be prepared to give reasons for his opinion, if necessary. In law there is no intermediate state.

8. Form of summary.—The following is an example of a summary of evidence, and may be useful as a guide: Summary of evidence in the case of No. ———, Private ———, 1st Battalion ———.

1st Witness: No. ———, Corporal ———, 1st Battalion.

At ——— on the 25th June, 1918, the accused, who is a member of my section, was absent from 6 a. m. parade. I called the roll.

Cross-examined: I do not know whether you reported sick that morning.

———, Corporal,
1st Battalion ———.

2d Witness: No. ———, Sgt. ———, 1st Battalion ———, states:

At ——— at 8.30 p. m. on the 25th June, 1918, I saw the accused near the battalion lines. He was drunk. I placed him under arrest.

———, Sergeant,
1st Battalion ———.

3d Witness: No. ———, Cpl. ———, 1st Battalion:

At ——— at about 8.30 p. m. on the 25th June, 1918, I was with Sergt. ——— when he arrested the accused near the battalion line. Accused was drunk.

———, Corporal,
1st Battalion ———.

The accused, being duly warned, states:

I was not drunk when Sgt. ——— arrested me. I was sick, and asked to be paraded before a medical officer.

———, Private,
1st Battalion ———.

or

Accused declines to make statement.

Taken down by me at ——— this 27th day of June, 1918, in the presence of the accused.

Rules of procedure 4 (c, d, and e), compiled with.

——— Lieut.,
1st Battalion.

9. Charges.—Rule of procedure 108 provides that in the case of a F. G. C. M.—“The statement of an offense may be made briefly in any language sufficient to describe or disclose an offense under the army act.” All that is generally necessary is a form of charge (without particulars or with brief particulars) as in the Manual of Military Law, pages 650–659. It is advisable to use the exact words of the army act.

For further notes on charges, see below.

10. Certified true copy of conduct sheet.—A copy of the original sheet should be made, and the words “certified true copy” written across it, signed and dated by an officer. The prosecutor will produce this on oath at the trial.

11. Attendance of witnesses at the trial.—(a) Although the evidence of witnesses at the taking of the summary may be dispensed with, at the trial the presence of every witness is essential. Documentary evidence such as written statements of evidence can not be admitted at a court-martial. The practice of not summoning witnesses for the trial because the accused states his intention of pleading guilty is wholly incorrect. For instance, in a case of desertion the attendance of the military police, or the person who first made the arrest, will be secured.

(For evidence of surrender see army act, S. 163 (j) and (k), and K. R. para. 517a.)

(b) Certificates of surrender must be signed personally. They can not be signed by one officer “for” another.

CH. II.—CONVENING F. G. C. M.

12. Composition of court.—(a) Though, according to the rules of procedure, any commanding officer may convene these courts, a field general court-martial ought not to be considered the equivalent of a regimental court-martial as regards the composition of the court (see R. P. 20, note 1), and, whenever practicable, such courts should be convened by infantry brigade commanders or officers holding equivalent commands.

(b) Specially qualified officers are stationed at convenient centers (usually corps headquarters or bases) whose whole time is devoted to sitting as members of courts-martial. No case of a difficult, complicated, or serious nature should ever be tried without the attendance of one of such officers.

(c) A court-martial officer will take no part in preparing for trial any case in which he may have to act as a member of the court.

(d) He will invariably make the record of evidence and will advise the court on all points of law and procedure. His opinion will have the same weight as that of a judge advocate (see R. P. 103 F).

(e) The convening order on Army Form A 3 must be signed personally by the convening officer. An officer can not sign it “for” another officer. All alterations will be initialed by the convening officer.

(f) The members of the court must be named.

12 (a). The convening officer will insure that a competent prosecutor is appointed (for duties, see R. P. 60).

CH. III.—CHARGES.

18. Responsibility of staff captains.—Staff captains of brigades and officers holding similar appointments should remember that they are responsible to convening officers that the proper charges are preferred, that there is evidence to support them in every detail, and that all inadmissible evidence is erased. They are not relieved of any responsibility by the fact that this pamphlet is issued to battalions, etc.

14. Complicated cases.—All complicated cases, all cases of fraud, or cases where there is doubt whether the weight of evidence is sufficient to secure a conviction, should be submitted, for legal advice, to Army headquarters, or to the D. J. A. G., as the case may be, prior to the convening of the court.

15. Multiplication of charges.—Multiplication of charges should be avoided, and convening officers should bear in mind that when a soldier is to be arraigned on a serious charge, any minor offenses against him may be dropped.

16. Number of cases on A. F. A. 3.—In serious cases, e. g., desertion, cowardice, one case only should be entered on each A. F. A. 3. At the same time, if two or more prisoners are concerned in the same transaction, it is eminently desirable that the proceedings should be forwarded at the same time.

17. Election to be tried.—When a man elects to be tried by F. G. C. M., the words "Elects trial," should be written prominently on A. F. A. 3 and on the charge sheet, if any. (See K. R., para. 487A and 583 (1).)

18. Entering the charge.—(a) Though the charge can be framed in any language sufficient to describe an offense under the Army act, it should follow the words of the act as far as possible. For instance, "using obscene language to a N. C. O." is incorrect. It should be "using insubordinate language to a superior officer."

The following are also incorrect, because they do not sufficiently show the offense intended: "Willfully becoming a straggler," "not joining regiment when ordered to do so," "refusing to obey."

(b) A charge sheet is not essential, and in most cases it should be possible to enter in the second column of the schedule, on page 2 of A. F. A. 3, all that is necessary. Otherwise, a separate sheet can be used which will be initialled by the convening officer.

(c) In all charges of a general nature, e. g., an offense under S. 40 A. A., or an offense against an inhabitant, sufficient particulars must be given, and if it is found impracticable to enter these in the schedule, they may be entered on a separate piece of paper, or a charge sheet may be attached. The object in view is to let the accused know, from the charge set out, exactly what the offense is which the prosecution intends to prove, e. g.:

"Offense against person of inhabitant, indecent assault on * * *," or "neglect to the prejudice, self-inflicted wound."

(d) More than one offense will never be included in one charge (R. P. 11a): If the evidence discloses more than one offense, sufficient particulars will be given to show which offense is included in each charge laid, e. g., if an accused is alleged to have stolen the goods of several comrades, the particular goods and the comrade referred to in each charge will be stated.

(e) Such matters as "when a defaulter," "when undergoing F. P. No. 1" will not be inserted in a charge.

(f) Alternative charges should be marked "alternative" in the schedule.

19. Cowardice, A. A., S. 4 (7).—Charges of cowardice, in the absence of specific evidence of an exceptional character, can only be sustained when the occurrence takes place under fire or in immediate proximity to the enemy. The fact of absence is not, by itself, sufficient to support a charge of cowardice.

20. Offenses by sentries, A. A., S. 6 (1) (k).—In such cases it must always be proved what the post was, that the accused was posted, and that he was still on duty when the offense was committed.

If the accused received permission to leave his post for a short time but did not return, he can not be charged with leaving his post.

If he is found asleep away from his post, he should not be charged with sleeping on his post, but with leaving it.

(See notes 3 and 13 to A. A., S. 6., M. M. L., page 382.)

The words "sentinel" or "sentry" do not apply to telephone operators or to men on traffic control duties. For stablemen, see K. R., para. 560.

If there is any doubt as to an offense falling under S. 6, it should be charged under S. 40.

21. Drunkenness.—(a) If a person subject to military law takes a drug, and the effect of that drug, either by itself or in conjunction with alcohol, is to render him unfit for duty, that person may be lawfully convicted of the offense of drunkenness, from whatever motive he may have taken the drug, unless he takes it, upon the order of a medical officer, having previously reported sick in the proper manner.

In the case of a medical officer, the opinion of another medical officer will be necessary before taking a drug that may render him unfit for duty.

(b) In framing charges of drunkenness together with other charges, e. g., threatening or insubordinate language, particular attention is drawn to M. M. L., page 22, para. 30 and Note (c).

22. Violence, A. A., S. 8 (i) and (2).—Charges should only be framed under subsection (i) in cases where the violence has been committed under exceptionally grave circumstances.

23. Disobedience, A. A., S. 9 (i) and (2).—(a) A charge under A. A., S. 9 (i), should only be preferred in cases of so grave a nature that the court are likely to award the sentence of death. "Willful" defiance must be proved specifically, and it is always advisable to submit the case for legal advice beforehand.

(b) In all other cases the charge will be laid under A. A., (9) (2).

(c) A command means an order given to a man as an individual.

(d) A charge under this section will not lie unless the accused was given sufficient opportunity to comply, and the fact that he did not comply must be proved.

(e) The expression "refused to obey" will not support a charge under this section. This or other irregular conduct in connection with an order may come under S. 8 or S. 40.

(f) When in close arrest a soldier may not be ordered to perform any duties except such as are necessary to his own cleanliness and health, or as stated in K. R., paragraph 482 (q. v.).

In open arrest he may also be ordered to attend parades.

(g) Paragraph 9, M. M. L., page 17, should be carefully studied.

24. Desertion (M. M. L., p. 18, pars. 23 and 16).—The distinction between desertion and absence without leave consists in intention.

A soldier is guilty of the crime of absence without leave when he is voluntarily absent, without authority, from the place where he knows, or ought to know, that it is his duty to be.

If, when he so absented himself, the soldier intended either (a) to leave His Majesty's service altogether, or (b) to avoid some particular important duty for which he would be required, he is guilty of desertion.

In other words, desertion is absence without leave caused by either of the intentions mentioned in the last paragraph, and the court, before convicting a man of desertion, must be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that he had one or other of those intentions.

The existence of an intention, like any other fact, must be proved by evidence, but its existence is proved when facts are established from which the intention may reasonably be inferred. E. g., it is a rule of law that every man is presumed to intend the natural and probable consequences of his acts; therefore if it is proved that the accused knew that his battalion had been ordered to attack next morning and that he absented himself without leave and remained absent until the attack was over, the court would be justified in finding that he intended to avoid taking part in the attack, unless he can account satisfactorily for his absence.

A. Intention to desert His Majesty's service altogether.—The existence of this intention is to be inferred from the circumstances of the absence, e. g., length of absence (though this by itself is inconclusive), distance from his unit and nature of the place at which accused is arrested, whether when arrested he was wearing uniform or plain clothes, and if the former whether he was in possession of arms or equipment or of pay book or other marks of identity, whether he was arrested in hiding or surrendered himself into military custody, and so on.

B. Intention to avoid a particular important duty (sometimes called "constructive" or "short" desertion).—In order to establish this intention, evidence must be produced to prove:

1. That the man knew with reasonable certainty that he would be required for this special duty;

2. That he was absent and thereby avoided the duty.

To prove 1, the prosecution should show:

(i) That the man was warned, or failing this—

(ii) That the company, etc., as a whole was warned, if possible on parade at which the roll was called, and that the accused was present, or

(iii) That, having regard to the usual custom of reliefs, he must have known that the turn of his company, etc., was imminent.

(An officer or senior N. C. O. should give evidence as to the usual custom of reliefs; and definite evidence as to the dates of the special duty which the accused missed should be given by these witnesses), or

(iv) That the period of absence was so long that he must have known for a certainty that he would miss active operations by such lengthy absence.

The burden of proof is then shifted, and the man will have to convince the court that he did not know that he would miss the duty in question.

Desertion involves a question of special intention, and there can be no intention without knowledge; where, therefore, the accused has been absent for a short time only, the prosecutor must prove that the offender knew, with reasonable certainty, that he would be required for some special duty. If the only evidence is that the man absented himself, and no evidence is produced (e. g., special warning, usual routine, length of absence), to show the probable state of his mind, the court can not make any assumption as to his intention, and they can convict the accused of absence only.

It should be noticed that it is necessary to produce evidence of facts such as those specified above, which will prove the accused's knowledge. Such statement as "The accused knew," "It was common knowledge," "The whole company knew," are not evidence.

Where desertion or absence is charged it is advisable, and often necessary to show, with approximate certainty, the time and the circumstances of the commencement and termination of the period of absence.

As regards the commencement of the period of absence the best evidence is usually that of a noncommissioned officer who called the roll and found the accused absent, and such evidence should always be produced; if this is impossible owing to casualties or other causes, evidence can often be given by some noncommissioned officer or man that on or about a certain date or time the accused was present with, and that at a later period he was absent from his section or platoon.

It is as a rule impossible to sustain a charge of desertion without proof as to the manner in which the period of absence terminated. It is of no use to call a noncommissioned officer to say that at such a date the accused was brought back under escort.

But unexplained absence for however short a time is sufficient in law to sustain a conviction for absence, as distinguished from desertion.

Doubtful cases to which the above rules are difficult to apply should be submitted for legal advice before trial. If after trial a doubt arises, the confirming officer should obtain advice before confirming, with a view, if necessary, to ordering a revision, the court being directed to convict of absence only.

Where there is a charge of desertion an alternative charge of absence will not be added.

In cases where a soldier surrenders himself as an absentee or deserter, a certificate under army act, section 163 (j) or (k) should be obtained to obviate the attendance of a witness. The certificate must comply strictly with the requirements of the act. This procedure does not apply where the man has been arrested.

If the accused has been taken into custody in the zone of operations, evidence, which must be given personally at the trial, can be obtained through the agency of the provost marshal, whose staff have full information as to the apprehension of stragglers (see pars. 6 and 11). If the accused was arrested in England the original A. F. O., 1618, Part I, will be obtained and produced by a witness on oath.

When the accused has been arrested by or has surrendered to the civil police in England and A. F. O. 1618 is to be produced as evidence, the "particulars in the evidence" on this form should be pasted over so as not to be seen by the court if likely to prejudice the accused, e. g., if they contain a statement that he was arrested for a civil offense; but evidence in relation to the charges of desertion or absence on which the soldier is being tried which would be admitted as parole evidence before the court should not be pasted over.

25. Looting.—(a) Any man who is absent from his unit and found to be in possession of what is obviously plunder, or found in a furnished house which is unoccupied and in which he has no right to be, should be charged with "Leaving his commanding officer to go in search of plunder."

In this case it may be advisable to add an alternative charge for absence.

(b) If it can not be proved that the man was absent from his unit when arrested, but he is found in an unoccupied furnished house where a door or window has been forced by him, he should be charged with "Breaking into a house in search of plunder."

(c) If it can not be proved that the man was absent from his unit when found to be in possession of what is obviously plunder, or if he is found in a furnished house which is unoccupied and there is no evidence of "breaking," he should be charged under S. 40.

26. Offenses against the censorship regulations.—If a genuine letter is submitted for censorship in the ordinary course, it will not be made the subject of disciplinary action. If, however, there is evidence that an objectionable letter is submitted, not bona fide as a letter for transmission, but expressly for the purpose of insulting any officer who may read it, a charge under S. 40 can be preferred.

A letter containing a cipher is not a letter submitted bona fide, and a charge under S. 40 can be laid.

27. Murder.—When a charge of murder is preferred an alternative charge of manslaughter should always be added, if the facts are such that the court may wish to convict of the lesser offense. Charges of murder should be submitted to the D. J. A. G. before trial.

28. Self-inflicted wounds.—(a) The object in view is to prevent any man who has inflicted a wound upon himself, either intentionally or negligently, from being withdrawn further from the firing line or for a longer period than is absolutely necessary.

(b) Special provision for dealing with these cases is made in each army, and the circulars issued on the subject should be studied.

(c) Trial is held at the earliest possible moment, and if convicted, the man when fit for duty returns to his unit. In every case where he is likely to be fit for duty again in a few weeks the sentence should be commuted to field punishment. Medical officers when giving their evidence should be asked as to the probable duration of incapacity.

(d) It is usually impossible to obtain a conviction under S. 18 for "maiming," as the special intention has to be proved. Consequently, unless the evidence is conclusive, such cases should be tried under S. 40, "Neglect to the prejudice," etc.

29. Section 15.—(a) Where the charge is for absence by reason of overstaying leave, the period of absence charged will be that between the date when the accused might reasonably have rejoined his unit and the date on which he did, in fact, rejoin, or on which he was arrested.

(b) A charge of "Failing to appear at the place of parade," etc., should never be preferred on active service, nor should any charge under S. 15 (3) or (4). A charge of absence should be laid instead.

CH. IV. MISCELLANEOUS.

30. Acting and lance rank.—In consequence of difficulties which have arisen in dealing by court-martial with offenses committed by privates and N. C. O.'s holding acting rank, the following instructions have been published:

Whenever a private or N. C. O. holding acting rank is brought to trial before a court-martial, the permanent rank of the accused should invariably be shown, e. g., "private (acting corporal)" or "corporal (acting sergeant major)."

In this manner the permanent rank of the accused will be brought to the notice of the court. Sentences are frequently rendered inoperative through N. C. O.'s being wrongly described. (See M. M. L., p. 550, note 4.)

31. Insanity.—The procedure in the case of insanity is set forth in army act, S. 130.

Where there is ground for supposing that the accused was insane when he committed the crime, or is insane at the time of trial, a medical board should be held.

(1) If the board is of opinion that the accused was insane when the offense was committed but is now fit for trial, a court-martial will be held and evidence will be taken to enable the court to bring in a finding as indicated in R. P., 57 (A).

(2) If the board is of opinion that the accused is now insane, then, if the offense is trivial, the accused should be evacuated without trial; but if it is a serious offense, a trial will be held and evidence taken to enable the court to bring in a finding as indicated in R. P., 57 (A).

In both the above cases, the evidence will be given before the finding.

NOTE.—The proceedings of the board are not admissible in evidence unless the accused wishes to use them in his defense. Evidence will usually be given by one or more members of the board.

32. Mental deficiency, shock, etc.—Where a medical board has been held and the accused found sane, or when the question of insanity has not arisen at all, the prosecution or the defense may call evidence to show that the accused is lacking in intelligence, or is suffering from mental shock, etc.

This class of evidence should usually be given after the finding, unless the accused calls it in his defense to prove that he was not responsible for his actions at the time of the occurrence, when it may be given before the finding.

It is similar to statements made by the accused in mitigation of punishment, and will be considered by courts in estimating the sentence.

(NOTE.—In no case can further evidence be heard by the court by way of revision or otherwise after they have completed the proceedings and have forwarded them to the confirming officer.)

PART II.—THE TRIAL.

CHAPTER V. BEFORE STARTING THE TRIAL.

33. Charge. (See R. P. 108, M. M. L., p. 632.)—(i) Read carefully the charge and particulars (if any), and compare them with the corresponding section of the army act, to see whether any offense is disclosed.

If no offense seems to be disclosed, consult the convening officer. A charge will not be altered in any way by the court without his authority.

(ii) Read the whole of the section of the army act under which the offense is charged, including any proviso, and also the notes in the M. M. L. on that section.

(iii) Split up the offense into its component parts, with a view to making sure that each part of it is established by the evidence, e. g., in a charge under the following section the following facts would have to be proved:

Section 6 (l), (k):

1. That accused had been posted as a sentry.
2. What his post was.
3. That accused was found asleep.
4. That he was then on his post.
5. That he was then still on duty.

CHAPTER VI. PROCEDURE AT TRIAL.

34. Preliminary. (Have the M. M. L. open at R. P. 105 et seq., and see that the R. P. are complied with.)

(a) See that the court is properly constituted according to R. P. 106 and 107 M. M. L., pages 631 and 632.

(b) Have all the accused, prosecutors, witnesses, etc., in, and read page 1 of the A. F. A. 3 (convening order).

(c) Give each accused his right of challenge (see R. P. 110). If any accused challenges, and the challenge is upheld, report the matter immediately to the convening officer, and, if necessary, adjourn the trial of that accused.

(d) Swear the court. A. A., S. 52 and R. P. 109 and 111. Forms of oaths are printed inside the cover of this book. (For affirmations, etc., see M. M. L., A. A., S. 52 (4) and note, p. 432; R. P. 28, p. 588; R. P. 30, p. 589.)

(e) March out the witnesses and all accused except the accused person (or persons) to be tried first and their counsel or friends (see R. P. 109).

An accused charged jointly with another accused has the right to demand to be tried separately, and if several accused are charged separately they can not be tried together unless they consent. Such consent should be entered on the proceedings.

(f) Arraign the accused (see R. P. 112), and enter plea of accused on each charge in column 3 of page 2 of A. F. A. 3.

35. On plea of guilty.—(a) If the accused pleads guilty, see that the provisions of R. P. 35 (B), M. M. L., p. 591, and R. P. 37, p. 593, are complied with before entering the plea.

(b) A plea of "guilty" should not be accepted in any case in which a death sentence is likely to be awarded.

(c) Where charges are alternative, a plea of "guilty" can not be taken on more than one charge.

(d) As a rule, unless the accused pleads "guilty" to the more serious of alternative charges, pleas of "not guilty" will be entered on both charges, and the trial proceeded with. After hearing the evidence the court can determine on which charge the accused is "guilty." Findings of "guilty" and of "not guilty" should then be entered in column 4 of page 2 of A. F. A. 3 accordingly.

(e) A plea of "guilty" covers all defects in the evidence unless it appears from the summary, if any, or otherwise, that the accused has not in fact committed the offense charged, in which case a plea of "not guilty" should be entered.

36. Statement in mitigation of punishment.—(a) In addition, the court should record any statement in mitigation made by the accused. Such statements may be on oath. If the accused makes no such statement on a plea of guilty, that fact should be recorded. (R. P. 37 (F), p. 593, and note 4 on p. 594.)

(b) Whenever the accused makes any statement in mitigation of punishment, or otherwise, which implies that he did not commit the offense, a plea of not guilty will be entered and the accused tried on that plea.

(c) For the purpose of deciding whether or not to accept a plea of guilty, the accused's statement will be assumed to be true. The test is not whether it is believed or is likely to be believed; but whether, if true, it would afford a defense to the charge or would suffice to reduce the finding to one of a less grave offense.

(d) E. g., if an accused charged with striking a superior officer says that he did not know that he was a N. C. O., a plea of not guilty will be entered. A similar course will be followed, if an accused pleads guilty to drunkenness, and says, "I admit having had drink, but I was fit for duty," or to a charge of desertion, and says, "I admit I was absent, but I had no intention of missing duty."

(e) It is usually advisable to enter a plea of "not guilty" whenever the accused says anything about his intentions or alleges ignorance that he was doing wrong.

(f) The summary, or statement of evidence, if available, will be attached to the proceedings.

(g) If there is none, sufficient evidence on oath will be taken down to enable the confirming officer to judge of the gravity of the offense.

(h) Evidence of character. The procedure is exactly the same as on conviction after a plea of "not guilty."

(i) Complete A. F. A. 3.

37. On plea of not guilty.—The case proceeds as laid down in R. P. 114, M. M. L., page 633.

38. Record of evidence.—(a) The summary will not be used as a record of the evidence given at the trial, nor is it sufficient to say, "The witness corroborated his evidence on the summary" or "corroborated the last witness." A short note of what the witness actually says at the trial will be taken in narrative form.

(b) Where a number of accused persons are tried together for an offense charged to have been committed by them collectively, one record covering all the accused can be taken. Where men are being tried separately, the record of evidence against each of them must be complete in itself, and such a statement as "For further evidence see trial of * * *" is improper, as this does not comply with the requirements of R. P. 114 (c).

(c) Evidence (including cross-examination) need not be taken down as question and answer unless the prosecution or defense specially demand it. It is within the discretion of the court to make the record in such manner as will then make the facts clear.

(d) Ordinary witnesses should be called in the order of the events to which they testify, and not in order of rank or seniority.

(e) Proper names should be recorded in block letters.

39. Form of record.—Statements such as "R. P. 83s complied with," "Witness withdraws," "The prosecution is closed," etc., are not necessary.

The following is sufficient:

Trial of (number, rank, name, unit).

(The name, etc., of the prosecutor, and if a friend of the accused represents him or assists him at the trial, his name, etc., will be entered. If either person is a qualified barrister or solicitor, the fact will be stated.)

40. Prosecution.—First witness (number, rank, name, unit), sworn, states ———.

(The witness should describe himself, e. g., "I am C. S. M., of B Company, to which accused belongs," and his evidence should then continue with time, date, and place, e. g., "At 4.30 p. m., on the Jan. 12, 1916, in the fire trenches * * *," or "about 2 or 3 p. m., on a Thursday (I forget the date) in billets, * * *.")

Cross-examined ———.

(A witness may be cross-examined about any matter which has a bearing on the case. The notion that cross-examination is limited to questions directly arising out of a witness's evidence in chief is erroneous. For instance, a witness can, and should, be cross-examined as to any facts tending to assist the intended defense, though he has not referred to them; or a witness as to facts for the prosecution can be cross-examined to establish the good character of the accused.)

Reexamined and not cross-examined.

Examined by the court ———.

(A witness also, at any time before the court is closed for consideration of the finding, may be "examined by the court" to clear up any point either for the prosecution or for the defense. He may be recalled, if necessary, for the purpose. R. P. 86, M. M. L., p. 622.)

Second witness. (As before.)

41. Defense.—It is the duty of the president to inform the accused at the close of the case for the prosecution that he can either—

(a) Give evidence as a witness on oath, in which case he is liable to be cross-examined by the prosecution and examined by the court; or

(b) Make or hand in a statement, not on oath, in which case he is not liable to be questioned in any way; or

(c) Say nothing.

(d) He can also, if he wishes to do so, hand in a written statement, on oath, in which case the statement becomes his evidence, and he can be cross-examined on it.

The president should also inform the accused that the court will attach more weight to evidence on oath than to a statement not on oath.

The president should then ask the accused which course he wishes to adopt and whether he has any witnesses to call in his defense.

Accused (Number, rank, name, unit), sworn, states ——— or hands in written statement marked ———. Cross-examined ——— (see R. P. 80 (3)), examined by court ——— (see R. P. 80 (3)), or accused (No., rank, unit), not sworn, states ———, or accused (No., rank, name, unit), not sworn, hands in written statement marked ———, or accused (No., rank, name, unit) makes no statement.

In each of the three latter cases he can not be cross-examined by the prosecution or by the court, and throughout the proceedings, except when the accused is giving evidence on oath, the court should be very careful not to ask him questions about the facts of the case such as to draw from him statements to his disadvantage.

Second witness: (Number, rank, name, regiment, etc.) ——— (as in evidence for prosecution), or accused calls no witnesses.

42. Evidence as to character before finding.—The accused, if he wishes to do so, may call evidence of good character before the finding. He should also be permitted to produce testimonials, etc., to which the court should give such weight as they may think fit. Before accused decides to give or call evidence of good character it should be pointed out to him that this will entitle the prosecutor to cross-examine and to produce evidence of bad character. For this purpose the prosecutor may produce the field-conduct sheet with entries of previous offenses.

In no other circumstances can evidence of bad character be produced before finding.

43. Plea of illness, etc.—When a soldier, in his defense or in mitigation of punishment, urges a substantial plea, resting on medical grounds, a medical witness should invariably be called either to substantiate or to rebut this before the finding if it is in defense and after if it is urged in mitigation of punishment.

44. Finding.—(a) In the case of an equality of votes the finding is entered as one of "Not guilty." (S. 53 (8) A. A., M. M. L., p. 433.)

(b) The finding on each charge is entered in column 4 of page 2 of A. F. A. 3 simply as "Guilty" or "Not guilty."

(c) If the accused pleads "Guilty," a finding of "Guilty" is entered as well as the plea of "Guilty."

(d) If the court is in doubt on which of alternative charges to find accused guilty, he should be found guilty of the simpler offense or a special finding should be brought in, as to which see R. P. 44 and note, M. M. L., page 598.

(e) The only cases in which an accused can be found guilty of a lesser offense or of the same offense with variations in detail are given in S. 56 A. A.

(f) A special finding can not be recorded on a plea of "guilty."

(g) Except on a charge of attempting to desert, in no case can an accused be found guilty of a graver offense than that charged, nor can he be found guilty of an entirely different offense, even if there is evidence of such an offense.

45. Honorable acquittal.—A finding of honorable acquittal is incorrect in a case where the charge does not affect the honor of the accused. It is equally inappropriate unless the accused's conduct has been irreproachable throughout the transactions investigated by the court.

46. After finding.—If an accused is found not guilty, he will be so informed and will be released from arrest.

47. Evidence of character after finding.—(a) After a finding of guilty (whether after a plea of guilty or not guilty) the court will take and record such evidence of character and particulars of service of the accused as is available.

(b) As a general rule no evidence of bad character should be produced before the court, except the field conduct sheet, A. F. B. 122, which will be produced by a witness on oath after the finding, to guide the court as to sentence.

(c) The field-conduct sheet will not be attached in original, but either extracts recorded or a certified true copy attached.

(d) If evidence of character is not available at the trial, a note to this effect will be recorded.

(e) Any evidence of good character is admissible and will be recorded.

(f) If the accused is under a suspended sentence or a sentence of field punishment, the court will be informed of this after the finding, and the fact will be recorded.

(g) When recording evidence of character it should always be stated whether it is taken "before finding" or "after finding."

(h) Finally the accused will be asked if he wishes to say anything further, either as to character, in mitigation of punishment, or otherwise, and a record will be made of his statement, or of the fact that he declines to make one.

48. Sentence.—(a) Only one sentence is awarded whether the accused has been found guilty on one or more charges. This sentence may, however, where authorized by the army act, consist of more than one punishment, e. g., reduction to the ranks and £1 stoppages, or 28 days' F. P. No. 1 and three months' forfeiture of pay.

(b) Sentence is entered in column 4 of page 2 of A. F. A. 3, below the findings. It should be entered briefly, e. g., "60 days' F. P. No. 1," "2 years' I. H. L.," "3 years' P. S.," "Death," etc.

(c) The maximum punishment which can be awarded will be found laid down in the section under which the charge is laid.

(e) To award death or P. S. a court must consist of three or more officers. S. 49 (1) (d), A. A., M. M. L., page 429.

(f) To award death the opinion of the court must be unanimous, and an entry to this effect will be made in the schedule. S. 49 (2), A. A., M. M. L., page 429.

(g) Other sentences are decided by a majority, the president, if necessary, having a casting vote. S. 53 (8), A. A., M. M. L., page 433; also R. P., 69, and notes, M. M. L., page 615.

(For sentence where an accused has elected trial, see Ch. V., par. 80, M. M. L., p. 50.)

49. Recommendation to mercy.—As to recommendation to mercy, see M. M. L., Ch. V., par. 88, page 51.

Care will be taken to see that a recommendation to mercy is consistent with the finding. For instance, on any charge a recommendation to mercy "on the ground that the accused appears not to be responsible for his actions" would invalidate the conviction, as would also a recommendation "on the ground that the accused may not have known that he had no right to the goods" on a charge of theft.

50. Notes on sentences.—The following points should be especially noted:

(a) Imprisonment with or without hard labor can not be awarded for a term longer than two years, including any sentence which may be running at the time.

(b) Penal servitude can not be awarded for a term less than three years. Maximum is for life.

(c) Field punishment can not be awarded for a term longer than three (calendar) months, taking into account any sentence which the accused may already be undergoing. It should be awarded in days.

(d) Except on the lines of communication it is a rule for any punishment up to three months to be in terms of field punishment, and not imprisonment with hard labor.

(e) Detention and discharge with ignominy are not awarded on active service in the field.

(f) Forfeiture of pay not exceeding three months may be awarded on active service in addition to or without other punishment. S. 44 (6), A. A., M. M. L., p. 417.

As this forfeiture of pay commences on the day of award, if field punishment is also awarded (for which pay is ipso facto forfeited, A. A., S. 138 (1)) the two forfeitures of pay will run concurrently; consequently, a sentence of forfeiture of pay, to be effective, must be awarded for a longer period than any field punishment awarded. (See footnote to K. R., par. 494, as amended by Army Order 209, 1912.)

(g) A fine not exceeding £1 may be awarded in cases of drunkenness only, either in addition to or in substitution for any other punishment. S. 19, A. A., M. M. L., p. 398.

(h) Stoppages.—To enable a court-martial to sentence a soldier to stoppages of pay, the amount of damage, etc., must be stated in the charge and proved in evidence.

A definite sum must be mentioned in the sentence.

When damage or loss has been occasioned by the commission of an offense, stoppages ought always to be awarded.

(i) A court-martial has no power to award C. B., or reprimand or severe reprimand (except in the case of officers).

(j) N. C. O.s can be awarded the same punishment as private soldiers, but, before being sentenced to P. S., imprisonment, or F. P., they should be sentenced to reduction to the ranks.

(k) N. C. O.s can also be sentenced to forfeiture of seniority or to reduction to a lower grade or to the ranks.

(See S. 44 (h) to 44 (n), A. A., M. M. L., p. 416; S. 190 (6), A. A., M. M. L., p. 555; R. P., 47, M. M. L., p. 602.)

51. Rank of N. C. O.s.—In dealing with N. C. O.s, care will be taken to ascertain their permanent rank. An acting N. C. O. can not be deprived of his acting rank by sentence of court-martial. A court-martial can only deal with him in his permanent rank.

Thus a private (acting sergeant) can not be reduced by sentence of court-martial to the rank of acting corporal, nor can he be reduced to the ranks. A sergeant (acting C. S. M.), however, though he can not be reduced or reverted to the rank of sergeant, can be ordered to forfeit seniority in the rank of sergeant, or can be reduced to the rank of corporal or to the ranks. Any sentence involving loss of liberty, i. e., of one day's F. F. or upwards, will automatically reduce an N. C. O. "acting" or otherwise to the ranks.

Acting and lance ranks can only be dealt with by the man's C. O., but the probable loss of such rank as a consequence of the conviction should be taken into consideration by the court. (See G. R. O. 1025.)

52. Completion of A. F. A. 3.—After sentence has been recorded in column 4 of page 2 of A. F. A. 3, the president will sign page 2, and also the certificate on page 3. He need not sign the record of evidence.

53. Documents.—Only documents forming part of the proceedings will be attached inside A. F. A. 3.

All documents produced should be distinctively marked and initialed by the president. They should be attached as far as possible in the order of their production, e. g., charge sheet, if any, record of evidence, exhibits, A. F. B. 122. Where the accused has pleaded "Not guilty," the summary of evidence need not be attached (unless it has been used during the trial in cross-examination of a witness, to point out discrepancies in his evidence. (See M. M. L., chap. 6, par. 58, p. 71.)

Any remark which the court may wish to make on the conduct of a witness or in connection with the trial should be attached to the proceedings in a separate minute to the convening officer.

54. Adjournment.—A court can always be adjourned, and in case of difficulty arising to adjourn and consult the convening officer is better than to go on and convict and eventually have the conviction quashed.

54A. Death sentence.—Whenever sentence of death has been passed by court-martial upon an officer or soldier the sentence is to be notified forthwith to the accused.

At the conclusion of the trial the president will cause to be forthwith transmitted to the accused under sealed cover A. F. W. 3996, duly completed and signed by himself.

In all courts-martial, therefore, the oath will be administered to members in the amended form contained in the cover of this book.

In the event of an accused being sentenced to death the president will attach to the proceedings a certificate in the following terms:

"I certify that A. F. W. 3996 has been handed to the accused under sealed cover in accordance with army council instruction 570 of 1918.

"Date ———.

"Signed ———,
"President."

The president must satisfy himself that the sealed over containing A. F. W. 3996 has actually been handed to the accused. Convening officers will insure that presidents of courts-martial are supplied with one copy of A. F. W. 3996 and one envelope for every accused who is charged with an offense for which sentence of death is likely to be awarded, and that they are informed of the terms of this order.

55. Rules of evidence.—A field general court-martial will observe the rules of evidence as strictly as any other court-martial. (See Army act, S. 128.) The admission of hearsay or other inadmissible evidence may invalidate the proceedings.

Great latitude, however, should be given to the defense both in cross-examination of witnesses for the prosecution and in the evidence produced by it, e. g., written statements, letters, and hearsay can be considered by the court for what they are worth, if tendered for the defense. (See also par. 6 (c).)

56. Relevancy.—Evidence should be excluded which does not tend, either directly or as circumstantial evidence, to prove the charge. Caution should be exercised in checking cross-examination by the defense; this may at the moment appear irrelevant, but may be intended to help in building up a defense to be disclosed later.

57. Hearsay and evidence of opinion are not generally admissible. For exceptions see M. M. L., Chapter VI, paragraphs 58–71, pages 71–73.

"Hearsay" may be taken to include any statement made not in the hearing of the accused, whether it was made by a third party or by the witness himself.

The following are example of hearsay:

(a) "The sergeant reported to me that accused was absent."

(b) "I was told by Sergt. A. that accused had struck him."

(c) "I spoke to the O. C. Company on the telephone and told him accused had come back to battalion headquarters and had told me he had been sent there. The O. C. Company said accused had had no such orders.

"I placed him under arrest."

(d) Accused said he had been in the field ambulance. "I made inquiries there, and found he had never been admitted there."

In the above examples:

(a) The sergeant must be called to prove the absence of accused.

(b) The sergeant must be called.

(c) The accused did not hear the conversation. The witness can only state what he did, and not what he said, i. e., "Accused told me he had been sent back to battalion headquarters by the O. C. Company. I spoke to the O. C. Company on the telephone. I then placed accused under arrest." The O. C. Company must be called to prove that he had given no such order.

(d) This is in effect only repeating an unsworn, uncross-examined statement made by somebody at the field ambulance. A witness must, therefore, be called from the field ambulance to swear to the fact, from his own knowledge, that accused had not been admitted.

58. Documentary evidence.—(See generally M. M. L., Chap. VII., pars. 30–40, pp. 63–64.)

NOTE.—No document is admissible in evidence for the prosecution unless it has been produced by a witness on oath.

(a) Written statements by absent witnesses must not be put in by the prosecution as “documentary evidence,” e. g., a report of an A. P. M. as to an arrest, a certificate of a M. O., a letter dealing with the facts of the case from some military authority or civilian in England. These are inadmissible for the prosecution, being “hearsay,” though they may be considered if produced by the defense.

Written statements are generally inadmissible in evidence, unless it is proved that they have been written by the accused.

Certain exceptions to this rule will be found in S. 163, A. A., M. M. L., pp. 523–524, e. g., a “descriptive return” in cases of desertion (see S. 163 (1) (i) and ante p. 15), the finding of a court of inquiry on illegal absence (S. 163 (1) (g) and K. R., par. 1912); a certificate in the case of a deserter or absentee who has surrendered himself into custody (S. 163 (1) (j) and (k)).

(b) Orders.—In any case involving disobedience of written orders the prosecution must:

(i) Produce the original orders, if in existence, and if not, a certified true copy. (Verbal evidence as to their terms may only be given when it is proved that no better evidence is available.)

(ii) Show that the orders reached the accused, either directly, or by being read out on a parade that he can be proved to have attended, or by being posted in a place where in the ordinary course he should have seen them, or should, at any rate, have looked for them.

59. Admissions and confessions.—As to admissions and confessions by an accused, see M. M. L., Chapter VI, paragraph 74, page 74. An admission made by a soldier to an officer who is investigating a case should not, as a rule, be used against the soldier.

60. Production of stolen and other articles.—When a man is charged with theft, the subject of the charge should always, where possible, be produced and identified in court. If it is not produced, evidence must be given as to what has become of it.

A similar rule applies to all other articles referred to in evidence.

61. Identification of documents, etc.—All documents and goods, etc., material to the proceeding must be produced by one of the witnesses and identified by all witnesses who give evidence as to them.

PART III.—AFTER TRIAL.

CH. VII.—CONFIRMATION.

62. (a) The confirming officer is usually the officer who convened the court. (As to confirmation generally, see A. A., S. 54; as to field general courts-martial, see R. P. 120 M. M. L., p. 634.)

(b) Finding and sentence may be “confirmed,” “reserved,” or “not confirmed.” These words, entered and initialed, in the case of field general courts-martial, in column 5 of p. 2 of A. F. A. 3, are sufficient. (For effect of nonconfirmation, see note 2 to A. A., S. 157, M. M. L., p. 519, and Ch. V., par. 5, p. 36. For variations see M. M. L., p. 698.)

As to cases of insanity, see G. R. O. 2030.

(c) In the case of finding and sentence being confirmed, Certificate C on p. 3 of A. F. A. 3 will also be signed.

(d) If there is any doubt about the legality of the finding or about any other point, a confirming officer may, before confirming, send proceedings up to army headquarters, or to the deputy judge advocate general direct, and they will be returned direct with a ruling on the point in doubt.

Many convictions have had to be quashed owing to defects which could have been cured by sending back the case to the court for revision before confirmation.

(e) An acquittal does not require confirmation.

(f) Reference may be made usefully to the following rules of procedure, etc.: Procedure, R. P. 51, M. M. L., p. 603; revision, R. P. 52, p. 604; mitf-gation of sentence on partial confirmation, R. P. 54, p. 605; confirmation of finding on alternative charges, R. P. 55, p. 605; confirmation notwithstanding informallties, etc., R. P. 56, p. 606; finding of guilty in spite of immaterial variation from the charge, note 2 to R. P. 44, p. 599; referring confirmation, A. A., S. 54 (5); withholding confirmation, A. A., S. 54 (6), and note 10. M. M. L., p. 437. Comment on sentences K. R., par. 589.

63. Restitution of stolen property.—Property proved to have been stolen, etc., should be restored to its owner by the confirming officer, and a note that this has been done should form part of the forwarding minute (see Army Act. S. 75, M. M. L., p. 450).

CH. VIII.—DEATH SENTENCES.

64. Reservation.—A death sentence will not be promulgated without the sanction of the commander in chief, to whom it will be forwarded through the usual channels. The confirming officer should enter the word "reserved" in the last column of the schedule of A. F. A. 3, and should sign Certificate "C." Neither finding nor sentence should be confirmed.

65. Custody of the accused.—The confirming officer will cause the accused to be handed over to an A. P. M., and will cause to be attached to the proceedings a certificate that this has been done.

66. Recommendations as to death sentences.—In such cases the recommendations of the reviewing officers will be given as to whether the sentence should be carried out or commuted, and the reasons for the recommendations will be given.

67. Death sentences for desertion.—In particular the fullest information on the following four points is to be forwarded with the proceedings in all cases where it is considered that the extreme penalty should be inflicted for desertion:

(i) The character (from a fighting point of view as well as from that of behavior) of the soldier concerned, his previous conduct in action, and the period of his service with the expeditionary force.

(ii) The state of discipline of the regiment, battalion, or unit concerned.

(iii) The commanding officer's opinion (based on his personal knowledge, or that of his officers, of the soldier's characteristics), as to whether the crime was deliberately committed. The reason for forming that opinion will be given.

(iv) The reasons why the various reviewing authorities recommend that the extreme penalty be inflicted, or otherwise.

In cases where the essential part of the offence is "to avoid a particular duty," by these reports the commander in chief hopes to assure himself that a good fighting man is not shot for absence arising from, for example, oversight or a drunken spree.

68. Death sentence, certificate regarding.—When a death sentence is carried out, a certificate that the proceedings have been promulgated and a certificate that the sentence has been duly executed, giving date and time, signed by the assistant provost marshal, are to be indorsed on or attached to the proceedings; a telegram is to be sent to army headquarters, by the division, etc., concerned, giving these particulars as regards the sentence, as soon as it is carried out.

CH. IX. REVIEW OF PROCEEDINGS AND EXECUTION OF SENTENCES GENERALLY.

69. Detention.—With reference "Field Service Regulations," part II, section 113 (4), soldiers sentenced to detention can not be committed to the military prison in the field, and such sentences will be commuted to field punishment.

70. Field punishment.—When a soldier under sentence of field punishment is not doing duty in the trenches or employed at work or fatigue, he will be treated as though he were undergoing imprisonment with hard labor, and, whenever possible, he will be confined; smoking will be prohibited, and no rum ration, wine, or beer allowed. If necessary he may be kept in "irons," i. e., fetters or handcuffs, in such a way as to prevent his escape; this applies to field punishment, both No. 1 and No. 2.

When awarded field punishment No. 1, the prisoner may be attached for certain periods to fixed objects, under the conditions laid down in paragraphs 2 (b) and 4 of the rules with respect to field punishment (vide p. 721, M.M.L., and G.R.O. 2103).

71. Unnecessary documents.—Such army forms as B, 116, "application for a court-martial"; copies of B, 296, "Statement as to character and particulars of service accused," and A 49, "Declaration of military exigencies, under rule of procedure 104" or list of witnesses are not required.

72. K. R. 632.—The brigade or other commander who remits any part of a sentence awarded by F. G. C. M. is responsible that D. A. G., base, is notified of such remission.

73. Terms of commuted sentences. A. A., S. 57 (i). —No punishment can be considered as less punishment within the meaning of S. 57 (i), army act, if the term during which it is to be inflicted is longer than the term of the original punishment; consequently, if it is desired to commute a term of imprisonment or detention to one of field punishment No. 1, the latter will not exceed in length the term of imprisonment or detention awarded by the court. Attention is also drawn to note 9 to S. 57 on p. 440 of M. M. L.

74. Discharges with ignominy.—As a general rule it is not considered desirable to carry such sentences into effect during the period of the war.

75. Variations and recommendations.—Remissions, commutations, or variations of the sentence of the court, by any of the reviewing officers, should be entered and signed in the schedule on page 2 of A. F. A. 3; and recommendations as to suspension, etc., should be made on a separate sheet.

76. Alterations.—Any alteration on page 1 of A. F. A. 3, or in the first and second columns of the schedule will be initialed by the convening officer.

77. Committals to prison.—Except on the lines of communication soldiers sentenced to penal servitude and imprisonment will not be committed to the military prison in the field until these sentences have been reviewed by the army commander or commander in chief. Divisions, etc., will be notified when such sentences are approved or if they are suspended. Special instructions are issued on the lines of communication.

78. Insanity.—If an accused is found guilty but insane, he will be evacuated in custody to the lines of communication and the proceedings will be forwarded to the deputy judge advocate general, G. H. Q. (See G. R. O. 2030.)

79. Promulgation.—Court-martial sentences, except those on officers involving death, penal servitude, imprisonment, cashiering and dismissal, and those on other ranks involving death sentences, should be promulgated before the proceedings are forwarded. If sentences are commuted, permitted, etc., after promulgation, the proceedings, after being forwarded to higher authority, will be returned to the unit for a certificate to be entered thereon that the commutation, etc., has been noted.

80. Review.—The proceedings of all court-martial, whether confirmed or not, and even if the trial was not completed, will be sent, through the usual channels, to army headquarters, H. Q., L. of C. Area, or to the D. J. A. G., as the case may be, for review.

81. Quashing.—After confirmation proceedings will not be quashed on purely legal grounds without reference to army H. Q., H. Q., L. of C. Area, or to the D. J. A. G.

82. Expedition.—Every effort should be made to expedite court-martial cases. They should, therefore, be disposed of with the utmost dispatch, and minor irregularities, whilst being noted, should be left for correction until after the case has been reviewed.

PART IV.—CH. X.—ARMY (SUSPENSION OF SENTENCES) ACT, 1915.

83. Objects of act.—The objects of the act are:

(1) To give men, who have committed serious military offenses through exhaustion or temporary loss of nerve, an opportunity of redeeming their character and earning the remission of their sentence.

(2) To prevent wastage of troops by the withdrawal from the front of men sentenced to penal servitude or imprisonment.

(2) To prevent wastage of troops by the withdrawal in order to avoid duty shall not attain their object.

84. Disposal after sentence.—Except on the lines of communication, when any man is sentenced by a court-martial to penal servitude or imprisonment, he will not be committed to prison but will be kept under arrest until the directions of the "superior military authority" under the act are received.

On the lines of communication the man, if he is available as a reinforcement, will not be committed to prison until the directions of superior military authority are obtained.

85. Superior military authority.—The powers of a "superior military authority" are exercised by the commander in chief, the army commanders, and the G. O. C. L. of C. area.

86. Powers of confirming and reviewing officers.—The act does not affect the rights of confirming and reviewing authorities to commute or remit the sentence of the court-martial.

87. Recommendations.—Where such authorities consider that sentences of imprisonment or penal servitude should be carried out, they will state this definitely in a separate minute when forwarding the proceedings, giving reasons for their recommendations.

88. Notification.—When a sentence has been suspended by a superior military authority, the unit concerned is at once notified by telegram stating the date of suspension, and the soldier under sentence is released from arrest. He thereupon becomes free from any disability in respect of the sentence which has been suspended.

89. Competent military authority.—The expression "Competent military authority" means any general or other officer not below the rank of field officer duly authorized by a superior military authority. The powers are usually delegated to brigade commanders and other officers holding equivalent or superior commands.

90. Field punishment and suspended sentences.—If a soldier while undergoing field punishment is sentenced to imprisonment or penal servitude and such imprisonment or penal servitude is suspended, the previous sentence of field punishment, subject to any remission that the competent military authority may think fit to make, will continue to be carried out, and will not affect the duration of the suspended sentence. But if a sentence of penal servitude or imprisonment is put into execution, any current sentence of field punishment will cease to be carried out.

91. Suspended sentences and stoppages, etc.—Any part of a sentence, which would have taken independent effect if no part of the sentence had been suspended, will take effect notwithstanding suspension, e. g., reduction to the ranks, fines, and stoppages for damage or loss.

But a sentence of forfeiture of pay awarded conjointly with a longer term of imprisonment becomes inoperative when the sentence of imprisonment is confirmed, and can not, therefore, take effect if the sentence of imprisonment is subsequently suspended.

92. Trial of soldiers under suspended sentences.—A soldier under suspended sentence may be sentenced to field punishment.

If he is sentenced to imprisonment or penal servitude, A. F. W. 3104 should be forwarded to the superior military authority with the proceedings of the court-martial, Part VII of the form being filled in and signed by the competent military authority.

The confirming authority in such cases will direct that the soldier is not to be committed to prison. (See G. R. O. 1260.)

The superior military authority may suspend a second or any later sentence and will direct whether the sentences are to run concurrently or consecutively.

The following points as to his powers in this respect should be noted:

(1) Imprisonment and penal servitude will not be ordered to run consecutively, and if the first sentence was imprisonment it is "avoided" when the sentence of penal servitude is passed.

(2) If a soldier has two sentences of imprisonment (or of penal servitude) and both are put into execution, they can only be ordered to run concurrently. If, however, a second or further term is suspended, it can be made to run consecutively on the preceding term, provided that—

(3) No soldier may be ordered to serve continuously or consecutively a period of imprisonment exceeding two years.

93. Penal servitude following imprisonment.—Whenever a soldier while subject to a suspended sentence of imprisonment is sentenced by a court-martial to a term of penal servitude, the confirming officer before confirming the proceedings will submit them for direction:

(1) In the case of soldiers serving in an army, to army headquarters.

(2) In the lines of communication area, to headquarters, lines of communication area.

(3) In the case of soldiers serving elsewhere, to the deputy judge advocate general. (G. R. O. 2152.)

In all such cases the recommendations of the confirming and reviewing authorities will be attached in the form:

"assuming that the proceedings are in order, I recommend ———."

PART V.—MISCELLANEOUS

CH. XI.—TRIAL OF OFFICERS.

94. Convening court.—In the absence of special circumstances rendering such a course impracticable, officers will be tried by general court-martial. Divisional and superior commanders hold warrants for this purpose.

95. Preparation for defense.—At the earliest practicable moment after it has been decided to assemble a court-martial for the trial of an officer a staff officer will visit him for the purpose of ascertaining that he fully understands the nature of the charge and evidence. He will invite him to state his requirements for his defense and will take such action as may be necessary.

96. Notification.—As soon as the date of trial is fixed the convening officer will send a telegram to "Advocate," G. H. Q., giving date, time, and place of trial, name and regiment of the accused, and the section of the Army act under which the charge is laid.

97. Charge sheets.—(a) In the case of a general court-martial a charge sheet must be signed personally by the officer in actual command of the unit to which the accused belongs.

(b) It is also necessary that the order of the convening officer, or a staff officer for him, directing trial by general court-martial should be indorsed on the charge sheet below the signature of the commanding officer in accordance with the illustration appearing on page 659, M. M. L.

98. Convening order.—It is essential that the names of the members of the court should be inserted in the convening order, or, in the case of a general court-martial, that the unit (e. g., battallion, or, in the case of the Royal Artillery, the brigade) should be specified. A convening order directing officers (unnamed) to be detailed from such and such an infantry brigade is invalid, and the court would have no jurisdiction. (See K. R., par. 577, and R. P., 20.)

99. Rules of procedure.—It should be recollected that general courts-martial must be conducted strictly in accordance with the rules of procedure. If any of the rules mentioned in R. P. 104 can not be observed, a certificate in accordance with that rule must be attached to the proceedings.

100. Record of service.—After finding, all details of the accused's service which can be obtained should be produced. In every case it is at least possible to produce the army list for this purpose.

101. Forfeiture of seniority.—For purposes of forfeiture of seniority the "reserve of officers" and "general list" are not corps, and a sentence of forfeiture of seniority in such a case can only be in the form prescribed at the head of page 696, M. M. L.

102. Confirmation—A. A., s. 44 (f) and (g).—Sentences of "forfeiture," "reprimand," and "severe reprimand" may be confirmed by all officers who hold warrants to confirm G. C. M., and should then be promulgated. When the other sentences mentioned in A. A., s. 44, are awarded the proceedings can only be confirmed by the commander in chief. In such cases all authorities in forwarding the proceedings will make their recommendations upon the case.

103. Disposal.—Officers sentenced to penal servitude, imprisonment, cashiering, or dismissal are to be handed over to the P. M. or A. P. M. of the formation immediately after promulgation, to whom special orders have been issued. (See G. R. O. 1807.)

104. Charge sheet and summary.—When practicable before a court is convened the charge sheet and summary of evidence will be forwarded to army headquarters or headquarters L. of C. area for approval, or, in the case of an officer belonging to some other formation, to the D. J. A. G., through the head of the formation.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I would like to call attention, in connection with what I was saying, to subparagraphs b; c, and d, of paragraph 12, which are short, and I will read them here, if I may [reading]:

(b) Specially qualified officers are stationed at convenient centers (usually corps headquarters or bases) whose whole time is devoted to sitting as members of courts-martial. No case of a difficult, complicated, or serious nature should ever be tried without the attendance of one of such officers.

(c) A courts-martial officer will take no part in preparing for trial any case in which he may have to act as a member of the court.

(d) He will invariably make the record of evidence and will advise the court on all points of law and procedure. His opinion will have the same weight as that of a judge advocate. (See R. P. 103 F.)

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I think that is a very good system.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Now, referring to this copy of proceedings which I have offered of two field general records, I was told by Judge Cassel that this is a complete, verbatim copy of the records, except that the names have been elided, and initials have been substituted in place of the names.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Is the evidence there, too?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The evidence is here, and it shows just the way they do it.

Senator WARREN. This is a photograph of the trials?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes, it is a photograph of these two trials, except that initials are substituted for names.

The first is the case of a man who was charged with desertion in the face of the enemy during the retreat from Mons. He was discovered at a quarter after 8 o'clock in the morning of September 6, 1914, hiding in civilian clothes in a house away from the line. A court was convened to try him that same day; he was tried that same day; he was sentenced to death that same day; the record was reviewed by the corps commander, Sir Horace Smith-Dorrien, that same day; it was also reviewed by, and confirmed by, Field Marshal French, the commander in chief, that same day; and the man was executed at 7 minutes after 7 a. m. on the morning of the 8th of September, a little less than 47 hours after the offense took place.

Senator WARREN. I am presuming that those officers who reviewed were nearby.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes; they were undoubtedly all together. It was during the retreat from Mons, and under unusually exigent circumstances. You will find something about this case in Gen. Childs' statement. He speaks of it there. He says that the man was shot and the Germans were marching over his grave within a few hours after his offense. That may be another case, which may be much stronger than this; or this may be the case he is talking about.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It was a very unusual case.

Senator WARREN. Yes, of course; very unusual.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That case did not go to the authorities in Great Britain?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. No; it was reviewed by the Deputy Judge Advocate General attached to Marshal French's staff. But they were all there together, and of course any deterrent effect from the execution had to be then or never, and to have let that man go until after the retreat from Mons was ended, and until after the battle of the Marne, the situation would have been so much changed that there would have been no value in the execution of the death sentence, at all.

The other case is a case where the evidence shows that the offense took place in 1918. This was during the trench warfare, on September 2, 1918. That trial was had in October—October 6; and the sentence was confirmed by Field Marshal Haig on November 3, so that that took about two months to run it through. The whole proceedings are there, including all of the testimony. Those are photographs, really, of those two records; and it shows how they do it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Are they typical of all the cases over there in the British army?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I think they are typical of the field general courts. The field general courts are intended to be, and are, very summary.

It is rather interesting, and perhaps it might be of interest to you, to put in a letter that was received by the Deputy Adjutant General's office, Gen. Childs' office, from the commander on the Rhine, in response to a request for permission to have me visit some of those field courts and have a stenographer present. The letter goes on to say that they doubt the wisdom of allowing us to visit and to have a stenographer there, because the field courts are intended to be, and are very summary, and they feared that if we had a stenographer present, the thing might not be carried on in exactly the same way, and we might not get a true picture of the way it is really done.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The field court is not very much different from our summary court is its procedure?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Their field court is very peremptory. The testimony is taken in the form of a narrative; it is written down by one member of the court, either the president or another member under the direction of the president, but it is simply summarized.

Senator WARREN. Could we act with the same haste under our Articles of War as in the particular case that you indicate there?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I do not see how we could. Take that first case. I do not know any way that we could grind a case through as promptly as that first case.

Senator WARREN. There are some liberties given to the accused under our rules. There is some time given to him to provide for his counsel or defense, is there not, in our law?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Of course many of those things can be waived, and it can be shortened by the direction of the commanding general in case of an emergency; but we always require the stenographic record, in practice, and in practice we always have a written review of the case afterwards; and we hold that there must be a reasonable opportunity for counsel, at least over night, to prepare; so in practice it would not be possible to do it as rapidly as that.

Senator WARREN. I say, it is more rapid than any way we have of handling a case under our law and practice?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I do not think there would be any way of getting a case investigated, referred for trial, tried, approved, and confirmed, all on the same day. I know there would not. We could not do anything like that.

Senator WARREN. I do not believe that in such a case as that the punishment was any too radical, because they were under the fire of the enemy all the time.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes, sir; it is an illustration of a class of cases where prompt punishment is necessary, and if it is not meted out promptly, it is of very little value at all, perhaps; and, as Gen. Childs says in one place in his interview, where it is necessary to take a man's life, you do not take his life because you want the man's life, but for its deterrent effect upon others; and for that purpose, in those cases action must be prompt, or it is valueless. The only other system I know of under which you could get as prompt action as that is the French system. They could, in their "special courts," waive everything.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In these English cases you refer to the field officer was not present, nor was the judge advocate present?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. That first case was before the time when they appointed these "specially qualified" officers; because the date of this court-martial officer order is in September, 1916, two years later; and I do not see anything in the 1918 case, definitely showing the presence of a "specially qualified officer"; except the letters "C. M. O." following the name of "Capt. B. C.," the third member of the court, in the order convening the court, which probably stand for "Court Martial Officer."

I might, before leaving England, say something as to the other courts.

The district court does most of the work in time of peace, and the greater part of it, at home in the United Kingdom, in time of war. That court is composed wholly of officers of the army. It is composed of three or more officers, usually of three; and no judge advocate, in practice, attends that court in the great majority of cases. There is authority in the convening authority to appoint a judge advocate, if he chooses; but he almost never does. They have, however, since the creation of this body of "specially qualified officers," these court-martial officers, been using those officers sometimes as members of the districts courts. For instance, Maj. Du Plat Taylor has been sitting practically as permanent president of the London command district court for the past 18 months. The form of record of the district court is practically that shown in the form of record of the field general court. There is no stenographic record taken.

Its proceedings are confirmed by the authority that appoints the court or higher authority.

The French have, for ordinary purposes, one court, what they call the conseil de guerre, which tries all military cases. There were, during the war, some emergency courts appointed by presidential decree by the President of the Republic. They called them "special courts" ("conseils de guerre speciaux"), and sometimes in conversation referred to them as "courts-martial," as contradistinguished from their ordinary conseils de guerre.

The regular court—"conseil de guerre"—is primarily a territorial court. It is appointed for a territorial district of the army, and for a period of six months. It has no civilian members. It is composed of seven judges. In case of the trial of an enlisted man, a private, or a noncommissioned officer, one noncommissioned officer sits on the court. He must always be a noncommissioned officer. They can not appoint a private.

Senator WARREN. One out of a court of seven?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes, one out of a court of seven; and in practice, at least, they invariably use a regimental or battalion sergeant-major, what they call the "adjutant," which corresponds to our regimental or battalion sergeant-major—their highest noncommissioned officer; and he is rather closer to the status of an officer than is our sergeant-major. He wears a belt like an officer's belt, a Sam Browne belt, and he wears a uniform that looks like an officer's uniform, and a kepi that looks like an officer's kepi.

In the armies on active service—they make the distinction, not wholly between peace and war, but between the armies in the territorial districts, and the armies on active service or in a "state of siege"; and I might say also that Great Britain in her military law makes the distinction, not between peace and war, but between "on active service" and "not on active service."

The "conseil de guerre," in the armies on active service, or in "a state of siege," consists of only five, instead of seven, judges. They are all military men. There is the same provision for one noncommissioned officer on the court on the trial of an enlisted man, whether private or noncommissioned officer. I talked with a good many French officials, military officers, and men connected with the administration of justice in their military courts, as to the plan of having the noncommissioned officer on the courts; and I tried to get their opinions; and I may say that in order to guard myself against reflecting my own ideas or thoughts in any way, in getting the information, and to be sure that I had it accurately in any event, I made a practice of taking with me two stenographers, an English-speaking stenographer and a French-speaking stenographer, and an interpreter; so that when I would ask the question in English, it would be taken down by the English-speaking stenographer in English, and then it would be translated into French, and then the French stenographer would get down the exact language of the officer interviewed, and afterwards at my office that was translated, so that I would get a picture, as near as possible, of the exact language. I did that as far as possible in every case in France.

Almost without exception the French officers think well of the plan of having a noncommissioned officer on the court. They say that, in effect, it does not make much difference one way or the other, they think, in the severity of the judgment. Some of them are inclined to think that the noncommissioned officer is a little more severe in his judgment of the men than the commissioned officers are. Some of them think that there is some advantage in getting the enlisted man's viewpoint on the court, in some cases. I think almost all of them agreed that they thought that the men were rather better pleased to feel that one of their grade was on the court; that, from their viewpoint, there was some value in it. I also asked in as many cases as I could what they would think of extending the plan so as to include private soldiers. Almost without exception they were opposed to that.

One or two were inclined to favor it. It had been proposed at one time in the French Chamber of Deputies, but was voted down. But almost everyone with whom I talked said that they felt that the private soldier would not have enough experience; so that his judgment would be of no value on the court; that they thought he would either be guided wholly by the officers on the court, or else would try in every case to let the man off. They feared that he would not be of any judicial value to the court.

I have, and could put into the record, if desired, copies of portions of interviews relating to that subject with quite a number of French officers from generals down.

Senator WARREN. I do not believe that would be necessary to put in.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think it is necessary.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I also, after Senate bill 64 was introduced—a copy of it having been sent to me over there which I received some time early in June—in the talks I had after that asked the opinions of the men I interviewed concerning the plan of having more than one enlisted man on the court. I think that with one exception everyone to whom I talked was opposed to increasing the number of enlisted men on the court. They thought that the one man on the court gave the viewpoint of the enlisted man sufficiently and that there could not be any advantage in increasing the number.

Senator WARREN. Did you find any adherence to the proposition of having a court of all enlisted men, excepting the officers conducting the trial?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. No, sir; I found no one who favored that; and I know of no court anywhere so composed.

Senator WARREN. That has been suggested by some one.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I have not seen any suggestion of that.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I know of no court, anywhere, so composed.

Senator WARREN. No; I did not say so composed. I had understood that one quite prominent lawyer in this country had thought that better—that is, to make a jury, you might say, of the court, and make it all of enlisted men—and I wanted to know if that had been thought of over there?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I found no one who favored that; nor anyone, with one exception, who favored more than one enlisted man on the court, speaking from their experience, all around.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Then this court you speak of, the “conseil de guerre,” considers cases of both enlisted men and officers?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. It considers both, but its composition varies. In case an officer is the accused, there is no enlisted man on the court; and there is a rather elaborate table made up as to how the composition of the court has to be fixed, depending upon the rank of the accused. The higher the rank of the accused, the higher the rank of the men on the court; and it is rigidly fixed in that way.

Senator WARREN. The court is composed of men of higher rank than the officer to be tried?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes, sir; of his rank and higher, except when you get up to the provisions for the trial of a “general of division,” or where a field marshal is the accused, then they have to make different provisions.

Senator WARREN. Yes, of course; but in the trial of a captain the court would be composed of officers all above the grade of captain?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Of the rank of captain and above; it is rigidly fixed in that way. For the trial of a captain, the court is: One colonel; one lieutenant colonel; three majors; and two captains (i. e., in the territorial armies).

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Does the French system provide that the accused may have counsel?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The French do, positively. The British do not. The British permit it. In the British courts, in the district courts, they very rarely have counsel. In the field general court they rarely have counsel. In the general court they almost invariably do have counsel. The British regulations do not permit counsel at the preliminary investigation, although as a matter of favor it is sometimes allowed at the preliminary investigation.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is, the investigation before the charge is preferred?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. During the investigation of the charge, before it is referred for trial.

The French provision is that in the regular "conseil de guerre" trial in time of peace, the charges must be read to the accused at least three days before the trial, and he must at that time be advised of his right to counsel, and that if he does not choose counsel for himself the president of the court will assign counsel to him at the trial.

In the armies on active service that three days provision may be disregarded; and in fact the whole preliminary investigation may be omitted, and the commanding general may direct, in the armies on active service, under section 156 of their code, that the accused be sent directly before the court for trial; that is, without any preliminary investigation whatever, by what they call "direct order." In that case he must be given 24 hours notice of the time that the court is to convene, and counsel for him must be named by the convening authority at the same time that he orders the case to trial. The accused may, if he chooses, then have his own independent counsel present also to assist him.

In case the three days' notice is given him, then it is not necessary to name counsel for him in advance; the practice is then the same as in the territorial armies. In practice, in Paris, and I am told in the territorial armies generally, they very frequently have civilian advocates. They have a provision in their law by which the president of a military court has the same power as the judge of a civilian criminal court, to appoint a lawyer to appear for the accused, and if a lawyer is so appointed he must serve without any fee. That is a part of the obligation of his office as an advocate.

So that, not infrequently, lawyers are assigned in that way by the court in the territorial armies at home to defend the accused.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Is there any appeal procedure there?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes. Will you allow me to finish, just a moment, as to the composition of the court?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; certainly.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I was going to say—about the practice there in Paris—of all those trials that I attended, I think probably half the cases were defended by civilian lawyers in their robes of office. I saw a woman defend one case. She did it very well, too.

In the armies on active service the counsel for the accused is almost invariably a military man, and almost invariably assigned by the president of the court, usually on the advice of the "commissaire-rapporteur," or judge advocate. They assign in practice private soldiers very frequently as counsel for the accused. They make no distinction at all between a soldier, an enlisted man, and an officer in assigning counsel; they pick a man who they think is capable of doing it, whether he is an army officer or a private soldier. If he is a private soldier, he will wear his advocate's robe over his uniform. If he is an officer, he does not.

I talked with quite a number of men as to the advisability, in their judgment, of appointing lieutenants and private soldiers as counsel for the accused, and they all of them failed to see any reason why any distinction should be made. How much the counsel for the accused may really amount to with them, particularly in the armies on active service, I think may be just a little bit doubtful. I have a statement by one commissaire du gouvernement—a rather naïve statement—in which he says it does not make any difference, because the court make up their minds in the armies on active service, and are very rarely influenced in any event by anything that the counsel for the accused may say.

I ought to add to that that on the other hand I got statements by several officers who seemed to think that the counsel for the accused were of value. It depends, of course, upon the personnel of the court and of the counsel.

The other class of courts that they have, that were established under the presidential decree of September 6, 1914—or that they had during the war until they were abolished by an act early in 1918—the emergency courts, what they called “special courts,” were composed of three judges—one officer of field rank, one other officer, and in case the accused was an enlisted man or a civilian, the third judge was a noncommissioned officer. In those courts there was no requirement of even 24 hours’ notice before sending a man to trial. The commanding general could order him to trial instantly, without any preliminary investigation whatever, appointing a counsel for him at the same time. The court might be immediately convened, he might be immediately tried, and the sentence followed immediately, and was to be immediately executed, even though it should be a sentence of death; and no appeal of any kind was allowed from those sentences.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That was afterwards repealed?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. They were abolished in 1918.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Why?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I think—now, I am only saying what I think; I got various kinds of information—there had been a great deal of outcry in France against the summary proceedings of those courts.

On the other hand, the reason for the appointment of those courts was stated by Marshal Joffre, on whose recommendation the decree was entered, in a letter of September 9, 1914, in which he promulgated the decree to the army, Circular Letter No. 4487.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That was without legislative authority?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. That was without specific legislative authority. And he says that the reason for it was the “imperious necessity” for a more rapid procedure than was possible with the constituted forms in use for the regular courts.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It was that which the legislature, the Chamber of Deputies, finally repealed?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. They abolished the courts. The decree was merely a presidential decree, and the courts were abolished in 1918. There were a great many trials by those courts during the war from which there was no appeal allowed.

Senator WARREN. You have spoken two or three times of active service. Of course, I assume you mean by “active service,” service at the front? The reason that I ask that question is that with us active service is service at the front or anywhere else, if not retired or reserve service, and I wondered if your distinction was the same over there or whether otherwise you meant service at the front or in the war.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. No; I was using it in their technical sense. Their distinction as to the footing or status is not wholly between peace and war as ours is, but between "on active service" and "not on active service." Even during the war you may have troops governed in France by their territorial system at the same time that others are "on active service" and subject to the regulations pertaining to that status.

In Great Britain this war was the first time in some three centuries that all troops at home were regarded as being "on active service."

The distinction, as defined in section 189 of the British Army act, is:

The expression "on active service," as applied to a person subject to military law, means whenever he is attached to or forms part of a force which is engaged in operations against the enemy or is engaged in military operations in a country or place wholly or partly occupied by an enemy, or is in military occupation of any foreign country.

The antithesis to that is "not on active service."

For Great Britain particularly, with her very many little wars all over the world, that plan has proven its value; because they do not want to have to have their military courts trying for murder in the United Kingdom just because there is war in Afghanistan.

I was going to say, as to the French "special courts," the only thing that operated in a kind of way as an appellate power, or power of revision, was the provision that the death sentence should not be carried into effect except upon the order of the commanding general, and the commanding general had the power, if he chose to do so, to suspend it, while consulting the pleasure of the President of the Republic.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. There was no other appeal?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. There was no other appeal.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Have you any idea how many court-martial sentences there were in France—how many trials

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Senator, I have those figures here, as a matter of fact, but my memory is, and I will have to verify that, that those are among the papers given to me by Minister Ignace, subject to the same kind of confidential letter that the British Judge Advocate General gave to me. I will look his letter up. He reserved some things, and not others; and if it is not included, I will put that into the record, if I may.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That will be the total number of court-martial cases; and if possible, the average of sentences, or the aggregate of sentences.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Not the severity of sentences, and not the number of death sentences. Those figures we could not get. They were promising and promising, but they never gave them; and I think they felt that it was not wise to let us have them. But we got the total number of cases, and the total number of convictions, and the total number of acquittals, and divided up among the different kinds of offenses, so many for desertion, so many for this, so many for that; but we do not have the severity of sentences.

Senator WARREN. I think I ought to ask, right there, how the British and French sentences compared, as to severity of sentence, with the severity of sentences by the American Army?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. As to the French, I can not speak by the card, because that was the one thing that, as I said a moment ago, they withheld. I know that they gave a great many severe sentences; and they do not have the provision for detention barracks, as the British call it, or disciplinary barracks, as we call it; so that an imprisonment sentence with the French really means a sentence to imprisonment, and is a much more severe sentence than our disciplinary barracks sentence would be.

The French, however, had a plan, which they copied from the British during the war and put into force, I think, in the fall of 1917, of suspending sentences with the provision that after suspending, they might put them in force again.

Senator WARREN. Something like a parole?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In effect, a kind of parole. They suspended them, and the men went back and served with their units, and if they made good, the sentence was, after six months, to be canceled.

Senator WARREN. Along that line, what is the practice in our Army as to sentence; to undertake to carry out the full sentence or to make the term of imprisonment depend upon a man's conduct?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The latter, as I understand it, Senator. The purpose, as I understand the disciplinary barracks, is to reform the men and give them an opportunity for restoration to the colors, if they are worthy of it. It depends largely on the man himself.

Senator WARREN. Exactly. Now, do they sometimes give excessive sentences—for instance as to the length of time, a very long time—really with the expectation of reducing the time, not in the percentage by which in civil sentences they reduce it, but in proportion as the soldier deserves it by his conduct? How do you handle that? Do you follow the lines of our civil practice where there is a certain portion of time taken off the sentences for good conduct, or do you sometimes make very severe sentences with the expectation when they are made that they will be shortened, and to a much greater degree than a sentence under our civil law?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Of course, really both. There is a provision for shortening a sentence for good conduct; and then there is this other, also. I am told that Col. Rice, the commandant of the Leavenworth Barracks, says that it really does not make any difference to him, in recommending restoration to the colors, or putting a man in the way of restoration to the colors, what the nominal length of the sentence is, at all; it is up to the man to prove himself and make good; and if he does make good, a man under a nominal sentence of five years or ten years may be restored just as quickly as one with a nominal sentence of two years.

I think, perhaps, that two of the cases that Senator Chamberlain will remember, that were cited in the Senator's speech of December 30 of last year, were fair illustrations of that. I remember one of those cases where the man was sentenced, if I remember correctly, in June, to 15 years for absence without leave. He was released from the barracks, in the normal course of the operation of Col. Rice's plan, and restored to the colors on the 23d of December following, as a Christmas gift, so that his nominal 15 years' sentence really amounted to less than seven months. Another of the cases that was cited, I think, in the same speech, was a 10-year sentence in March; and that man went to Fort Jay and was released on the same day that the other man was released, the second day before the Christmas following, after being in the barracks just about nine months.

Senator WARREN. You would consider those as fair representations of what might be the outcome of long sentences?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes; as I understand it, Senator; certainly. Those releases were made, of course, before the special clemency board came up—before any of that controversy.

(At this point the statement of Lieut. Col. Rigby was suspended in order that the committee might hear Gen. Parker.)

STATEMENT OF BRIG. GEN. FRANK PARKER, UNITED STATES ARMY, COMMANDING THE FIRST DIVISION.

Senator WARREN. Will you please state your name and rank to the stenographer?

Gen. PARKER. Frank Parker; brigadier general, United States Army; at present commanding the First Division.

Senator WARREN. That division is now being demobilized?

Gen. PARKER. Yes, sir; it is just completing its demobilization. It will be demobilized within the next few days.

Senator WARREN. You have had duty abroad?

Gen. PARKER. Yes; I have been abroad practically for the last four years, first with the French Army, and then with our own Army.

Senator WARREN. You were with the French Army?

Gen. PARKER. I was an observer with the French Army practically throughout the war.

Senator WARREN. By appointment from the War Department here?

Gen. PARKER. Yes; by order of the War Department.

Senator WARREN. What were your duties over there? I am speaking of your duties as observer while with the French Army. What did that develop into?

Gen. PARKER. When we declared war the military mission of the United States sent me to the French general headquarters as chief of our mission at those headquarters. When Gen. Pershing arrived with his staff, in June, he maintained me between himself and the French general headquarters as his chief of mission until December of 1917, when I was given command of the Eighteenth Infantry, of the First Division.

Senator WARREN. You, of course, with your service with the French, probably speak French fluently?

Gen. PARKER. Yes; I speak French fluently. I have been with the French on a good many occasions.

I subsequently commanded the Eighteenth Infantry, and the First Infantry brigade, and the First Division throughout the hostilities.

Senator WARREN. Now, in your service has there come under your notice quite vividly the operation of courts-martial, general or special, so that you would like to express an opinion upon our present laws, our present Articles of War, as compared with the bill which is now before us and which I presume you have examined?

Gen. PARKER. Yes; I have read it over. No, sir; I am not qualified to pass upon the matters involved, because my contact with military law, certainly the last four years, has not been such as to qualify me for that purpose; but there is one point that I would like to touch upon, and that is the lack of speed in the working of the Judge Advocate General's department during active operations of an infantry division, especially with reference to the death sentence.

Senator WARREN. Are you distinguishing Infantry service from other service?

Gen. PARKER. I am speaking only of my own unit. I commanded an Infantry unit, and I am speaking of the operation of the military law in that division during the hostilities.

Senator WARREN. Just so. Please proceed.

Gen. PARKER. I think that the greatest element in connection with military success is speed, and it is just as necessary in one department as it is in another, and I think we can improve the speed with which our military justice is meted out on the front and in a division. To make my point clear by a particular case, we will suppose that the division is about to attack to-morrow morning. We know that we are going into a bloody fight; that we shall probably lose 60 per cent of our officers and men, which happened on occasions—on one occasion with my command. Certain men deliberately go absent. They know what is in front of them; they have had it all explained to them by careful talk, what they will have to do on the following day, and they know full well what is going to happen, and they deliberately absent themselves, and later are rounded up by the military police and are brought in under guard and turned back to their companies. It seems to me that at such a time there should be some speedy method of punishing those men adequately as the military law prescribes, and promptly, not so much for the punishment to the individual as for the moral effect produced upon the unit in general. That is what I wish to see provided.

Senator WARREN. Now, we get that idea, but is that a matter of regulation or of law? Is not that possible under the law now; or is it?

Gen. PARKER. That I am not qualified to say, whether that is or not.

Senator WARREN. You are speaking of the practice?

Gen. PARKER. I am speaking of the practice as it obtained during this war under my immediate observation. We found the general court-martial as at present organized and administered very heavy and cumbersome; slow in its action; so much so that I can not recall a case of a man being shot, of the American Army, for flagrant desertion in the face of the enemy.

Senator WARREN. Along that line, what is your observation as to the general severity or lack of severity in court-martial proceedings?

Gen. PARKER. In the First Division?

Senator WARREN. You are speaking now entirely of matters at the front?

Gen. PARKER. I am speaking entirely of those matters, for I have had no other experience except when I was serving between Gen. Pershing and Gen., at present Marshal, Petain.

Senator WARREN. You were in the Regular Army?

Gen. PARKER. Yes; I was graduated at West Point, and from the French Cavalry School.

Senator WARREN. That is at Sumieres?

Gen. PARKER. At Sumieres.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It would be well, in your view, at the front, in cases such as you put, that these men who deliberately absent themselves just before a battle and who are brought in before the battle—

Gen. PARKER. No, sir; after the battle.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. After the battle?

Gen. PARKER. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You would have it so that they could be tried at once, and executed, without the formalities that are now required?

Gen. PARKER. Without the form; not formalities. We shall always need formalities where the death sentence is to be imposed, and the person who inflicts the death penalty will at all times be responsible for it, and must explain his responsibility to the higher authorities; that, of course. But there are so many cases where the offense is so clear that I, as a colonel of a regiment, for instance, would not hesitate to order that man shot. I have told my men when they have been brought back. We have very few men of that kind. We have very few men in the American Army that do that sort of thing; I am proud to say that we have not had many, and it is just those cases that should have been made examples of.

Senator WARREN. For the benefit of the rest of the Army?

Gen. PARKER. For the benefit of the others who felt that they were going in and doing their full duty and dying, while another man was running away and escaping the death that his friend met, by his side.

Senator WARREN. Would you say there were any differences in nationalities, as to that?

Gen. PARKER. No, sir. I have served in the field with every sort of men. I spent three years with the Cubans.

Senator WARREN. That might happen with men of any nationality?

Gen. PARKER. No, sir. Courage is not the privilege of any particular nationality. I have found that one man is like another. It is the manner in which it is explained to him and the manner in which he has lived that determines the kind of man that he is going to be. We had men from 46 States in my division.

Senator WARREN. Have you not known men who have seemed for a moment to be arrant cowards, but afterwards proved to be brave men?

Gen. PARKER. Yes, sir; but not——

Senator WARREN. I am not applying that to flagrant desertion in the face of the enemy.

Gen. PARKER. Yes; you mean a man that is capable of a moment's weakness in the face of imminent danger. But I think the man that runs away from the fight before the fight, is hopeless. I think he will do that again.

Senator WARREN. We are very glad to have your opinion on that.

Gen. PARKER. Thank you, Senator.

(Thereupon, at 12.30 o'clock p. m., the subcommittee took a recess until 2.30 o'clock p. m.)

AFTER RECESS.

The subcommittee met at 2.30 o'clock p. m., pursuant to the taking of the recess.

STATEMENT OF MAJ. GEN. F. J. KERNAN, UNITED STATES ARMY.

Senator WARREN. I see you have had considerable service on the other side.

Gen. KERNAN. I was over 18 or 19 months.

Senator WARREN. I assume you know quite well what is before this subcommittee, since you were one, I believe, of the board that the Secretary called upon to make a report with reference to the Chamberlain bill as compared with the present law, and the committee would like to hear anything additional to what you gave in that report, or any changes that may have suggested themselves since you made the report, and you may allude to it as you see fit and proceed in your own way, if you will.

Gen. KERNAN. Really, Senator, the report has my signature, and the concurrence in it expresses pretty fully the general views that I entertain upon the subject of courts-martial, their functions in the governmental system and the modifications which would go at present to make a distinct improvement in that system. You gentlemen, I take it, have seen the report.

Senator WARREN. Oh, yes; and I have read it very carefully, and I think the other Senators have.

Gen. KERNAN. I may say that there might arise a little misconception about the membership of that board, as I see a fourth member is put down. The board consists of three members. The fourth man is a recorder, whose business is to take care of the papers and look after the correspondence, etc. The convening order expressly states that it is to be a board of three members.

Senator WARREN. I have forgotten about the signatures. Is it not signed by three?

Gen. KERNAN. No, the recorder signed it afterwards. It is an inadvertence.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is so understood.

Senator WARREN. I so understood it. There was no misunderstanding about it. Gen. O'Ryan was before the committee, and while I think he very generally followed the lines of the report, he mentioned incidentally that there was some argument on some of the points, and there might be or might not be some difference of opinion, but not enough to prevent them all signing the report.

Gen. KERNAN. Well, the report, the general discussion, was acquiesced in by everybody. There was in three cases I think only a difference of opinion indicated as to specific recommendations in relation to the modification of certain articles. Gen. O'Ryan dissented from the majority in one case, namely, I think, as to the one hundred and fifth article of war, and I dissented twice from the other two officers and noted my dissent in each case. One of my dissents was as to the proposition of having peremptory challenges introduced into the court-martial system, and the other was as to the proposed departure from deciding questions in general by majority vote. The board adopted the two-thirds rule in lieu of the existing majority rule for deciding all questions except questions involving the death penalty. We concurred, however, in making a change by which we substituted a three-fourths vote for a two-thirds vote in matters involving the death penalty. With those three exceptions, as far as I recollect, the report is unanimous.

Senator WARREN. Senator Chamberlain, since you are so conversant with the bill you introduced, and as you are conversant with the other, would you like to ask the general some questions about the differences?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. General, how many changes in the present Articles of War did your board recommend, if you remember now?

Gen. KERNAN. I think we recommended something like 30 or 32 changes; that is, we recommended amendments on about 32 of the articles, and we proposed a new article, 50½.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You do not suggest any change in the composition of the courts as now established, or any change in the Articles of War with reference to the composition of courts as now established?

Gen. KERNAN. No, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What is your idea about an appellate tribunal of any kind?

Gen. KERNAN. We have undertaken to provide that in article 50½.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That was the proposed amendment offered by Gen. Crowder to the Military Committee in January, 1918?

Gen. KERNAN. In substance it may be, but its wording I think is ours.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But it does not take the power out of the hands of the military authorities in any way or form?

Gen. KERNAN. No, sir; it does not put the power in civilian hands. It provides, as you will see, that each case that comes to the Judge Advocate General's Office for file and examination under the existing law shall be so examined; and if that examination discloses anything that seems to call either for clemency as now, or for a complete setting aside because of irregularities or a substantial failure of justice, that in such a case the Judge Advocate General shall make a memorandum pointing out the defects that he finds in the case and shall submit his memorandum with the record of the case to the Secretary of War for the action of the President.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In the last analysis, it really leaves the whole question on appeal to the Judge Advocate General, does it not?

Gen. KERNAN. It does in so far as everything except the final substantial action, which will have to be the President's.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But you know from your own contact with the department, with the Secretary of War, the Commander in Chief of the Army in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred follows the recommendation of the military authorities?

Gen. KERNAN. Oh, I think so.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes. So that in the last analysis the whole business would be in the Judge Advocate General's Office?

Gen. KERNAN. Very largely; yes, sir; as to recommendations.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Now, I am frank to say that this feature of it I do not like. I think there ought to be some appellate tribunal of some kind, or some advisory tribunal, if you please, that would have jurisdiction over these appeals.

I notice in your report—and I think that is the essential difference between those of us who are quarreling over these Articles of War, some believing that the whole system ought to be administered within the military and others that there ought to be some civilian court of appeals to hear these mooted questions—I notice in your report here that on page 6 you question the right of Congress really to take certain functions away from the Commander in Chief of the Army.

Gen. KERNAN. Well, we put an interrogation mark at the end of each of those sentences.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I am glad you did, because it is a remarkable thing to say that the President as Commander in Chief of the Army inherited any of the rights which the King of England formerly exercised.

Gen. KERNAN. The thought that mainly underlies those six or seven pages is this: I think that when the Constitution declared the President should be the Commander in Chief of the land and naval forces, and so forth, the words "commander in chief" had to have read into them some definite meaning, and to find out what they mean you naturally go to contemporaneous history and to usage in the Continental armies and in the English Army to see what powers should fall under that designation, and one of the powers was to convene courts-martial and to act officially on their proceedings.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you look upon a court-martial as a judicial body or its judgment as judicial in nature or executive, merely?

Gen. KERNAN. Well, I should say they were both. I really am not a lawyer, Senator, of course, but it does seem to me that when you get down to the final analysis all courts are in aid of the executive power, are they not?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Well, no; I would follow the decision of the Supreme Court and say that the decisions of these military tribunals are distinctly judicial.

Gen. KERNAN. I do not feel qualified really to make fine distinctions, certainly not offhand, as to whether the particular function is executive or judicial; but I can not see why it should not be both, myself. A great many things have two aspects; are looked at in several ways.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I was astounded at that finding of your committee practically denying to Congress the right to legislate away from the Commander in Chief certain functions that you claimed that he inherited from the King.

Gen. KERNAN. Of course, he did not get them exclusively by inheritance. Whatever he has he got by the affirmative declaration of the Constitution that he should be the Commander in Chief.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Here is the way it reads [reading]:

The rules governing armies had their beginnings not in legislative bodies, but in commanders, whether called kings or chiefs or generals, and in early times those who formulated the rules carried them out. With the evolution of Governments the right of prescribing the most important or fundamental rules has lodged in legislative bodies, but the execution of those rules, their practical administration, has heretofore been left to commanders and their assistants down through the hierarchy of command to the very bottom. Courts-martial have always been agencies for creating and maintaining the discipline of armies, and in earlier times, and certainly until the adoption of our Constitution, were provided and administered by commanders as an inherent right.

Now, I claim that they had no right except as that right is conferred by the Constitution and by Congress.

Gen. KERNAN. We were talking about early times, before the adoption of the Constitution.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Following that up you say:

The King of England had and exercised this inherent right. The Continental Congress took over some of the duties of government in the rebellious Colonies, but Washington as Commander in Chief appointed courts-martial as of right inherent in that office without the express authority of that Congress. So that when our Constitution was adopted and the powers of the Federal Government were distributed among three great departments, and the President was made by the organic law Commander in Chief, the power to appoint courts-martial, by virtue of that office, was well understood. The power to make rules for the government of the land forces was at the same time confided to Congress. The earlier Articles of War continued or created under that grant of power did not expressly confer upon the President the right or authority to appoint courts-martial, but actually he exercised the power, and the validity of that action is well established. It appears, therefore, that before our Constitution was established a Commander in Chief was inherently competent to appoint courts-martial as incident to his office; that under the Constitution this right has been exercised and upheld, and further, that the rules made for the Army by Congress have extended to subordinate commanders (who are in fact assistants to the President in his special capacity as Commander in Chief) the right to appoint and to make use of this agency.

You question then in the next paragraph, which I have not read, the power of Congress to make changes.

Gen. KERNAN. Well, not all changes; not any changes. What is questioned there, Senator, is the power of the Congress to derogate from the authority conferred by the Constitution on the Commander in Chief, and the question is, what are those powers thus conferred? What does the term "Commander in Chief" connote and carry with it by necessary implication? It must mean something. Does it stop with the power merely to issue commands and then hope, please Heaven, that they will be obeyed? Or does it necessarily imply that the power to enforce obedience to the command goes with it? Now, if it does, then when you take courts-martial from the President you take away from him as Commander in Chief the weapon which is the last resort to make his commands effective?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you think Congress has not the power to change the court-martial in any way it sees fit?

Gen. KERNAN. Oh, yes, indeed; in composition, membership, name, etc. I have seen it done since I have been in the service.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. They might change the whole function of the Commander in Chief with respect to courts-martial.

Gen. KERNAN. I do not question at all the right to install new courts-martial, or change the composition and the membership of the old ones. It is very much like this in my mind, Senator: You can create in Congress a new arm to-morrow. Call it what you please, a tank corps, something nonexistent before in our Government. But when it is created as a part of the Army of the United States it passes of necessity under the command of the President, and you would not attempt, in creating a new arm, to say that it should be commanded by the governor of a State or somebody not of the Army of the United States.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I think that is true.

Gen. KERNAN. Very well. In the same way, to my way of thinking, you can create all the new tribunals to enforce discipline you please, change their jurisdiction or change their composition and the way they proceed to do their work; but when you make a court-martial which is intended to be an adjunct of the Army to enforce discipline, by the same reasoning it seems to me the use of this disciplinary weapon passes into the President's hands as a part of the function of command.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you think Congress could pass a law making the Judge Advocate General a civilian and creating a court of appeals entirely of civilians in connection with the Judge Advocate General?

Gen. KERNAN. I do not doubt its power to create new offices.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you think Congress would have the power to provide by amended Articles of War that the Judge Advocate General, when appointed, should be a civilian, appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate? Do you think Congress would have that power?

Gen. KERNAN. Please remember that I have disclaimed being a lawyer, and in answering that question I should say that it is competent for Congress to create any new office it wants to and give it any title it pleases. The question of whether or not that office would function as you intended, it seems to me, would depend upon the duties you undertake to assign to the office.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You think then that the present law could be changed so that the Judge Advocate General could be appointed by the President out of civilian life—a lawyer out of civilian life?

Gen. KERNAN. I think it can be done now under existing law.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That of course would necessitate a change of the Article of War, because that provides for the appointment of a Judge Advocate General.

Gen. KERNAN. I think he could be appointed. I think that if the President wanted to, and Gen. Crowder's office was vacant, he could appoint a civilian to the office, and if you gentlemen confirmed him, he would be there, but transformed from a civilian into an Army officer.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you not think that Congress could pass a law creating an appellate tribunal, to which tribunal appeals from military conviction might be had, composed entirely of civilian lawyers, for instance?

Gen. KERNAN. With what functions, Senator?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. With any functions Congress might see fit to confer upon them.

Gen. KERNAN. I think you could undertake to confer upon such a tribunal functions which would be in derogation of the Constitutional authority of the President as Commander in Chief, and if you did so, why, I should say that the attempt to do that would fail.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Well, then, you would question the authority of Congress to do that legally?

Gen. KERNAN. Yes, sir; constitutionally.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Here is what I am getting at, General—

Gen. KERNAN. Mind you, I do not say that you can not create any tribunal you please. The question is whether it is going to function or not, and that depends on the duties you place in its hands. It is possible that those duties might be taking something from another office, which is constitutionally guarded, and therefore you can not take it.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Suppose a man is convicted by a general court-martial in France. The court has jurisdiction and the trial has been regular, and the only appellate tribunal that has jurisdiction is the commanding officer. Is not that true?

Gen. KERNAN. Yes, sir; now in the general case; in some cases confirmation is required.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That I do not think ought to be the case. There ought to be some higher tribunal to which that man might appeal. Now, I differ from Gen. Crowder in this: Gen. Crowder holds that, under section 1199 of the Revised Statutes he has no power more than to revise the proceedings, to examine the proceedings, and if he finds that the court had jurisdiction and that there were no substantial irregularities in the trial, evidently he has no other function than to send it back in an advisory capacity. I think there ought to be some right of appeal, and there are a great many lawyers who think there ought to be some right of appeal; that there ought to be a power somewhere to reverse a decision which was wrong. Do you see any objection to that?

Gen. KERNAN. Oh, yes, sir; I have endeavored to set forth the objections as they appeared to me, in the report that you gentlemen have before you; and in a brief way, to repeat it in substance, the objection is that you set up an independent civilian tribunal with power to nullify the efforts of the Commander in Chief and his subordinates down through the steps of command in the exercise of what is a part of the function of command.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is a strictly military view of the situation.

Senator WARREN. Let me see if I get this. I confess that I do not know much about law. The General and you want some review and the power to lessen, to quash and so forth, and as the General answers, perhaps he thinks it is to be entirely civilian, and when it goes through there is no power then either in the army or the Commander in Chief of the army, the President, to change what that tribunal may decide upon. Now as I understand the General—correct me if I am wrong—it is that whatever tribunal is established, the President of the United States is Commander in Chief of the Army, and as Commander nothing can be taken away from him in the way of the handling of the military forces, but what he has ultimately the right and duty of a commander to perform. In other words, it must in a sense be subservient to the command of the Commander in Chief all the way through. I do not know but I am stumbling, but I was wondering whether that is not the difference, since the General says there may be a civilian appointed as Judge Advocate General.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Let us put this kind of a case to you, General, by way of illustration. We will say that a private soldier—or so far as that is concerned, he may be a commissioned officer—is tried in France for desertion. He is found guilty. It goes up to the commanding officer, and the commanding officer approves the sentence. Now the commanding officer may not be a lawyer, he may be strictly a military man, and ever so good a man, and the trial court might be composed of men none of whom are lawyers. The approval of that sentence by the commanding officer if the court had jurisdiction and the trial was regular, ends it, although there may have been prejudicial error in the trial because of lack of knowledge on the part of the court or the commanding officer. Now there is a man who has been convicted, and his sentence approved, and he has been ordered to the penitentiary and dishonorably discharged from the Army, and yet he has no right of appeal anywhere. Do you not think that under a democracy such as ours there ought to be an appeal somewhere, in order that justice may be done to the man who has been improperly convicted and his conviction approved by the commanding officer?

Gen. KERNAN. Yes; and I evidenced my desire by endeavoring to draft an article here which would create that sort of a court of appeals.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I know you have, but that is strictly within the military. Now let me put this case to you.

Gen. KERNAN. Before you leave that question, Senator, though, I want to point out that the case you have supposed could not happen. There may be no lawyer on the court, but there is always an adviser to the reviewing authority who is a lawyer, and who looks over these cases as to whether or not there has occurred prejudicial error, before the commanding general takes action thereon.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is, a lawyer?

Gen. KERNAN. A judge advocate on the general's staff, invariably.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Have you known of many cases where the commanding officer has reversed the judgment of the court below?

Gen. KERNAN. It is not uncommon to have the reviewing authority disapprove the findings and sentences of courts-martial. It is not at all uncommon.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But you practically concede that there ought to be a right of appeal to some tribunal, because you recommend it.

Gen. KERNAN. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Why recommend it if those errors are cured by the commanding officer or by his adviser?

Gen. KERNAN. In the first place, these judge advocates that I speak of on the staff of the reviewing authority, being human are liable to err, and if they do, since all these cases automatically go to the Judge Advocate General's office, they are again looked over by lawyers in that office. If there they discover something which through inadvertence was overlooked or misunderstood by the reviewing officer and his staff judge advocate, there arises a situation in which now the only cure for the defect is the exercise of clemency by the President; and that is not sufficient. It does not cover the whole needs. To make the system really complete, then, you want lodged somewhere the power to set aside as void ab initio those proceedings, and to restore the party to his rights as if those defective proceedings had not taken place. And we have, in this article 50½, endeavored to provide for these rare but possible cases. I say rare because it is a fact that the law applicable to courts-martial is so relatively simple that in the great majority of cases they present no matter of complexity, so that the judge advocate on the staff of the commanding general is almost certain to discover anything of a radically wrong nature; and when that happens he draws it to the attention of the reviewing officer; and that officer, unless he is incompetent, will see the point and disapprove the proceedings himself, if that is the only remedy.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. My insistence has been, and other lawyers agree with me on that, that the Judge Advocate General has had that power under the law as it is now, but that he has not exercised it.

Gen. KERNAN. I have read the briefs submitted by Gen. Ansell and Gen. Crowder, and vice versa, on that question. Of course they have both said a great deal.

Senator LENROOT. General, in your objection to the court of appeals, is it your construction of Senator Chamberlain's bill that this proposed court would have a right to substitute its judgment upon the facts for the judgment of the court-martial?

Gen. KERNAN. Is that my objection?

Senator LENROOT. Is that your construction of the bill?

Gen. KERNAN. Well, I would have to look at it again.

Senator LENROOT. I wish you would, because I think it is quite important. I call your attention to the top of page 31, article 52. In line 22, page 30, it reads:

Said court shall review the record of the proceedings of every general court or military commission which carries a sentence involving death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge or confinement for a period of more than six months, for the correction of errors of law evidenced by the record and injuriously affecting the substantial rights of an accused without regard to whether such errors were made the subject of objection or exception at the trial.

Up to that time they would be limited to the correction of prejudicial errors of law. Then it goes on [reading]:

And such power of review shall include the power—(a) to disapprove a finding of guilty and approve only so much of a finding of guilty of a particular offense as involves a finding of guilty of a lesser included offense.

And so on with the different subdivisions. In your opinion does the language, "such power of review," include the power and in your judgment all the power of this court-martial, power to pass upon facts as well as on judicial errors of law? Do I make myself plain, General?

Gen. KERNAN. I think so, Senator. I think I see what you are driving at. If I understand you, you want to know whether my objection to this article——

Senator LENROOT. I was getting your construction first, whether the power to include these other powers must all be based upon prejudicial errors of law, or would the court of appeals substitute its judgment if they came to the wrong conclusion?

Senator WARREN. Have jurisdiction of all matters respecting the case?

Senator LENROOT. Yes, practically. In other words, under this language could the court of appeals deal with the case in any way that it saw fit, that it thought the evidence of the record warranted?

Gen. KERNAN. It seems to me, Senator, that it is exceedingly difficult in practice to have anybody undertake to consider in a record exclusively and purely questions of law. To my mind questions of law are so intermingled and interwoven and bound up with and dependent upon the questions of fact that are in the same record that it is almost humanly impossible for a body to review the law as a thing apart in that particular case without also going into and reviewing or construing in some degree the facts.

Senator LENROOT. But that is true of appellate courts in civil jurisdictions, General. They review for errors of law. Of course the facts may have a bearing to show whether an error of law has been committed, but an appellate civil tribunal does not attempt to substitute its judgment for the judgment of the jury of the lower court.

Gen. KERNAN. I imagine, however, in the civil practice the judges who are reviewing exclusively questions of law presented in a case are as well qualified as the trial judge or the jury to understand all the facts and the bearings of those facts and the implications of those facts, and so forth.

Senator LENROOT. They may be, but they are never permitted to substitute their judgment for that of the lower court upon the facts. Now what I am getting at, General, is, I am wondering whether you would have objection to such a court as is here provided if the court was limited in its jurisdiction to passing upon errors of law prejudicial to the accused, but not permitting it to revise the finding, or substitute its judgment upon the record for that of the court-martial.

Gen. KERNAN. In such a case, Senator, how would you propose to make the views of the reviewing tribunal effective?

Senator LENROOT. Exactly as we do in civil tribunals. It would be sent back if there were errors of law prejudicial to the accused, and give him the opportunity to get a fair trial, and if there were no such errors of law, whatever the appellate court might think as to the justice of the verdict, they would have no jurisdiction to pass upon that.

Gen. KERNAN. Certainly if you are going to make an innovation of the kind suggested here in this article, I should much prefer to see it limited as you say, Senator, to a review of the errors of law exclusively.

Senator LENROOT. I am inclined to the construction of this bill that the words "such power of review shall include the power," together with these subdivisions, give this court of appeals the right to pass upon its view of what the evidence justified, although there may have been no prejudicial error committed by the court-martial.

Senator WARREN. That is your construction of the proposition in this bill?

Senator LENROOT. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I think the General has so fully embodied in the Kernan report his views on this, that I do not think it is necessary to interrogate him further.

Senator WARREN. You stand now as when you made the report, as not wishing to make any change, addition to or subtraction from it?

Gen. KERNAN. Yes, sir.

If I could be of any use at all it seems to me it might be in taking up these concrete propositions which we have embodied here in the appendix.

Senator LENROOT. Of your proposed revision? You comment on each of them in the report?

Gen. KERNAN. Yes, sir.

Senator LENROOT. Are there any of those that you would like to enlarge upon?

Gen. KERNAN. There are several which I regard as of very considerable importance, and based on a great deal of court-martial experience. I have been 38 years a commissioned officer, I have been a department judge advocate, for instance, for four years, and

I have been on many courts in all capacities and what I have reported here in some of these matters represents a great deal of experience and reflection, and for that reason I believe that perhaps if I were——

Senator WARREN. Feel free to take up any one of them and explain further and make any comment that you wish. We are seeking light; the more the better.

Gen. KERNAN. The first that I want to refer to is our proposed amendment to article 4. There we undertook when possible to exclude officers of less than two years' experience from sitting on a court-martial except as a minority.

Senator WARREN. In extremity what would you do?

Gen. KERNAN. We have proposed an absolute rule in time of peace, but not in time of war, when you have got to do what the occasion calls for or do nothing. Now I think that that is a very useful provision, because a great many of the more or less absurd sentences and perhaps unjustifiable findings that are arrived at by courts-martial are due to inexperience and lack of knowledge, not of law chiefly, but of the service, of the relations that the acts of the men under trial really have to the service. Why, in the first two years of the service a man appointed from civil life is hardly familiar with the terminology of the Army, and hardly knows what the terms mean, and he is therefore not qualified by experience or by acquired knowledge to really sit and judge of the relation which the deeds committed bear to the Army. At the same time those young men have got to learn sometime. Therefore it is highly advisable to give them an opportunity to get experience and to see how courts work in practice, so that we ought to have them sit on courts. But not in sufficient numbers to have a decisive voice in the results.

Senator WARREN. I take it you know that there have been absurd sentences?

Gen. KERNAN. Oh, undoubtedly.

Senator WARREN. And others with excessive penalties, you might say? Now, as I remember it, you gave your idea of the percentage of those, that they were not a large percentage of the whole. Did those things occur because of immature officers, do you think—immature in their judgment upon law and upon the practice of courts-martial?

Gen. KERNAN. Very largely, Senator: not entirely due to that, but I believe in the few cases that I have actually looked over, the courts were composed of officers of very small average experience.

Senator WARREN. You have been abroad a good deal of the time. Was that as true over there as here in this country; or, if not, what was the percentage?

Gen. KERNAN. I could not undertake to give percentages, Senator.

Senator WARREN. Approximately, that is all.

Gen. KERNAN. The few cases that I looked at were nearly all cases in this country at small stations relatively, where the choice of membership for the courts was much limited. Convening authorities had to put on the court the material they had, and it was inexperienced material, because the more experienced officers were elsewhere, on the other side or in Washington, where the duties were more important.

Now, another thing that we have suggested is the appointment on every court, by the convening authority, of counsel for the defense. The real trouble in courts-martial, apart from the immature membership to which I have just referred, comes from a poor presentation of the case on the one side by the judge advocate who is prosecuting the case, and on the other side by no counsel at all or counsel of no experience.

Senator WARREN. The accused has the benefit of having counsel, does he not?

Gen. KERNAN. Yes.

Senator WARREN. Suppose he chooses his counsel from privates or noncommissioned officers?

Gen. KERNAN. The practice is to always allow him to select counsel if available, or to hire civilian counsel. Failing that, the commanding officer may appoint counsel to defend him as a matter of course.

Senator WARREN. Is there any distinction made as to the accused's selection, whether it may be of a commissioned officer, or a noncommissioned officer or private, or a civilian?

Gen. KERNAN. No; that feature remains the same so far as anything we propose to do.

Senator WARREN. That is the practice as well as the law?

Gen. KERNAN. Yes; it has always been so to the best of my knowledge. Now, to cure that radical defect we have proposed in one of these articles to authorize the Secretary of War to appoint acting judge advocates who shall be available to the reviewing authorities for detail as judge advocates and as defense counsel in important cases, and for other work, judicial or near judicial, which shall arise in the command. You have now and have had since 1884 an authority for appointing acting judge advocates. Gen. Crowder served a tour in that capacity and was appointed at the end of it in the regular corps. I, myself, served a tour of that kind. Many lieutenants have had an apprenticeship as acting judge advocate, on a four-year detail; and it is a highly useful detail to a youngster, because it gives him a special class of work and some additional pay. He gets the rank, pay, and emoluments of a mounted captain.

Senator WARREN. Has it been the practice to have more of those apprentices than were expected to be taken permanently into the service, in order to have some selection?

Gen. KERNAN. The original thought, Senator, was that there were not enough judge advocates in the regular corps to provide the staff judge advocates; therefore that provision originated through that necessity. It has been modified once or twice since as to the number of officers detailed to these headquarters having general court-martial jurisdiction, and it became necessary to increase the number of these acting judge advocates. Originally they were limited to one for each general court-martial jurisdiction.

Senator WARREN. Well, I do not know as you understood my question. I seem to remember that in some of our appropriation bills we provided that there should be a sort of cadet service, you might say; that certain officers should be detailed to study and be used for a term in the judge advocate's office with the intention of selecting from them so many of them as they wanted to make general use of. Am I right about that or not?

Gen. KERNAN. Yes, sir, since 1884 you have had acting judge advocates detailed by the Secretary of War for four years or less.

Senator WARREN. That means they can be taken into the service or not?

Gen. KERNAN. If there were vacancies in the Judge Advocate General's Department they generally went in as I say; but if there were not vacancies to take them in, some remained in the line of the Army, just as I have done. Now, if you take the limit off and allow a sufficient number of these to be detailed, you will have a corps of students to be available for these special duties of counsel and judge advocates.

Senator LENROOT. May I ask you in that connection, at the time of the appointment of these acting judge advocates, what is, as a rule, their knowledge of law?

Gen. KERNAN. Only those who have made a study of law and have evinced a special interest in it are so detailed, and it is only because of that fact that they are detailed as acting judge advocates. To illustrate, in Gen. Crowder's case, he had been detailed to a college in Missouri, and while on duty as professor of military science there he studied law and was admitted to the bar, and after that, by reason of that fact, he was made an acting judge advocate. I did the same thing when I was instructor at West Point. I studied law at an office in New York and was admitted to the bar of New York, and as soon as available thereafter was detailed as an acting judge advocate.

Senator LENROOT. My point was, is the selection of acting judge advocate limited to those who have studied law?

Gen. KERNAN. Not by law.

Senator LENROOT. In practice?

Gen. KERNAN. In practice, I think, yes; they endeavor to get men who have evinced a special aptitude for law and have shown qualifications.

Senator WARREN. Let me state a case. Gen. Ansell was at a point in Wyoming when he was a lieutenant. A man under a serious accusation was being tried in a local court, I think it was the police court—and he happened to be passing by, so the story goes. I did not hear the trial, but they told me the next day about the excellence of the young officer who had volunteered to defend the man in a very serious case. And his ability was such that his reputation preceded him here to Washington, and when some of our friends from the Southern States asked a little later on that he be taken into the Judge Advocate General's office, that was done. I think I was one of those who testified to Gen. Davis, then Judge Advocate General, about the case. While I did not know what the case was about, it had been reported stenographically, I think; and I believe that incident led to his appointment. It was due to the observance of what he had done.

Gen. KERNAN. I think that is the general history of nearly all the officers who are appointed.

Senator WARREN. I know that Gen. Davis at that time, in speaking of it, said he wanted to hear of all those cases in order that he might have a large number from which to select from time to time. That seemed to be at that time the idea—to have the best they could get.

Gen. KERNAN. In article 12 we have undertaken to really enlarge in many cases the jurisdiction of the present court-martial by conferring discretion on the officer who might appoint a general court-martial in the case by the exercise of which discretion he could remit it to a special or even a summary court for disposition.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. All of your proposed changes are proposed to be made in the present law, not the so-called Chamberlain bill. I think that is what is indicated here. The proposed law is given in the left-hand column.

Gen. KERNAN. That is our proposition.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Take on page 18 for instance, that italicized portion. There is your proposed change of the existing law?

Gen. KERNAN. Yes, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You are not proposing changes in the law I have proposed?

Gen. KERNAN. No; our changes are proposed in the existing statutes.

Senator WARREN. That is the way I understood the report.

Gen. KERNAN. We propose to change the oath a little so as to permit the court to dispose of some matters in open court which are now disposed of in closed court. That is to endeavor to save time. Courts are cleared, and the people have to get out many times in order to settle merely trivial matters which could be disposed of offhand, subject to objection by any member who might have a different view.

Senator WARREN. That is with a view of expediting matters?

Gen. KERNAN. Yes, sir. All we propose to keep secret relates to challenges, to the findings and the sentence.

Senator WARREN. General, we thank you for appearing as a witness.

(Thereupon, at 3.25 o'clock p. m., the committee adjourned until to-morrow, September 25, at 10.30 o'clock a. m.)

ESTABLISHMENT OF MILITARY JUSTICE—PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF THE ARTICLES OF WAR.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 10.30 o'clock a. m., in the room of the Committee on Appropriations in the Capitol, Senator Francis E. Warren presiding.

Present: Senators Warren (chairman) and Chamberlain.

STATEMENT OF LIEUT. COL. W. C. RIGBY—Resumed.

Senator WARREN. We shall proceed, Colonel, and take up the matter where you left off yesterday.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I will formally offer at this time, if it meets the approval of the committee, a copy of the statement of which I spoke yesterday of Maj. Gen. Childs, of the British Army.

Senator WARREN. That will be printed in the record.

(The document is as follows:)

APPENDIX.

68 GOLDEN HOUSE, LONDON, ENGLAND,

Memorandum for Maj. Gen. CHILDS:

Before leaving for America it is desired to obtain the following papers and documents to take with me to be submitted to the War Department, to wit:

1. Verification, over your signature, of transcript of interview heretofore had with you, with such revision and corrections, if any, as you desire to make.

2. Copies of statements of commanding generals with reference to field punishment No. 1, mentioned in your above-referred-to interview to be furnished to us. Maj. Chichester informed Col. Rigby that he had mailed this document to our office at 68 Golden House Monday last, a week ago, but it has never been received, hence a duplicate of same is requested.

W. CALVIN WELLS,
Major, Judge Advocate, United States Army.

WAR OFFICE, WHITEHALL, S. W. 1.,
August 9, 1919.

DEAR MAJ. WELLS: I return to you as promised the typescript, as also the copy reports which you desired.

In regard to the interview, it is difficult to exactly reconstruct the conversation which took place, and the report is, of course, somewhat disjointed, as some of my remarks are obviously in reply to questions put to me by Col. Rigby, such questions being left out. It can not, therefore, be considered an accurate report of what I said, but I expect it will be near enough for Col. Rigby's purposes.

Please convey my kind regards to Col. Rigby.

Yours, sincerely,

B. B. W. CHILDS.

Maj. W. C. WELLS,
Judge Advocate, United States Army,
68 Golden House.

July 10, 1919, at 10.45 a. m., Lieut. Col. William C. Rigby, judge advocate, accompanied by Maj. W. C. Wells and stenographer, visited the War Office, London, England, and had the following interview with Maj. Gen. Sir B. E. W. Childs, K. C. M. G., C. B., deputy adjutant general, British Army:

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I desire a recorded interview with you, getting your advice as to certain matters of court-martial procedure based upon your experience, especially in this war. If agreeable, I would like to know your views on the practicability of having noncommissioned officers and privates on courts-martial for the trial of soldiers, as has been proposed in a bill introduced in Congress by Senator Chamberlain.

Gen. CHILDS. My view of that subject is this: I admit that I do not know the army as I knew it before the war. I do not know the new one, but we are now rapidly going back to the conditions of the old one, the one we had before we went to France. I therefore do not know the rank and file of the new army, as I have never served with it and it has not been under the same conditions absolutely. I say, therefore, when I give my views, they must be accepted with the knowledge that I am speaking without experience in the new army. I do feel, though, that my previous experience teaches me this: A soldier's life is very intimate with his fellow soldiers; and sometimes in a company there is a man that gives trouble, and that is most unfortunate. My experience with soldiers is that in a well-run company there is an understanding between officers and men and you do not have trouble. As I was saying, in a well-run company the feeling of comradeship is so great, and regimental feeling so great, the affection between all ranks so great, that the man who gives trouble or commits crime is very unpopular, whatever the rank of the man may be, whether a noncommissioned officer or a private soldier. So if noncommissioned officers sat on courts-martial and there was a conviction of a popular soldier, it might be considered unjust and would be unpopular, and this man on the court would never want to be on the court again. The men—the old soldiers—had ways in which they made their displeasure felt, and in the interests of the army I would be opposed to a court-martial being composed of anything else but officers. The officers do not live in the barracks with the men but live by themselves, and there you have the dividing line between the officers and private soldiers.

There is no association between the two, except the associations in our army in sports, games. It is a sort of an unwritten law. Of course, to go out shooting you take your servant. I do not mean that. So it is anywhere. But even in the games and sports played, I mean, there is that line between them. But answering your question, I do not think it wise to have any other than officers on the courts, because, as I said, the noncommissioned officers are constantly in association with the men, and, except the sergeant in our army, they sleep in the same barracks. Corporals and lance corporals sleep bed by bed with the rank and file, and, as I say, they would strongly object to mixing up with the punishment of their fellow men.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Has the practice of having soldiers on the courts ever been in vogue in Great Britain?

Gen. CHILDS. No; not to my knowledge. I think it would be most unpopular in this army. I mean the men would hate to mix up with the administering of punishment. They would not like it. It would not appeal to them. If a fellow was convicted, the soldier member of the court would be unpopular in the regiment. He would be asked why he did not stick it out. He might have voted for an acquittal, but to keep his oath he could not tell it, and so on.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Do you think it might have an effect on the severity of the sentences to have soldiers as members of the court? What do you think on the subject?

Gen. CHILDS. It entirely depends on the nature of the affair. If a man who commits an offense is a damned nuisance all around, he goes into the guard-house, and men of his own regiment have to guard him, and feed him, take him under escort to the latrine, and so on, and have to parade him. He is a damned nuisance. A man in the guardhouse takes another man for a guard, a soldier, perhaps, who has his week-end pass. A fellow gets into trouble and he is taken as a guard. The man is damned unpopular amongst the men. Not with the officers, but with the rank and file. I think myself you would get very severe sentences if you put noncommissioned officers and soldiers on a court.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. And you think it would make sentences very severe?

Gen. CHILDS. Yes; I think that to have soldiers as members of the courts would cause the sentences to be (1) very severe, (2) would make the life of men who sat on courts unbearable, and (3) that the men would strongly object to mixing up with punishments. They would like to play football rather than sit as a member of a court.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Another thing, your practice as to preliminary investigations prior to trials is set out in detail——

Gen. CHILDS. In the rules of procedure?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes; a careful investigation is required, but what I want to ask is whether in practice this investigation is cumbersome and delays the administration of justice so as to impair rather than promote the same.

Gen. CHILDS. No; I have conducted very many of them. The commanding officer has the adjutant to take down the summary, to take the evidence in the case, and I informed the accused of his right to introduce testimony. It was very simple. A summary of the evidence for a field general court-martial is not necessary. It depends of the surrounding circumstances. There was one man shot during the retreat from Mons. He was tried and shot in a half hour. The Germans were walking over his grave in an hour. Later in trench warfare the investigations were made in a more leisurely manner. Do you follow me? Field general courts-martial are most expeditious in the administration of justice. We merely take down what happens. Sergeant —— saw this, and Sergeant —— said so and so.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In general courts do you get a complete stenographic report?

Gen. CHILDS. Not always. It is recorded by the president, but to have a stenographer is most convenient. But you want two working—it is better to have two or three. Your evidence is taken and typed, and then have another chap for the next, and so on. If you have only the one, you do not see the thing for a couple of days.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. You do not try in district and field courts to take a stenographic report?

Gen. CHILDS. It is most convenient in any form of court to have shorthand typists. Our district courts-martial are so simple, so short, the evidence so clear, it does not take long.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. You use district courts in peace times for most of the military offenses?

Gen. CHILDS. Yes; this court can only award up to two years' imprisonment. In peace time it was scarcely ever necessary to award more than that. It can not try an officer. But in peace times we had few trials of officers.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Only a few as shown in the statistics furnished me.

Gen. CHILDS. Oh, yes; during the war we had a most satisfactory plan of suspending sentences which worked very well indeed. Under the Army suspension of sentences act a man might never be committed to prison. For example, a sergeant in my regiment was tried by court-martial, but he never went to prison and, afterwards got a D. C. medal.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Is that the case you told about the other day? Please repeat it.

Gen. CHILDS. Yes; this man was tried by court-martial, under what offense, for the moment, I forget, but I think it was cowardice. He lost his nerve, but was not a bad man. The sentence of death was commuted to a long sentence—possibly the original sentence may have been penal servitude. But he never went to prison. The sentence was suspended and was subsequently remitted for gallantry in action and the man got a D. C. M. and subsequently was killed in action as a sergeant.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. That act, providing for suspension of sentences, you drew yourself?

Gen. CHILDS. I did.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Tell me something again as to how it works. I understand it resulted in the suspension of a great many sentences, so you told me the other day.

Gen. CHILDS. The way it has worked during the war has been this: But for this act we should have committed to prison and lost the services of between 30,000 and 40,000 men. The whole object of the act was to prevent wastage from the front and to give the men an opportunity to make good. In France—it must have been in December, 1914—I saw about 120 men going to prison under escort, shouting, singing, and happy. It made me think. I also had in mind the case of a man named Richardson, who was condemned to death for desertion. I knew this man could not do such a thing. The facts were he went down to see a draft. A draft had come up to the regiment. He went down to see the draft, about a half mile back, and got drunk and lost the battalion. I sent back an inquiry to the commanding officer of the man's battalion. Whether it was a deliberate act, whether he was the sort of a man to desert and as to his demeanor in action and previous behavior. I got an answer that he was the best man in the company, best of fighters. Without it, that fellow would have gone to prison, and a fighting man would have been lost for the whole period of the war. The two facts made me draft that act. The dual purposes are to give a man the opportunity for making good and save fighting men for service. It is worthy of consideration. Perhaps a man lost his nerve for a moment. Also, there were soldiers of a bad type who would prefer penal servitude to the possibility of losing their life. But the act was drafted so that a man never knew his fate. A man got 10 years and went to a military prison in the field, and without the slightest warning, say after three months, he was again drafted and sent to the front with an organization, so that those guilty of crime to evade duty lived a time in prison in the field and never away from the prospects of going to the front. That act thus prevents crime. No man will risk days of imprisonment to find himself drafted again say after six months in prison. On the other hand, there were hundreds of cases where you had good soldiers gone. That was something stupid. The act alone prevented lots of crime, and saved hundreds of men who might have been shot. When I left France—I had been in France 20 months—only two men ever came back to the prison. After suspension of their imprisonment, out of about 1,500 men only 2 ever came back. They had enough of that prison. It was meant to be a nasty place in which to stay. Only two came back. I returned from France in January, 1916.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Maj. Wells suggests that you tell us the services they had to perform in prison.

Gen. CHILDS. I never went through one of these prisons myself. They are put at hard labor—damned hard work.

Col. RIGBY. Are they kept in good physical training?

Gen. CHILDS. Yes; as hard as nails. They are punished by restrictions of food, solitary confinement, and, if necessary, a court-martial again.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Will you tell us something of your opinion on the advantages and disadvantages of your field punishment?

Gen. CHILDS. Only yesterday I got in reports from C. O. Cs. I asked them two questions—whether they recommended the continuance of such punishments, and, if not, what they recommended as a substitute.

(Col. Rigby asked for a copy of these reports containing the views of Field Marshal Haig and other commanders, and Gen. Childs promised to furnish copies within a week or 10 days, and when received it is to be filed as Exhibit 1 to this interview.)

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Another radical change proposed to be made in our practice by the bill in Congress is that instead of having cases reviewed by the Judge Advocate General, according to our present practice, there is to be a Court of Appeals, its members to be appointed for life, appeals to be taken just as in civil trials.

Gen. CHILDS. When that point was proposed by certain members of Parliament this court-martial committee, of which I am a member, considered it, and has considered other changes of that nature. In our courts of appeal in this country we do not have the attendance of witnesses. They merely refer to and have before them the written testimony sent up from the inferior court. Your court of appeal would be reviewing paper, not men. Here is the point. There are certain essentials as to courts-martial in time of war which do not apply in time of peace. In time of peace I should not see the slightest objection to any form of appeals.

In peace times all civilian offenses are tried before civil courts, and it is a fact that under our law after I am tried by a civil court and convicted or acquitted I can not be tried by a military court. In war time most offenses are military offenses, and therefore a court of appeal should and must be a court of soldiers. No civilian can appreciate the charge of striking a superior officer. A man, in civilian life is struck by another and is fined 10 shillings. In military life a soldier strikes his superior officer and gets 5 years. Any military court in peace times must be a court of military officers. In war time and on active service, as in France, these offenses which are civil offenses have to be tried by a military court. The civil powers try men for forgery, embezzlement, and acts of indecency, which military courts are not at all qualified to try. Before I was a soldier I was a lawyer. Not one soldier out of a hundred knows or can tell you the difference between embezzlement or larceny. In the service outside of this country you have to try soldiers by military courts, courts sitting for expediting military justice. In regard to civil offenses, have you had a court of appeals ever to accompany an army in the field? I would not object to any court of appeal on civil offenses. No court of appeal for military offenses for which the death penalty has been awarded is necessary, because you do not take a man's life because you want it, but for the disciplinary effect it has. In Australia, under their army act, you can not inflict the death penalty for desertion. The result has been deplorable. The fact remains that the situation in the Australian forces as to absences and desertion was wretched many times. The Australians do not want the death penalty. They can fight without it it is true, but those deserters were not the men who won the war. The Australian officers themselves sought the right of imposing the death sentence, but it was not permitted. A death penalty inflicted for desertion in the field is for the effect that it will have, and if the discretion of the Commander in Chief was to be upset by a court of appeal in this country or in France the result would be intolerable. Take the field marshal in France—suppose he confirms a death penalty. If you are going to set up a court of appeals, there you would have to find three field marshals who thus would be of equal rank with a field marshal to determine for the G. O. C. as to whether he should shoot a man for desertion.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Was extensive use made of the power to shoot a man down for misconduct in line of battle without any court-martial?

Gen. CHILDS. That is the unwritten law of the soldier. I have never heard of a case, but it has doubtless happened. I know a case of a fellow deserting to the enemy. They got him as he was going over the top.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Were there rather more in the French Army?

Gen. CHILDS. I think so. I have heard that there were cases of officers being put against the wall and shot.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Under their customs which give commander in chief more control?

Gen. CHILDS. I do not know anything of their code. In our job in military courts we must never forget that behind all that there is the necessity of maintaining discipline in the fighting service. Above all things one has to advise whether to shoot a man or not. It is a beastly job. You do not want the fellow's life, but for certain offenses the death penalty must be awarded or the Army would become an armed rabble.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Another thing—I am jumping from point to point. Will you tell me a little more about the powers of your Judge Advocate General?

Gen. CHILDS. Our Judge Advocate General has no executive powers whatever. He is the legal adviser of the Secretary of State for War. He merely advises as to the legality of proceedings, before trial in certain cases, and advises and assists prior to trial, and after trial. He has no executive power whatever. In the old days, 15 or 20 years ago, the Judge Advocate General had such power, and exercised that power to quash proceedings.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The change was made about 1905?

Gen. CHILDS. About 15 years ago, yes.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. What was the reason for the change?

Gen. CHILDS. I do not know. Probably there was a strong objection to the Judge Advocate General having executive power to quash proceedings.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. You stated the other day the high opinion you hold of Judge Cassel.

Gen. CHILDS. Yes; he is a lawyer, a most brilliant man.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Why are the records of cases referred by the Secretary of State for War, then, to the Attorney General for opinion, after he has been advised by the Judge Advocate General, Judge Cassel?

Gen. CHILDS. That is purely a departmental arrangement. If I do not agree with the Judge Advocate General, it goes to the Secretary of State for War—in a direct sense of the word it goes to the Attorney General who either supports the Judge Advocate General or myself on behalf of the Secretary of State for War, and directs that they be approved or quashed.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. You do not then consider yourself bound to follow his recommendation; that is, the Judge Advocate General's?

Gen. CHILDS. That is all a working arrangement between Cassel and I. I will give you an example of the way we work together. [Getting two folders.] Here are two court-martial records which came to me in connection with certain offenses. I did not like it at all. I wrote to the Judge Advocate General a private note, that I did not feel the proceedings could be sustained. I wrote him a personal note. These proceedings had been reviewed by him. They were held last May.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Did he recommend confirmation?

Gen. CHILDS. They had been confirmed and also reviewed by him and he did not advise quashing. I wrote a personal note. He then wrote a minute or review, as you call it, in which he raised the point whether the proceedings can be sustained. I am going to send that minute to the Secretary of State for War and they will be quashed. That is the way we work together. If we see things wrong we give him the tip. If my advice was not worth having he would not take it, and I would not worry. I have very rarely disagreed with Cassel; but when I do, I put it back to him. If he says "no," the Attorney General settles it. I have not worked with anyone more charming. He is a brilliant lawyer. The law is that the Judge Advocate General on paper is the legal adviser of the Secretary of State for War. The Secretary can take other advice. The Judge Advocate General never quashes a sentence; that is for the consideration of the military authorities. The legality of the sentence is what he is to advise about.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. He has nothing to do with clemency?

Gen. CHILDS. No. If he thinks a sentence is too severe, I expect him to draw my attention to any such sentence. That is the way we work.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Then, personally, you feel it to be your own duty, sir, to examine carefully all proceedings?

Gen. CHILDS. Yes; there are two reasons. I must know the pulse of the Army, and there is no better stethoscope than court-martial proceedings. I want to see everything going on. I read them on Sunday. If I do not think the sentence is too severe—one has to insure that a man does not suffer injustice—I merely return them to the Judge Advocate General. Centralization is bad. Carry it too far and it is bad.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. May I ask further: In case of your disagreeing with the Judge Advocate General and the matter is referred to the Attorney General, would the Secretary of State for War feel bound to follow the Attorney General's decision?

Gen. CHILDS. It is purely, as I say, a personal arrangement. But if he did not agree, nothing would make him. The Secretary might be merely a signing machine. In fact, since I have held my present appointment he could not possibly personally review all the proceedings. The Attorney General relieves him and the Secretary signs blind.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Has the Attorney General any official responsibility?

Gen. CHILDS. No responsibility, except by working arrangement. The responsibility under the law is in the Secretary of State for War. During the war the Attorney General acts on behalf of the Secretary. Our courts-martial get extraordinary review. Take a simple case. It goes down below. Cassel sees it, and then it comes to me. It gets a most exhaustive review.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. It is practically an automatic appeal?

Gen. CHILDS. Yes. Here is the record of a trial before a court-martial held in Cologne, for drunkenness. It was confirmed in France on advice of Judge Advocate General.

Maj. WELLS. What is the charge—drunkenness?

Gen. CHILDS. No. Conduct unbecoming an officer. It was reviewed in France and again reviewed by Cassel on this side. Now, the case comes to me. I will read the proceedings. If I think dismissal is too severe, although confirmed in France, I never let it go. It is wrong to let it go. I know how much drunkenness is going on in Cologne. By scrutinizing all courts-martial records I found it necessary to draw a letter, which I am going to send out.

(Copy of the letter furnished and is attached, marked, "Exhibit 2.")

Gen. CHILDS. As a matter of fact, I spoke to the commander in chief's adjutant general himself when he was here the other day. He realizes that there is too much of drunkenness going on. I am calling attention to the courts that sentences are too lenient. I can only publish it in orders. I can not direct any court to punish more severely.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Do you ever in approving a sentence or an acquittal, or too light a sentence as in the cases referred to, put any memorandum or note in the action that it was regretted that it was not more severe, or calling attention?

Gen. CHILDS. No; our regulations as laid down forbid that. If an officer desires to comment on any court-martial, he is only permitted to write to the Army council.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Are you not permitted to put in the action any comment?

Gen. CHILDS. No; if the convening authority desires to comment on any court-martial he addresses a note to the Army council. The court does not even know that he did it. If a court-martial has previously failed in its duty in the manner of trial in displaying ignorance, it would be proper for me to direct the court's attention to it, and perhaps to say that the president should be detailed for preliminary instruction in a number of courts-martial, but never in any other way.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Is it permissible to take any action that may be considered as a personal rebuke to the court?

Gen. CHILDS. No; if they acquit, they acquit. We never ask why. If the taking of evidence was bad, and the rules of procedure were disregarded so as to necessitate the proceedings being quashed, or confirmation being refused, we have furnished directions, directing attention of the court to the rules of procedure, purely, though as a matter of education. Never a word is said to the court on their decision.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Do you ever discharge a court and appoint a new one if you are not getting severe enough sentences?

Gen. CHILDS. No. You use the expression "discharging a court." Our system is that in peace times a court, until discharged, is available to try cases. But we never keep a court-martial beyond a few days. We want them to get training. We never keep a standing court.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Then you never allow a court to run along for any considerable length of time?

Gen. CHILDS. No. Suppose in peace times I had a court-martial sitting to-day, and I had two more men to try. I would order the same court to assemble to-morrow.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I believe the requirements are that an officer must be commissioned three years before he is appointed on a general court?

Gen. CHILDS. Yes; that is the law.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The Army act?

Gen. CHILDS. Yes.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. That, I suppose, you find a great help in peace times?

Gen. CHILDS. Yes. On active service it is different. In peace times we did not have many general courts-martial. Two or three a year since I have been here, in peace times. I had been here four years before the war.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Your statistics show 12 in nine years. I remember, an average of  $1\frac{1}{3}$  per annum.

Gen. CHILDS. Yes; that is probably right—about one a year.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. You have been using lawyers as court-martial officers, on field and general courts-martial. About how many men are required?

Gen. CHILDS. I do not know how many. It worked down to one court-martial officer per brigade, I think.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Would he be appointed to membership in several courts?

Gen. CHILDS. Yes; but we use those fellows for anything—for any legal work, sometimes as members of court, sometimes as prosecutor. They are used to assist in every way.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Please state whether it required a personnel which caused embarrassment to get the number of men.

Gen. CHILDS. We managed it easily during the war. We had a list of officers who were lawyers in civil life, and they were used. There was no embarrassment in getting plenty. Under the territorial system, lawyers and barristers always seem to join the territorial forces, and we had scores of qualified men before the war, qualified as line officers in the territorial forces.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Did you have to take enough away from the line to feel the lack of officers in the line?

Gen. CHILDS. We did not start this system until later on in the war. There were also lots of fellows unfit for the front who had been wounded. We never found any difficulty. I set up the same system when I came to this country. The commander in chief is delighted to have these people at headquarters to advise him on legal questions.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Did you have judge advocates for district courts sometimes?

Gen. CHILDS. No; we do not have judge advocates on district courts.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Is it permissible?

Gen. CHILDS. Yes; but they are only used in difficult cases.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The "specially qualified member" of your field general court-martial becomes an additional member of the court. Does he sum up in open court as to the law or the facts of the case?

Gen. CHILDS. No; he is a member of the court. I have no doubt that when the court is closed to consider, the president says: "Mr. Lawyer, what is your view?" But that is not on record. If a member of the court happens to be a lawyer, no doubt on the inside when considering he is consulted. I know if I were on a court, I would say, "Mr. Lawyer, what do you think?"

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. How are they appointed?

Gen. CHILDS. Why, I call for a list of lawyers who are officers and select them and appoint them after an investigation. I followed the same procedure in France. I simply called for a return of officers available and qualified. I never have any difficulty.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. What about the counsel for the accused?

Gen. CHILDS. That always is easy.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Some criticized us because some used in our courts were second lieutenants.

Gen. CHILDS. Even though qualified men?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes; because it was charged that their low rank embarrassed them in defending the accused. Has that been your experience as to the low rank of any officer defending proving embarrassing in any way?

Gen. CHILDS. None whatever. I do not know from personal experience. I know enough to warrant me thinking that a barrister and lawyer is a person of formed ideas who would not feel embarrassed. Courts are always very careful how they deal with men who know the law, and who could not be for that reason embarrassed.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Did it ever appear to you in your work that counsel for the accused of low rank were in any way embarrassed?

Gen. CHILDS. Not on the document.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Outside of the document?

Gen. CHILDS. I never heard of it. It was suggested at the court-martial committee hearing that he should be of high rank, same rank as the president. This witness who suggested this though was a person of very low intelligence and failed to convince us that there was anything in the suggestion.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In France they seem to have frequently used private soldiers.

Gen. CHILDS. In France.

Maj. WELLS. In Belgium, too.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. One of the propositions made in this new bill in Congress is that the penalty for assaulting a superior officer in the execution of his office be confinement for not over one year in addition to the usual punishment for a simple assault. Heretofore our Articles of War have provided that for that kind of offense the punishment shall be in discretion of the court-martial.

Gen. CHILDS. Can the court award the death penalty?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes; in time of war. In time of peace anything up to the death penalty. Here is a limitation to one year's imprisonment.

Maj. WELLS. In addition to the other penalty authorized for assault or striking.

Gen. CHILDS. Surely no soldier advocates such a law. Still during the war we inflicted only one death penalty for striking an officer. In my experience, it is essential to retain it (the death penalty). Otherwise an Army will degenerate into a mob. A soldier hits an officer over the head with a rifle. A person not familiar with military law does not understand why a man who assaults another on the street is only fined 10 shillings, while an assault on a superior officer should be punished so severely. You can not maintain an Army under those conditions. It is an explicit offense. Otherwise you can not win a war.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. How do you punish by imprisonment?

Gen. CHILDS. In this country we have detention camps. Got men in civil prisons in this country for civil offenses, not for military offenses. Men were transported from France for civil offenses committed in France. For other offenses committed in France they were put in military prisons in the field. Our policy is this—never permit a soldier to go to prison and then go back to the ranks. We believed that he became contaminated and not fit to wear the uniform. There is no contamination in a detention camp, which is only for military offenses. Fifty-four thousand trained men have left these shores from detention barracks in this country. They were intensively militarily trained men. I never have seen a man rejected from a draft who came from a detention camp. A man was sent to a detention camp and kept there until trained. I kept them in not to undergo sentence but to make them fit for the front. Our offenses were frequently absences without leave or desertion. We sent them to a detention barracks. Before the war a man went to prison and was discharged from the Army. All discharges, except for ill health, were held up during the war. No soldier that I permit to remain in prison is allowed to stay in the Army. Any sentence which should be commuted to detention is commuted. If I do not commute, I discharge. I am weeding out the undesirables from the Army.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Have you determined what sentences or punishment would be sufficient to send him to detention barracks? When you transfer him from prison to detention camps you do not discharge him?

Gen. CHILDS. I never discharge. He serves as a soldier.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Are you transferring quite a number?

Gen. CHILDS. About as fast as I can get them out.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. What proportion? Are you transferring one-fourth or one-half?

Gen. CHILDS. I never kept tab. The point is this. I am not commuting many for this reason. The class of men coming through from France to prison is the scum of the army who have committed looting, assaults. The class of men that should go to the detention camps is not coming through. The class of men getting detention is the class whose sentences are suspended in France, unless he is a hardened fellow, not in the commuted class at all.

I think that you must be suffering from the same thing we are. The people feel that the army is unfair, unjust, do not give consideration to cases. The truth is that no case in court receives so much consideration as the review a court-martial coming up before me gets. Take these three cases [indicating]. The men have not appealed. Still there is always somebody looking after them. Privates tried in Ireland, tried, and the paper come up here. The cases are investigated. There is no appeal, but they are investigated. They do not need a court of appeals, the power here is so great. The people do not understand, do not realize. If you take a court-martial in France, whether it is a soldier or an officer, who has been tried, there is a court-martial officer that handles the case, then another one, the legal advisor for the confirming officer, then the confirming officer. It goes through division, corps, and army, through their legal officers, then to G. H. Q., to the commander in chief, and so on through channels here to Cassel, then to me. It is scrutinized 20 times. The people do not know that. What court in civil life gives care like that?

Then I give the commandants of the detention barracks power to send me the names of men to be released. I ask for no facts, just direct them to send the names. They can tell a man when he goes in, "You got nine months; if you play the fool, you do nine; if you play the man, you get out in three."

DRAFT LETTER.

I am commanded by the Army Council to say that their attention has been drawn to the large number of courts-martial which have been held on officers for offenses of drunkenness, improper conduct, and against the inhabitants of occupied territory, and they note with regret that in the very large majority of cases the offenses have been dealt with by the court by an award of forfeiture of seniority and even lesser punishments.

The council consider that offenses of these descriptions should, in the absence of very extenuating circumstances, be dealt with by an award of cashiering or dismissal, as the honor of the British Army is sullied by such behavior and it can not fail to give the enemy just cause to bring forward such incidents as a set-off against the irregularities and atrocities committed by German troops in France and other theaters of war.

WAR OFFICE,
London, S. W., April 15, 1919.

SIR: I am commanded by the Army Council to inform you that during the debate on the army (annual) bill an amendment was moved to insert in section 44 of the army act a proviso to the effect that field punishment should not be of the character of personal restraint in the sense that a soldier could be kept in irons or other fetters, but rather should be of the character of hard labor; and arising out of the amendment the secretary of state for war gave an undertaking in the following words:

"I will give an undertaking that we will institute forthwith a series of inquiries to obtain the opinion of the military authorities in France, here, and in other theaters, with a view to seeing if a substitute can be devised for this form of punishment without impairing the means by which discipline is maintained, and without leaving us with possibly the danger of being drawn, under certain circumstances in another war, into a more free infliction of the death penalty than has been the case in this war. I would suggest that there is no reason why there should be any delay. I will make these inquiries, and see what amendments can be made to the rules of procedure."

I am to say also that in reply to questions in the course of the debate the secretary of state undertook to secure the opinions of officers, noncommissioned officers, and men on the subject, and to this end I am now to request that you will render a report to this department, with your recommendations on the following points:

(a) Whether that portion of field punishment which involves confinement in irons (i. e., fetters or handcuffs, or straps or ropes) should be maintained; and

(b) In the event of it being recommended that this portion of field punishment should be abolished, what form of punishment is suggested in substitution therefor.

I am to request that a very early reply be furnished.

I am, sir,

Your obedient servant,

The GENERAL OFFICER COMMANDING IN CHIEF.

C. R. 5081-P. S. 2.

HEADQUARTERS, BRITISH TROOPS IN FRANCE AND FLANDERS.

June 26, 1919.

SIR: With reference to War Office letter No. 105, Gen. No. 2767 (A. G. 3), dated April 18, 1919, I have the honor to report that I have caused very extensive inquiries to be made with a view to obtaining the opinion of commanders of every grade as well as of regimental officers, noncommissioned officers, and men, on the desirability or otherwise of retaining that portion of field punishment which involves confinement in irons, straps, or rope.

The balance of opinion amongst commanders is heavily in favor of the retention of this form of punishment for the following reasons:

(a) It has a great effect as a deterrent.

(b) The only substitute appears to be imprisonment with hard labor, which enables the offender to escape the danger and hardships of the fighting area.

(c) It can be put into operation immediately and is therefore specially effective as a quick, sharp punishment.

(d) Its removal from the scale of punishment which can be awarded by a commanding officer would increase the number of courts-martial, thus causing delay in disposing of offenses.

The opinion of noncommissioned officers and men is about equally divided as regards retention or abolition.

The older soldiers are usually in favor of field punishment No. 1, and the younger ones against it.

I attach for the information of the Army Council reports of interviews with various noncommissioned officers and men.

After a careful revision of all the reports submitted to me, I am of opinion that, in the interests of discipline on active service, it is essential that commanding officers should have the power to inflict upon persistent offenders a degree of punishment in excess of field punishment No. 2, which in actual practice is little more than confinement to barracks with the added penalty of forfeiture of pay.

The punishment of "tying-up" is not a satisfactory one, but there does not appear to be any other less objectionable which, in the field, can be substituted for it, and in these circumstances I consider it should be maintained.

I recommend, however, that the punishment of field punishment No. 1 be restricted as follows:

(a) A commanding officer should be allowed to award it only to a soldier who has committed an offense whilst undergoing imprisonment in a military prison in the field, or whilst undergoing field punishment No. 2.

(b) The "tying-up" of a British soldier should never be carried out in view of civilians, natives, or allied troops.

I consider it essential that the provisions of paragraph 2 (a), (c), and (d) of the rules for field punishment (par. 721 M. M. L.) should still hold good. On active service, especially when on the line of march, it is of the greatest importance that an effective method of securing prisoners against escape shall be at the command of those responsible for their safe custody. I have the honor to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

Lieutenant General, Commanding British Troops in France and Flanders.

COLOGNE, June 10, 1919.

SIR: In reply to your letter No. 105, Gen. No. 2767 (A. G. 3) of 18/4/1919, I have the honor to report that the whole question of punishments in the field is one of considerable difficulty. It is undoubtedly desirable to keep offenders in or near the front line, and not to allow their offenses to procure them safety and perhaps relative comfort. It is equally desirable in many cases that the soldier should not receive the taint of imprisonment for a military offense.

On the whole I am of the opinion that "Personal restraint" should not be abolished as part of field punishment No 1 under active service conditions. Some form of punishment which can be readily and quickly administered is necessary. It must be possible to carry it out without the employment of much personnel or elaborate accommodation, and it must be at the same time sufficiently distasteful to those undergoing it to act as a deterrent. I have the honor to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

General, Commanding in Chief, British Army of the Rhine.

FORCES IN GREAT BRITAIN,
HORSE GUARDS,
Whitehall, London, S. W. 1.

SIR: With reference to War Office letter 103, General Number 2767 (AG3) dated April 18, 1919, I have the honor to report that I have asked various officers for their opinions on this subject, including officers of the Regular and New Armies and Territorial Force, who have commanded a battalion or brigade with distinction in the field.

2. The consensus of opinion is that field punishment No. 1 involving confinement in irons (i. e., fetters or handcuffs or straps or ropes) forms a valuable aid to discipline, and as such should be maintained. A few officers, from a sentimental point of view, wish that it could be dispensed with, but are unable to find a substitute other than a flogging, and are generally in agreement that its abolition would result in an increase of death sentences.

3. No complaints have been brought to my notice of any soldier experiencing hardships in any way approximating to torture due to the nature of the application of field punishment No. 1, and personal inspection of men undergoing this form of punishment on numerous occasions has convinced me that no serious exception can be taken thereto.

4. I am quite certain that it would not have been possible to maintain the high standards of discipline in the British Army in France if field punishment No. 1 had been nonexistent, and it is not beside the point to recall the effect on discipline in the Australian Corps of the absence of capital punishment for desertion.

5. I would call the attention of the Army Council to my letter from General Headquarters British Expeditionary Force, dated December 4, 1916, on this subject, in which the case is put very fully and clearly. After a lapse of three years I am unable to modify the views expressed in that letter or to suggest any substitute for that portion of field punishment referred to above, and as it fulfills its object, whilst being in no sense torture, I am of opinion that it should be maintained. I have the honor to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

D. HAIG,

The SECRETARY, WAR OFFICE,
Whitehall, London, S. W. 1.

HEADQUARTERS, June 20, 1918.

From: The Commander in Chief Egyptian Expeditionary Force.

To: The Secretary War Office, London, S. W. 1.

SIR: In accordance with war office letter No. 165, G. N. 2767 (A. G. 3) of April 18, 1919, relative to the question of the retention or abolition of that portion of field punishment which involves confinement in irons, I have the honor to report that I have obtained the opinions of the officers, noncommissioned officers, and men under my command and find that the majority of officers advocate the retention of the present rules with the exception of that portion involving attachment to a fixed object, while the majority of the noncommissioned officers and men favor the abolition of field punishment altogether.

The general opinion amongst corps and divisional commanders is that field punishment should be retained as it is, but should be employed only for offences of a grave or disgraceful character.

The alternative to field punishment recommended by those who favor its abolition is hard labor, pack drill, or other forms of rigorous physical fatigue.

My opinion is that the retention of field punishment is desirable as being a deterrent to many constant offenders to whom a prison presents no terrors and because its abolition would result in an increase in the number of men committed to prison and thus temporarily lost to their unit. I recommend therefore that field punishment No. 2 be retained, but that field punishment No. 1 be abolished. I have the honor to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

GENERAL HEADQUARTERS,
Constantinople, May 13, 1919.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter No. 105, Gen. No. 2767 (A. G. 3), dated April 18, 1919, and in reply beg to state that I have caused inquiries to be made to secure the opinions of my officers, noncommissioned officers, and men upon the subject therein referred to.

As a result of the inquiry, I find that that portion of field punishment No. 1, which involves confinement in irons or being tied to a fixed object, is, in general, objected to, and I entirely agree that this procedure should be abolished as degrading. On the other hand, I can not find that any really effective substitute has been suggested.

It would appear to be the general opinion that the greatest deterrent punishment is "pack drill," which is disliked more than hard labor of any kind, and should it be decided to discontinue that portion of field punishment above referred to, I would recommend that a period of, say, two hours per day of pack drill be substituted.

Two other suggestions have been made, which I forward for your consideration:

1. That commanding officers who have awarded sentences of field punishment No. 1 should have the power, subject to review by superior military authority, for suspending a sentence awarded on the march or whilst fighting is going on until after the arrival of the unit at a place where the punishment can be performed; and

2. That the commanding officers' powers of forfeiture of pay should be extended, and that the forfeiture of pay under an award of field punishment shall not be dependent upon the fact that the man is in custody, but shall be automatic to the award.

I have the honor to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

Subject: Field punishments. Confidential.

GENERAL HEADQUARTERS, IRELAND,
Parkgate, Dublin, May 20, 1919.

SIR: With reference to war office letter No. 105, Gen. No. 2767 (A. G. 3), dated April 18, 1919, I have the honor to state that all formation commanders and O. C. units and representatives of W. Os. N. C. Os. and men of all units have been consulted, and that the majority (W. Os. N. C. Os. and men almost unanimously) are of opinion that that portion of field punishment which involves tying in a fixed position in public should be abolished.

They can not, however, suggest a suitable substitute, and many commanding officers, therefore, advocate the retention of the tying up in a fixed position.

Personally, I am of opinion, after consultation with other officers who have had experience of command of units in the field:

(a) That "tying up" in a public spot as a portion of field punishment should be abolished.

This punishment is undoubtedly degrading and is, in the majority of cases, awarded for offenses such as insubordination, which do not call for a punishment of a degrading character.

I think that the infliction of this punishment is calculated to make a man lose his self-respect, the retention of which is vital to him as a soldier, and the fact that the safety of the nation may depend on the morale of each individual man makes it, in my opinion, more desirable to eliminate any such form of punishment.

(b) It is not clear that any substitute is really necessary, and it is very difficult to suggest one for what is, after all, only a portion of field punishment No. 1.

The main consideration is that any form of field punishment should be equal in its incidence, and that the delinquent should not escape the risks suffered by his comrades by reason of his bad behavior. In a large army, such as the British Army in France, it was found in practice very difficult to secure these conditions.

The only method of doing so was to send men behind the line, and, therefore, out of immediate danger. Consequently many men preferred to do severe field punishment well behind the line than to run the risks attendant upon the so-called period of "rest" in close support of the trench line, where long and arduous night-working parties under fire caused the soldier to prefer his tour of duties in the trenches to that of his short tour of "rest."

I think a solution might be found in the formation of penal companies or battalions, to which all men with sentences of 14 days' field punishment or upward would be sent.

These penal units could be used for working parties in the dangerous zone, and, moreover, could be given a special diet without luxuries of any description. As long as a man remains with his unit a special diet is impracticable.

I consider that if a penal company formed part of each division it would be possible to adopt the system for any form of warfare.

The SECRETARY,
War Office, London, S. W. 1.

GENERAL HEADQUARTERS, April 27. 1919.

From: Maj. Gen. H. B. Walker, K. C. B., D. S. O., commanding the British force in Italy.

To: The Secretary, War Office, London S. W. 1.

SIR: In reply to your No. 105 Gen. No. 2767 (A. G. 3), dated April 18, I have the honor to make the following recommendation:

That there be only one field punishment;

That commanding officers may award as heretofore 28 days and a court martial three months of such field punishment;

That the wording of paragraph 2 should be:

(a) "He may be kept in irons, i e., fetters or handcuffs, or both fetters and handcuffs, so as to prevent his escape or in the event of his being violent, but not as a means of punishment.

(b) Strike out.

(c) As before.

(d) As before.

For offences requiring a more serious award the sentences should be as heretofore, imprisonment with H. L., penal servitude, death, according to the gravity of the offence.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,

H. B. WALKER.
Major General, Commanding the British force in Italy.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Have you also a copy of the interview with Judge Cassel, judge advocate general of the British Army?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I was about to offer that also. There should be attached to that, to make it complete, a copy of my questionnaire and a copy of Judge Advocate General Cassel's formal answer to my questionnaire, upon which this interview was based. I will furnish those, to make some parts of the interview intelligible. And also a statement by Capt. Eastwood, court-martial officer to the London command, in a portion of which Maj. Du Plat Taylor, the other court-martial officer of that command—and so-called "permanent" president of its district court martial—joined.

(The documents referred to are as follows:)

INTERVIEW HAD BY LIEUT. COL. WILLIAM C. RIGBY, JUDGE ADVOCATE, OFFICE OF JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL, WITH FELIX CASSEL, ESQ., K. C., JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL, BRITISH ARMY, AT 68 VICTORIA STREET, LONDON, ENGLAND, JULY 17, 1919.

Under date of June 14, 1919, Lieut. Col. Rigby submitted a questionnaire to Judge Cassel (copy attached) requesting, on behalf of the United States Government, information concerning the administration of military law in the British armies, so far as practicable to furnish it.

On July 17, 1919, at 4 o'clock, p. m., Lieut. Col. Rigby called at Judge Cassel's office, by appointment, and received the answers to his questionnaire (copy of memorandum of Judge Cassel attached); also had the following interview:

Lieut. Col. RIGBY (reading from questionnaire):

"On behalf of the United States Government, the following information concerning the administration of military law in the British armies is respectfully requested, so far as it may be practicable to furnish it: 1. (a) Results of preliminary investigation and trial."

Judge CASSEL (reading, from his memorandum) :

"1. (a) No statistics are available as to the number of charges investigated by commanding officers, nor as to the proportion of such charges which are dismissed, remanded for trial by court-martial, or dealt with summarily."

No record of proceedings of commanding officers reach the judge advocate general's office.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Have you any way of approximating or estimating the relative proportion of charges that are dismissed as a result of the preliminary investigation or disposed of otherwise than by being sent to a court-martial?

Judge CASSEL. No, I really have not. The records do not reach me at all. I could make a guess, but it would not be reliable.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. If you could give an estimate from your general information.

Judge CASSEL. I do not think I could give an estimate that would be of any value. I do not think that the war office or the adjutant general's department could give it.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Could some of the court-martial officers give it, say out of several individual commands so as to get a rough view?

Judge CASSEL. I think the people that would be most likely to know would be the record office. I will make further inquiries. But, as I said, I do not think it is possible. Make a note of that, please [speaking to assistant].

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Will you give me some kind of a line on the effectiveness of your preliminary examination in weeding out trivial and unfounded charges?

Judge CASSEL. I think you may take it that it is effective. But it is difficult to get any exact figures.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Could not approximate figures be obtained from one or two commands through the court-martial and record officers?

Judge CASSEL. What you really want is the number of cases dismissed, summarily dealt with, or sent for trial to court-martial?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes; If I could get that for two or three commands.

Judge CASSEL. I do not think it would be possible, but I will make inquiries.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY (reading next question) :

"1. (b) How the investigation is actually carried on in practice."

Judge CASSEL :

"1. (b) In the case of a N. C. O. or man, a charge is first investigated by his company (battery or squadron) commander, whose powers of punishment are very restricted. (See King's Regulations, 501.) If the company commander can not, or thinks that he ought not to deal with the case, he sends it on to be dealt with by the commanding officer. The latter after the charge has been read to the accused hears the witnesses. The accused may cross-examine the witnesses called against him, and may make a statement (or give evidence) in his defense, and may call witnesses. If the accused so requires, the evidence must be taken on oath; but it is only very rarely that such a request is preferred. The accused has no right to be represented by counsel or by an officer before the commanding officer."

The commanding officer then takes one of the following courses:

"(I) He dismisses the charge.

"(II) He disposes of it summarily, if he can do so without reference to superior authority. The charges that may be so disposed of are set out in King's Regulations, 487. The punishments which a commanding officer can award to a N. C. O. or man are set out in section 46 (2) of the army act and King's Regulations, 493.

"(III) If he thinks that the case is one which may be dealt with summarily, but he is not empowered to so deal with it without sanction from superior authority, he refers it to such authority. He will then either be authorized to deal with it summarily, or be directed to send it to a court-martial.

"(IV) He adjourns it in order that the evidence may be reduced to writing, with a view to a court-martial.

"In every case where the award or finding involves a forfeiture of pay, and in every other case unless one of the minor punishments referred to in army act, section 46 (9) and King's Regulations, 493, is awarded, the commanding officer must give the accused the option of being tried by court-martial. (Army acts 46 (8).)

"Where a case is adjourned for the evidence to be reduced to writing, this is (as a rule) done by the adjutant, though any officer may be detailed by the commanding officer for the purpose. The witnesses attend again, give their evidence, and are cross-examined as before; the accused makes any statement or gives any evidence that he wishes, after being cautioned that he need not say anything, and calls witnesses if he wishes. The whole evidence is taken down in writing by the adjutant or other officer detailed for the purpose. Each witness signs the evidence given by him, and the evidence so taken is called the 'summary of evidence.' The evidence is generally not taken on oath, and the accused has no right to be represented. This has, however, sometimes been allowed in cases of exceptional difficulty or importance."

Lieut. Col. RIGBY (interrupting). No representation at the taking of the evidence?

Judge CASSEL. It is not considered that the accused has the right to it [continuing reading]:

"The commanding officer then reconsiders the written record, and finally decides whether to apply for a court-martial, or whether to dispose of the case summarily (assuming that he has the power to do so and that the accused has not elected trial by court-martial).

"If he decides upon a court-martial, he prepares and signs a charge sheet and formal application for trial, which he forwards with the summary of evidence and conduct sheets of the accused to an officer having power to convene a court-martial for the trial of the accused. That officer considers whether the summary of evidence justifies trial, and, if he comes to the conclusion that it does, makes an order accordingly."

So far, I am dealing with noncommissioned officers and men. [Continuing reading:]

"In the case of an officer, the case goes at once to the commanding officer without the intervention of the company (battery or squadron) commander. The commanding officer has no power to punish an officer. He can either dismiss the case, or apply for a court-martial, or, if the accused officer is below field rank, can refer the case to a superior officer, not under the rank of general. The latter, in the case of an officer below field rank, can award certain minor punishment, or can direct trial by court-martial. (See Army act, sec. 46A.) Where a court-martial is decided upon, a written 'summary of evidence' must be taken as in the case of a soldier if the accused so requires, otherwise a summary may be dispensed with, and an "abstract" of the evidence given to the accused."

In the case of an officer, it is not obligatory to take a summary, but the accused may require it, and if he does not require it, it is obligatory to give him an "abstract."

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. But in the case of an enlisted man, it is obligatory?

Judge CASSEL. Yes.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In taking the summary, it is taken in writing. Does that mean that the testimony is taken down verbatim, or just a summary, a condensation of it made?

Judge CASSEL. It is taken in narrative form.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Not in the form of questions and answers?

Judge CASSEL. No, only subject matters.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Does the accused have the right to be present at the examination of each of the witnesses?

Judge CASSEL. He must be present.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. He has the right to cross-examine witnesses?

Judge CASSEL. Certainly.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. What right does the accused, if any, have to see the summary before it is forwarded to the commanding officer?

Judge CASSEL. No specific provision in the rules of procedure entitles the accused to a copy of the summary until the order for trial is made by the convening authority, but, in practice, if he applied for a copy of the summary, it would probably be given to him. Sometimes the convening officer may direct that additional evidence be taken. The rules of procedure do provide that the accused must be supplied with a copy of the summary when ordered for trial. It is then served upon him. To give it to him earlier, there is no provision, strictly speaking, under the rules, but it would be accorded in practice if the accused called for it.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. If, after the summary is taken, additional witnesses are found, must they be examined in the presence of the accused?

Judge CASSEL. In precisely the same way.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. At the trial can witnesses be called who were not called at the time that the summary was taken?

Judge CASSEL. They may be called, but the accused must be asked whether he wishes for an adjournment in order to give him an opportunity to prepare for their cross-examination.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. He has the right to ask for an adjournment?

Judge CASSEL. Unless a reasonable notice of the intention to call additional evidence has been given him before the trial.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Must that notice include a statement of the character of the evidence, the name of the witness—

Judge CASSEL. Yes; if that has not been done, the accused is not only within his right to adjournment, but must be informed of that right.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In the case of officers—unless he requires it, testimony can be taken out of his presence and written in an “abstract”?

Judge CASSEL. Only in the case of an officer, but an officer can always require it to be taken in the same way as an enlisted man.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In practice, can you tell me what percentage of the cases are disposed of by the award of the commanding officer without resorting to court-martial?

Judge CASSEL. That comes back to the same question upon which I said that I had no statistics available. It is the same question.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. You told me that you could not tell me how many were disposed of without any punishment being given—dismissed—but will your statistics show the number of cases punished, disposed of by the award of the commanding officer?

Judge CASSEL. No records of commanding officers reach my office—only proceedings of courts-martial.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Don't go through you?

Judge CASSEL. No.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. If statistics are available, where can I find them?

Judge CASSEL. I think probably the only place would be the record office. That is one of the points under the first head—going back to the inquiry you made. My office is not concerned with commanding officers' punishment or their dealing with a case unless it eventually results in a court-martial. Any irregularity in conduct of a preliminary proceeding before a commanding officer which might have affected the subsequent court-martial trial, that would come to my notice, but it would not come to my notice if a court-martial had not resulted, unless I was especially consulted whether a particular award by a commanding officer was legal or not. Sometimes a general in going through the awards of a commanding officer finds an award, as to the legality of which he is doubtful. He then writes to me for an opinion. Apart from that, unless a commanding officer consults me about a case, it rarely would come under my notice.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. What I would like to get is the number of awards by commanding officers during the war, so that we may compare these—the percentage—with the number of court-martial trials, to get at the efficiency of the system in cutting down the number of trials by the right of commanding officers to make awards.

Judge CASSEL. That would mean the number, the total of all cases disposed of by commanding officers during the war. Very doubtful if I can get that, but I will do the best I can.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. To give us a view of its efficiency—a system which we do not have, and we are greatly interested.

Judge CASSEL. I will tell you this—I can not give you any definite figures, but it is very effective and very valuable, but when you ask me to give you statistics, percentages, and figures, I can not do it. I have no reason for seeing and do not see the records of commanding officers.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. We do not want to burden you unduly, but if you can refer us to the place to go—

Judge CASSEL. I will let you know the best way to find out what can be found out. But you may take it that I am satisfied that it is on the whole a very valuable and efficient procedure. It depends in a large measure on the particular commanding officer; that is to say, whether the commanding officer is a man of experience and capacity, and where he is it does work very well.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. From your experience, has the present powers given under Army orders of 1910 extending the commanding officers' powers from, I think, awards of 14 to 28 days—what has been the effect of that compared to the former?

Judge CASSEL. These increased powers of commanding officers have had the result of practically doing away with regimental courts-martial. We have, as you know, a form of court-martial called regimental court-martial, which is convened and confirmed by the commanding officer himself, and which is composed entirely of officers under his command. The extension of the powers of the commanding officers has very largely reduced the number of regimental courts-martial. Regimental courts-martial are now very rare indeed, because a commanding officer's powers so nearly approximate to those of a regimental court-martial. In fact, regimental courts-martial are now only resorted to in special cases.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. They correspond to our summary courts.

Judge CASSEL. On the whole, I think it has been an advantage. I think the commanding officers have dealt satisfactorily with the cases, but there is always some feeling against a court convened by the commanding officer, consisting entirely of officers under his command and confirmed by the commanding officer—all in the same regiment. There is a feeling that it is not the judgment of an independent court, but regimental courts-martial practically cease to exist through this extension of power.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The 14 days' power was not sufficient?

Judge CASSEL. It was not sufficient; but on the other hand, if you go to increasing the power largely beyond what it is at present, I think the result will be that soldiers will be more frequently electing a trial by court-martial, and not run the risk to be tried by commanding officer. Twenty-eight days is, I think, about a proper power of punishment for a commanding officer to possess. Suggestions have been made for increasing it still further, but those are under consideration. If you increase it very much you do run the risk of increasing the number of cases in which soldiers would elect trial where they now abide by the commanding officer's award. I do not think the powers to deal with a case summarily should be increased beyond what they are now.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. After a summary is taken, is it forwarded to the commanding general of the unit to appoint the court?

Judge CASSEL. We have no general commanding a unit. District courts-martial would generally be appointed by commander of a brigade; general courts-martial in the United Kingdom by commander in chief of the command—

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I was not using the word in a technical sense, but only referring to any organization or body of troops whose commander is empowered to appoint a court-martial. When it goes to his office—the general's office—what practically is done with it? Does it go to him personally or to some court-martial officer?

Judge CASSEL. Always goes to the staff officer who is skilled in military law or court-martial officer who advises the general as to the legal aspects of the case. The general sometimes uses his own judgment. On the legal aspects he has a legal adviser. Since the war we have had special court-martial officers; before the war, some staff officer having special legal training. The convening officer, which is the name I give to the officer who has power to convene courts-martial, examines with much care the summary of evidence, and on the legal advice which is given him determines whether it is a case which should go to a court-martial.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. These court-martial officers appointed under War Office instructions of September, 1916—I saw a copy of the circular—and as I remember there was nothing in that requiring that they be men necessarily of legal training.

Judge CASSEL. Originally this may have been the case, but it is now universally a general rule that they must be barristers or solicitors.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Any regulation requiring that the summary or evidence be submitted to them?

Judge CASSEL. Simply a matter of practice.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Is that practice universal?

Judge CASSEL. I think you may take it as being practically universal. As I said before, if the staff officer or court-martial officer concerned feels any difficulty on any point of law which is raised on the charge, or if the general does not agree with the advice which is tendered to him, the matter is referred to the Judge Advocate General in the United Kingdom—referred to me—abroad it would be referred to my deputy. My deputy in any part of the world always has the right to consult me if he himself has any doubt or difficulty.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In practice, then, the convening authorities feel themselves bound to act in accordance with the advice given by the staff officer or court-martial officer, or else have it referred to you or your deputy?

Judge CASSEL. So far as legal questions are concerned. In case of any difference from a disciplinary as distinct from a legal point of view, he would exercise his own discretion. As regards aspects of the case other than legal, he would not in practice feel himself bound to follow the advice of a skilled legal authority.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Although a court-martial officer had advised him that a case was legally sufficient, he might nevertheless decide, from a disciplinary standpoint, not to send a case to trial.

Judge CASSEL. He might, for example, decide that the commanding officer should himself dispose of it. In the case of an officer now, he would summarily dispose of it himself. The powers of disposing summarily of officers' cases are given by the Army act of 1919.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. On the other hand, would he decide to order a case to trial, although the court-martial officer advised him that it was not legally sufficient?

Judge CASSEL. No provision of the Army act which prevents him from doing so, but in practice he does not do it. I think if in such circumstances he sent it to a court-martial, and it resulted in an acquittal and the army council heard of it, they might intimate their disapproval of the line he had taken, but I do not think I can remember a case of that kind. It might be that the officer would write to the army council to indicate to them the difficulties, from a point of view of discipline, that had been created by the fact that he had been prevented from bringing a case to trial on the legal grounds of the court-martial officer.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In practice, if the summary of evidence contains any testimony which in the opinion of the court-martial officer should not come before the court, he simply blue-pencils it or marks it out—that portion of the evidence that appears to be irrelevant or immaterial?

Judge CASSEL. The practice is that the court-martial or staff officer ought to strike out that part of the evidence in such a way that it is completely obliterated. In the case of a general court-martial, every case is referred to the judge advocate general before it goes to trial. In these cases the obliteration of the inadmissible evidence would be done in this office. General courts-martial are always referred to the judge advocate general before trial—

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Or to deputy?

Judge CASSEL. Outside of the United Kingdom, always in practice referred to deputy. In the United Kingdom the regulations specifically require that the proceedings should be referred to the judge advocate general. We examine the charge and evidence and advise whether legally sufficient to try on the charge, whether the charge is in order, whether laid under the correct section of the Army act.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Do you ever have occasion to advise that further testimony ought to be taken on any case? What procedure is followed?

Judge CASSEL. If further evidence is available, additional summary of evidence would be taken by the commanding officer, who would detail the same officer to take the additional summary who had already taken the summary.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The accused must again be present and be given an opportunity to cross-examine those witnesses?

Judge CASSEL. Exactly.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In practice does that result in any embarrassment on the part of the Army authorities; too much delay; any disadvantage of that kind?

Judge CASSEL. I have not heard of any complaints on that score. There have been one or two cases where we have allowed counsel to appear at the summary where there has been a complaint of the cross-examination of the time it has taken?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. It really amounts to two hearings or trials, in a way?

Judge CASSEL. There have been complaints that witnesses have to go twice, once to attend before the commanding officer and again to attend at the trial. The complaints on that ground have been chiefly from police and other civilian witnesses.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. What about the feeling in general—what do officers think of it—are there any complaints about having practically two trials?

Judge CASSEL. No complaints on that score excepting those which I have just referred to from witnesses about having to attend twice.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The commanding officers themselves, so far as you know, do not feel unduly encumbered by the necessity of having all that care taken—the taking of the summary?

Judge CASSEL. They generally deputize<sup>1</sup> their adjutant. A case comes before a commanding officer in the morning. Before he begins his day's work. He deputizes the adjutant, and the adjutant does it in the afternoon.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Does it result in delay in the examination or the investigation?

Judge CASSEL. That depends on the commander of the particular units concerned. With efficient units I do not think it does lead to any great delay. It is analogous in a way to civil procedure before a magistrate; the case is committed to trial and the witnesses have to come again.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes; practically given a hearing before a magistrate. The objection has been made in some quarters that it will impose undue delay; that it really means a second hearing—second trial. In ordinary military cases it would appear to be unnecessary. Our manual requires that the commanding officer make a careful investigation and leaves it to his discretion as to how the examination should be made.

Judge CASSEL. I think that documentary evidence should be very largely allowed at the summary to prove facts which are more or less formal in their nature, such as the proof of arrest by a policeman. It does seem to me unnecessary that you have to bring a policeman twice to give evidence upon which in ninety-eight cases out of a hundred there is no cross-examination at all—no dispute. It is really an unnecessary waste of that man's time, and a waste of the people's money in bringing him twice to get his evidence. In proving formal facts, documentary evidence should be offered largely at these preliminary investigations. In fact, it is very largely used because if the accused does not ask a cross-examination or raise any objection of it, documentary evidence is in fact very largely accepted.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. This circular of August 1, 1918, as to field general courts, provides for that kind of testimony, not necessary to bring such witnesses to testify.

Judge CASSEL. In the case of field general courts-martial, rules as to preliminary investigation do not strictly apply, although they are in practice observed. There is greater latitude in cases of field general courts-martial than in general and district courts.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I would like to get a copy of that circular memorandum of August 1. In practice then they did find it best in the army at the front to carry out substantially the procedure as to taking a summary?

Judge CASSEL. Documentary evidence was more largely used than it would be here.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. From your experience, was it an essential advantage to the accused to have the opportunity to confront the witnesses and cross examine at the preliminary hearing?

Judge CASSEL. Yes. First, advantage in the preparation of the defense; second, not infrequently it has led to the case being dismissed; third, very often material has been secured to cross examine at the trial on something that a witness said at the summary. It enables the commanding officer and convening officer to decide whether the case ought to go to a court-martial.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. It is for that purpose, a real value.

Judge CASSEL. It is.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. And in the taking of this summary the accused is not represented.

Judge CASSEL. He is not strictly represented by some one else; he is there himself. But the preliminary hearing is a value in this way, the accused knows the case that he is to meet at the trial.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. And there are no disadvantages?

Judge CASSEL. Disadvantages—the chief one is having to bring witnesses twice to be examined. To a certain extent, in some cases that may cause delay.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. That is what I was thinking of—the question of delay?

Judge CASSEL. In practice, in the great majority of cases as against the delay caused in some cases you have a considerable number of cases dismissed.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. It works very well with your plan of summary disciplinary punishment. Gives the commanding officer a summary of the case on which to exercise his power of award.

Judge CASSEL. Or whether to dismiss a case, refer to superior authority or send to court martial. I think it would be very difficult for a commanding officer to deal with a case without it.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The alternative plan—the commanding officer in a mere informal way to have the officer whom he detailed to get the summary, examine the witnesses, have them called before him without the formality of confronting the accused with them.

Judge CASSEL. If that procedure were adopted it would be very difficult for the commanding officer to exercise any powers of punishment. You must give the accused the opportunity of confronting and cross-examining those on whose evidence he will be convicted. If you do away with the necessity of giving opportunity to the accused to cross-examine witnesses themselves, we would have to alter our system of summary punishments. The present system places the commanding officer in a position to handle cases in any of the ways I have mentioned. That would not be practical in any system where the accused did not have an opportunity to cross-examine. It seems to me hardly consistent with justice to the accused to say that a commanding officer could punish him summarily without giving him an opportunity of being present at the evidence given against him.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. That may be why the preliminary hearing with us does not give much power to the commanding officer.

Judge CASSEL. That must be the reason—the two things hang together so closely.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Largely for giving the commanding officer that authority.

Judge CASSEL. Yes.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Aside from that, in other words, if the commanding officer did not have that power of summary disciplinary punishment, would you think it wise to have a summary hearing as you do? Our commanding officers have some summary powers—

Judge CASSEL. Can he dismiss cases?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes.

Judge CASSEL. I still think it would be of value. I feel it to be contrary to justice to take evidence and not to give the accused an opportunity of being there.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. It is interesting to get your point of view. Because of your experience and practice in actually carrying it on, do you think that consideration would forbear any objection that would be made against any encumbrance or delay in requiring the accused to be confronted with the witnesses?

Judge CASSEL. Yes; I still think so. But in that case it would be very advantageous to more largely allow documentary evidence where witnesses were at a great distance, accepting the commanding officer's certificate as to the great difficulty in obtaining the testimony of the witnesses.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Do you suggest to allow them to certify as to the difficulty of obtaining witnesses, and that a written statement be accepted, to prove formal facts not under dispute?

Judge CASSEL. Yes.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Would you have any personal suggestions as to changes that should be made if we decided embodying your practice?

Judge CASSEL. With regard to the commanding officer?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The preliminary examination and the commanding officer's award. They usually go together.

Judge CASSEL. I have already indicated that. I should more largely allow proof of formal facts by documentary evidence. A defect in our system is that there is no power to compel civil witnesses to attend at the preliminary investigation. I think that ought to exist. That is a real difficulty at present. That could be improved.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Would you advise allowing the accused to have a "military friend" or a counsel to advise him at the preliminary examination, if he wanted it?

Judge CASSEL. I am not disposed to advise that. From the moment that you do it you would have to have a prosecutor, and the inquiry would take up very much more time than it does now. You would probably have to have another officer than the adjutant to take the summary. We do not want to make it an encumbrance. In special cases counsel has been allowed.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In the discretion of the commanding officer?

Judge CASSEL. In the discretion of the convening officer.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. (reading questionnaire):

"(2) How far convening authorities are, in fact, governed by recommendations of law officers as to ordering cases to trial."

Judge CASSEL (reading):

"(2) On legal points, e. g., as to whether the acts alleged constitute an offense against the Army act or whether the evidence is sufficient to justify trial, the advice of a qualified officer is taken; but questions of difficulty would generally be referred to the Judge Advocate General or his deputy, whose advice is almost invariably taken."

Lieut. Col. RIGBY (reading).

"(3) Summary disciplinary punishment."

Judge CASSEL. This details what the punishments are [reading]:

"(3) A commanding officer can not punish an officer or warrant officer. A general officer holding a general court-martial warrant and a general officer commanding in chief in the field, and any officer (not under the rank of major general) appointed by him or by the Army council can award the following to an officer below field rank:

"Forfeiture of seniority of rank (subject to right of accused to elect trial by general court-martial.)

"Severe reprimand or reprimand (without such option to elect).

"This power was only conferred in 1919 by the annual Army act of that year."

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. That, of course, as you stated is still experimental. What was the reason for that enactment?

Judge CASSEL. I will give the reason, for Gen. Childs and I are largely responsible for it. We had a great many general courts-martial taking place for comparatively slight offenses by officers; for instance, conduct to the prejudice of good order, in borrowing money from soldiers or absence for a few hours. For all these small offences the "sledge-hammer process" of a general court-martial had to be resorted to. All the ceremony of a general court-martial had to be gone through for every offense, however trivial. The period of arrest awaiting trial by general court-martial was, in some cases, in my judgment, itself a more severe punishment than the offense merited. So that this conclusion was arrived at, that some more summary procedure ought to be devised in dealing with these comparatively slight offenses by officers. This clause is the outcome of our deliberations in that respect. I hope that it will be very valuable and beneficial to officers. You can not pass over these offenses if they are occurring frequently. The difficulty with us was that previously we had no power to punish officers except by court-martial.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Was a formal memorandum submitted proposing that enactment?

Judge CASSEL. Yes, I think so. There was a discussion before the Army council. I can remember writing some minutes on it myself; Gen. Childs wrote some. We felt no doubt about its advantages.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Wondering if we might have a copy of the correspondence, any form of correspondence going into the reasons for it. That is a thing that interests us. We have the same difficulty in having to deal with an officer by general court.

Judge CASSEL. I do not think there would be any memorandum other than what I have stated. I have stated exactly the reasons. I should have gone further myself if I could.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. What is your opinion and present advice on that point?

Judge CASSEL. I am not prepared, without further consideration, to say how much further this could be carried.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Did your memorandum recommend further power?

Judge CASSEL. No.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. You drafted the act?

Judge CASSEL. Parliamentary counsel drafted the act but it was submitted to me for approval.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. It went through in the form in which you advised.

Judge CASSEL. Yes, substantially.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Your advice would have been for arbitrary power. What I am trying to get at it, what you would advise us to do—our problem is the same?

Judge CASSEL. I would carry it further, but I am not prepared to furnish precise limits without further consideration.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Is the Army Act of 1919 available in printed form?

Judge CASSEL. I will try to get you one if it is [continuing reading]:

"A noncommissioned officer may be severely reprimanded, reprimanded or admonished; also, if holding 'acting' or 'lance' rank, may be ordered to revert to his permanent rank.

"In the case of privates, the 'summary' punishments awardable by a commanding officer are: Detention up to 28 days; for drunkenness a fine not exceeding 10/—, in addition to or with detention; authorized deductions from pay (e. g., to make good damages done, or loss of arms and kit); on active service only, field punishment up to 28 days; on active service only (in addition to or without any other punishment), forfeiture of ordinary pay up to 28 days.

"The following minor punishments may also be awarded: Confinement to barracks up to 14 days; extra guards or picquets; admonition (see King's Regulations 493).

"If the commanding officer is not of field rank, his powers in respect of detention are limited to 7 days (except in cases of absence).

"A company (squadron or battery) commander can award normally: Confinement to barracks up to 7 days; extra guards and picquets; fines for drunkenness; he can deal with cases of absence, which entail automatic forfeiture of pay; his awards can be reduced by the commanding officer; and, if he has not 3 years' service, his powers may be limited by the commanding officer (see King's Regulations 501).

"A commanding officer must give a soldier the option of claiming a trial by court-martial in every case where the award or finding involves a forfeiture of pay, and in every other case unless he awards one of the 'minor' punishments (Army act S. 46 (8)).

"Subject to this option, a commanding officer can in law deal summarily with any offense, if he considers that his powers of punishment are sufficient; but King's Regulations (Par. 487) require him to first refer certain of the more serious offenses to superior authority for directions as to whether they shall be dealt with summarily or whether a court-martial shall be held."

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In practice does a man usually demand a court-martial; in what proportion of cases does he demand a court-martial?

Judge CASSEL. As a rule he accepts his commanding officer's award in cases where the commanding officer himself thinks it is a proper case to deal with.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. There is a value, do you believe, in giving him the option to demand a court-martial? For instance, under the French system no such option is given to him.

Judge CASSEL. I think there is a value, because the commanding officer has necessarily to deal with cases somewhat hurriedly, and it is a great safeguard. There are, of course, some commanding officers who are not so well qualified as others to deal with cases.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. What is the value of field punishment which you have and which is unknown to our practice?

Judge CASSEL. The value of field punishment is this: On active service you really want some punishment which will not take a man out of the line for a long period or necessitate sending others with him out of the line. Long periods of imprisonment are for many cases not suitable punishments when on active service. Field punishment has created a great deal of discontent on two grounds (1) because it is considered to be degrading to the soldier, (2) on the ground that it may be administered with such varying degrees of severity. But it is difficult to find any other punishment to take its place. Long imprisonment on active service may not be an effective deterrent. A man who does not want to be in the line gets a long term of imprisonment. That may be exactly what he wants, and it necessitates sending other soldiers back with him. Imprisonment is very difficult to apply when troops are on the move in a war of movement. In a war of movement you want some punishment which can be quickly applied without sending a man back from the front, but if some punishment could be devised other than field punishment which would be effective, then let field punishment go. It is necessary first to devise some other punishment to take its place. Unless this was done it might be that the death penalty would be more frequently inflicted. I think that field punishment is open to objection. But at present no effective substitute has been devised. I would be glad to see some substitute take its place, something that does not involve any prolonged absence from the fighting line is, I think, necessary. [Referring to book.] I have here the report of a select committee on punishments on active service. Very glad to loan it to you to read and make such extracts from it as you like. This committee was appointed after the South African war, and contains a good many records about punishments awarded during the South African war. It may interest you.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. It will.

Judge CASSEL. It deals particularly with the question of field punishments.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY (interrupting). The next question.

"4. Information and statistics relating to the impartial judge advocate attached to a general court-martial (and to what extent in practice assigned to district court-martial)."

Judge CASSEL (reading):

"4. A judge advocate is always appointed for a general court-martial; he is generally an officer with legal knowledge, but may be a civilian."

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. If a civilian, is he a barrister in practice?

Judge CASSEL. Always. [Continuing reading:]

"The appointment in the United Kingdom is made by the judge advocate general; abroad, by the general officer commanding in chief. A judge advocate is at present only rarely appointed in the case district courts-martial. No statistics are available."

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. What rule is followed in the appointment of court-martial officers?

Judge CASSEL. The adjutant general's office of the war office in the United Kingdom have frequently consulted the judge advocate general as to whether an officer concerned is a fit and proper person to be appointed as a court-martial officer, but the actual appointment is made, in the United Kingdom by the adjutant general's department at the war office; abroad, by the adjutant general's branch of the commander in chief's headquarters, upon the recommendation of the deputy judge advocate general. I think abroad they always consult my deputy before appointing.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Does a court-martial officer have direct access to you or to your deputy abroad, or must he go through military channels?

Judge CASSEL. Technically, he ought to go through military channels, but I have on occasions had direct communication with court-martial officers, but technically they should go through military channels.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In practice does a judge advocate of a general court-martial in ruling on evidence or in summing up do it as a judge, as though his ruling should govern with the court? What form would the judge advocate use in advising the court that such and such evidence was not admissible? How far does he govern in ruling the court; how far advisory?

Judge CASSEL. In actual practice his advice is almost invariably followed. If the court did not take his advice it would be a serious responsibility, and it would be reported by the judge advocate himself to the convening authority. The judge advocate would be justified in that case to inform me that his ruling had not been followed by the court. I would take that into account in reviewing the case and in considering whether or not to recommend confirmation and in advising whether the conviction should be quashed. The form in which the judge advocate sums up in open court is much the same as that in which a judge would sum up to a jury, but a judge advocate's summing up is much shorter generally, and it is not necessary for the judge advocate to sum up at all if the court and the judge advocate agree that a summing up is not required.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. And does the court close to consider his advice?

Judge CASSEL. It closes on points of importance.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. And the court almost invariably accept the ruling of the judge advocate?

Judge CASSEL. If not they would incur a very grave responsibility, and the judge advocate would have the right, as he is my representative on the court, to inform me directly that his advice has not been accepted. It might lead to the proceedings being not confirmed or quashed.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Does his advice and summing up become a part of the record?

Judge CASSEL. Yes; it becomes a part of the record unless both the court and the judge advocate think it unnecessary to record it.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. It is necessary to record his ruling on the admissibility of testimony?

Judge CASSEL. It is necessary to record the decision of the court, but not necessarily the ruling of the judge advocate.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In practice is his summing up usually recorded or not?

Judge CASSEL. It is usually recorded where he does sum up. In many cases the court and the judge advocate both agree that a summing up is not necessary.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The summing up and ruling by the judge advocate—whether it points out defects in the record—whether it does cause an undue number of disapprovals on account of legal questions in any way?

CASSEL. There have been a certain number of appeals against the opinion of the judge advocate on the ground that there was misdirection of law in them, but on the whole the number of cases on which the appeals have been quashed on that ground have not been numerous. What is the substance of the question in dealing with questions of that kind is really the substance of the question whether the court has in fact been misled on the matter of law submitted to the summing up by the judge advocate. If I come to that conclusion and consider that a miscarriage of justice has resulted, I would advise quashing the proceedings. The fact that every point in the evidence has not been put out, or that something has been omitted by the judge advocate would not be a ground for quashing or not confirming proceedings, provided there is no reason for supposing that there has been any substantial injustice.

Col. RIGBY. You do not find it necessary to quash a large number of appeals on the ground of what you have stated?

CASSEL. Very few have been quashed on that ground.

Col. RIGBY. The alternative plan as to summing up is followed in your general courts, where a specially qualified member of the court gives advice to the court in closed session. Between the two plans, what are the disadvantages?

CASSEL. There is a good deal to be said on both sides of the question. There are advantages and disadvantages in both alternatives. My opinion on this point inclines toward the judge advocate rather than the special member of the court. A judge advocate is the recognized representative of the judge, and his opinion is general with a definite position laid down in the rules of procedure. All of the other members of the court are required to conform. On the other hand, I think it is an advantage that the actual finding and sentence should be made by the regimental officers in close touch with regimental life, and acquainted with the actual conditions of fighting. The actual findings and sentence should be made by the regimental officers, and on points of law they should be guided by a legal expert.

Col. RIGBY. One proposal that has been given us is to make the specially qualified member to be president of the court. What would your thought be on that, being that you prefer a judge advocate?

CASSEL. I lean to the judge advocate, though I think it would be better to have a special officer, that he should be the president rather than an ordinary member.

Col. RIGBY. In practice, has the need of a judge advocate on district courts-martial been shown?

CASSEL. I think myself they should be appointed more frequently on district courts, especially on cases of fraud and for civil offenses. I find that a large number of courts-martial which most frequently have to be quashed on legal grounds are district courts-martial for the trial of cases of stealing, fraud, and offenses where there is no judge advocate. On that ground I am personally in favor of more frequently appointing judge advocates on district courts. I think you want them on every district court, not for instance for ordinary cases of absence or drunkenness.

Col. RIGBY. What would be your views as to how it should be determined in that case; what cases they should be appointed on?

CASSEL. By the convening authority acting on the advice of his staff or court-martial officer. It might be possible to lay down some general rules such as that judge advocates should usually be appointed where there is a case of fraud, stealing, or some other civil offense.

Col. RIGBY. I noticed in attending some of your district courts, in the course of the summary of evidence or record of evidence, the president does not require the recording of questions and answers that may have been proposed in cross-examination by the accused, which the president has ruled out as irrelevant or immaterial, so that no note is made of the fact that the question was asked and was ruled out. Is there any reason for the protection of the record in that a legal adviser should be present? Is any harm done to the accused here by carelessness in making up the record?

CASSEL. That is not my ground for thinking it desirable to more frequently have a judge advocate on district courts. The accused is entitled to have every question recorded to which objection is put.

Col. RIGBY. But if not represented by counsel, no note is made of it. The question is ruled out, perhaps properly ruled out, but no record is made of it.

CASSEL. A record ought to be made.

Col. RIGBY (reading next question):

"(5) The 'specially qualified member' of the British general field court-martial—

"(a) How many officers are required for this service?

"(b) From what department are they drawn?

"(c) By whom and how are they chosen?

"(d) Are they in practice required to have legal training?

"(e) What qualifications are required for this 'specially qualified member'?

"(f) How many courts can one such officer conveniently serve?

"(g) Do they in practice sum up the case as to the facts, as well as the law, like the judge advocate of the British general court-martial?

"(h) And, if so, how does such summing up (by an officer who is himself a member of the court and required to vote as one of the members) work in practice?

"(i) How much deference is in practice paid to the opinions of the 'specially qualified member' of the court?

"(k) How does the whole system actually work out?"

Judge CASSEL (reading):

"(5) It must be remembered that the 'specially qualified member' of a field general court-martial, generally called a court-martial officer, was unknown before, and in the early stages of the war. The first court-martial officers were appointed in August, 1915."

Lieut. Col. RIGBY (interrupting). Was there a general order or an army council letter?

Judge CASSEL. No; not abroad. At home there were army council instructions some time about September, 1916, but abroad it was done experimentally at first. I am not aware that there was any actual order issued on the subject abroad, but I will have inquiry made. The little green book which I am going to give you has in it a reference to court-martial officers abroad. [Continuing reading:]

"(a) The general rule was to have one attached to each corps of not more than two divisions. If there were more than two divisions in the corps, there were two court-martial officers. In addition, there were one or more court-martial officers attached to each army. There were special appointments for lines of communication."

There would be a court-martial officer at corps headquarters, with a corps consisting of not more than two divisions, but if there were more than two divisions in the corps, say three or four divisions, there would be two court-martial officers at corps headquarters. The court-martial officers attached to the army would be at the army headquarters. [Continuing reading:]

"(b) From the army as a whole, in which a great many barristers and solicitors were serving.

"(c) By the adjutant general's department, after inquiry as to applicant's ability and professional standing, on the recommendation of the judge advocate general or his deputy.

"(d) (c) They were all fully qualified barristers or solicitors.

"(f) The answer to this question depends on the local conditions and the length and difficulty of the cases; the number of officers referred to under (a) were found sufficient to do the work required."

That answers your question?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. These court-martial officers would be appointed to membership in several courts?

Judge CASSEL. He would go from one court to the other. One would suffice for a corps with not more than two divisions. [Continuing reading:]

"(g) They do not formally sum up (either on fact or law) in open court. When the court retires, they give their views both on law and on fact."

Lieut. Col. RIGBY (interrupting). That is not made part of the record.

Judge CASSEL. No; nothing which is not in open court is recorded. [Continuing reading:]

"(h) This does not arise.

"(i) On questions of law their opinion was generally followed; on a question of fact it had considerable weight, though not so much as on questions of law. But the obligation of secrecy imposed by the oath renders it difficult to speak with certainty.

"(k) It is considered that the system has in the emergency worked extremely well. There is, however, a difference of opinion as to whether it would not be better that the court-martial officer should sit either as judge advocate or president, and not merely as a member of the court."

that I have not expressed a view as to which is best. The balance of opinion is, as I have already stated, on the whole in favor of judge advocate.

Deut. Col. RIGBY (reading from questionnaire) :

(6) What have been the results in practice of British Army Orders 110 and 111 of March 17, 1917 (analagous to General Orders Nos. 7 and 94, U. S. Department, 1918) ?

(a) Upon what considerations were these British orders based?

(b) Just how far has their application been extended?

(c) How uniformly have the recommendations of the judge advocate general been followed by confirming authorities?"

Judge CASSEL (reading) :

(6) Before Army Orders 110 and 111 of 1917, in the United Kingdom the judge advocate at the trial forwarded the proceedings of general courts-martial direct to the judge advocate general.

Under the new system introduced by Army Orders 110 and 111 the proceedings in such cases, instead of going direct to the judge advocate general, go to him through the convening officer who adds his remarks and recommendations.

(1) If confirmation by His Majesty was required the judge advocate general transmitted them to the secretary of state for submission to His Majesty.

(2) If confirmation by His Majesty was not required the judge advocate general returned them with his advice to the convening officer (who was also confirming officer)."

What was explaining what the position was before. Now [continuing reading] :

(a) The object of the Army Orders 110 and 111 was to insure that the judge advocate general in reviewing the proceedings, and the secretary of state for war or air tendering the advice to His Majesty should have before them the views of the convening officer.

(b) The orders extend to all general courts-martial held in the United Kingdom.

(c) The recommendations of the judge advocate general as to confirmation have almost invariably been followed."

I can not remember a case as to confirmation that has not been followed since I have been judge advocate general.

Deut. Col. RIGBY. Referring to (b), is there any analagous order for field general courts-martial—field courts at home?

Judge CASSEL. No; it only deals with general courts-martial at home.

Deut. Col. RIGBY. We will come to quashing later on. So, in speaking of conformity in following your recommendations in confirmation, you mean now recommendations where you have advised confirmation and they have followed it?

Judge CASSEL. Yes; confirmation or nonconfirmation. I have been trying to recall a case where they have not acted on my advice as to confirmation or nonconfirmation. With regard to quashing, I will come to that later.

Deut. Col. RIGBY (reading questionnaire) :

(7) To what relative extent during the war has the British Army made use of its several disciplinary agencies?

(a) General courts-martial.

(b) District courts-martial.

(c) Field general courts-martial.

(d) Summary disciplinary punishment.

(8) What about the length and severity of sentences during the war in the British Army for—

(a) Military offenses?

(b) Civil offenses?

(9) Statistics for the purposes of throwing light on all of the above questions, and others that may arise, as to—

(a) Total number of court-martial trials, segregated among the different courts—

1. General courts-martial.

2. District courts-martial.

3. Field general courts-martial.

(b) Annual percentage of court-martial trial to total strength.

(c) Number (and percentage) of acquittals.

"(d) Number and percentage of cases reviewed, disapproved, modified, etc., and by what agencies (that is, confirming authority or recommendation of judge advocate general, or otherwise).

"(10) Number and length of sentences for principal military offenses and principal civil offenses; collated and tabulated separately.

"(11) Number of sentences reduced in severity by the confirming authority or on the recommendation of the judge advocate general—

"1. Classified according to the character of the offense; and

"2. With figures as to the aggregate of such reductions and the percentage of such reductions to the number and length of original sentences.

"3. Classified to show separately those so reduced on recommendation of judge advocate general.

"(12) Death sentences, classified as to—

"1. Offenses for which imposed.

"2. How many carried into execution.

"3. Statistics as to commutation.

"(13) Detention barracks statistics: Number of such sentences, classified as to—

"1. Character of offense and length of sentence.

"2. Figures as to the restoration of men to duty.

"3. Number of men who, having served detention barracks sentences, were again sentenced to the barracks, or to severer punishment.

"(14) Summary disciplinary punishment statistics.

"1. Number and character of sentences and for what kind of offenses.

"2. Number of men so sentenced a second, third, or more times.

"3. Number of men so sentenced who were thereafter sentenced to the detention barracks or to severer punishment."

Judge CASSEL. These paragraphs have been grouped together in my answer: "(7), (8), (9), (10), (11), (12), (13), and (14). All the statistics available in this office have been supplied. Possibly the adjutant general's department may be able to supply further information as to strength of army, detention barracks, and punishments. There are no statistics of summary punishments by commanding officers, no record of such punishments reaches the office of the judge advocate general."

Our statistics, as I told you before, during the war were improvised. When I was appointed I found no statistics at all, so our statistics previous to my appointment have been made up subsequently and they are not perhaps as full as we should like them to be.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. These statistics have been given to me in confidence and not to be submitted to Congress.

Judge CASSEL. When submitted to the British House of Commons, I may be able to authorize you to submit them to Congress. I have communicated with the secretary of state. But I would not be justified in authorizing you to disclose to Congress what has not yet been made public in our own house.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Any conclusions we may draw from them—percentages—that you may tell me. For instance, I have in mind the percentage of your acquittals before the war, which I gather from examination of the statistics. Can you tell me anything in this form—percentage of disapprovals and acquittals for the purpose of comparison with our own in times of peace. I could make up a little table of conclusions which I have drawn and submit it to you.

Judge CASSEL. I will tell you what I will do. Submit it to me and I will submit it to the secretary of state, but I do not think I would feel justified in authorizing the furnishing of statistics for Congress without having his special permission. If you will submit it to me, I will submit it to him, and if he assents I will let you know.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The next question is (15).

"(15) Average length of time elapsed between the offense and final disposition of cases:

"1. By summary disciplinary punishment.

"2. By courts-martial (classified so far as possible by the different kinds of courts-martial).

"3. Final confirmation or other disposition."

Judge CASSEL (reading):

"(15) 1. An offense would ordinarily be disposed of by summary punishment on the day following arrest, but there may be delay owing to a number of causes, such as difficulty in obtaining evidence, reference to superior authority, etc."

I will take an ordinary case—a soldier commits an offense this afternoon, he strikes a superior officer; he is put in the guardhouse this afternoon; as a rule, he goes before the commanding officer the next morning. First, before the company commander, as I explained. The company commander if he disposes of it summarily would probably do so that morning. If it goes to the commanding officer, he would also ordinarily deal with it this morning; that is to say, the morning after the arrest. There may, however, be a number of reasons which cause delay. [Continuing reading:]

“(2) The times which would elapse between commission of the offense and confirmation of the sentence in the case of each of the four kinds of courts-martial if every step were taken as promptly as possible and no difficulty arose in connection with the obtaining of evidence or otherwise are shown in the table annexed to the evidence of the judge advocate general before the committee on courts-martial. (Appendix III, p. 27, copy attached.)

“(3) No statistics as to the actual times which elapse have been kept.”

That table (referring to book) you need not regard as confidential, not created as confidential. The table appears marked in blue pencil, pages 30 and 31. That table really does give you the information, each step, every and through which a case passes.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. What particularly interests us is how long it takes you to run a case through, taking into consideration the delay that you do meet?

Judge CASSEL. During the war, delays have frequently arisen particularly due to the exigencies of the war, the fact that officers had to be constantly on the move or had other more important work to be attended to. District courts-martial do not cause much undue delay in peace time. District courts-martial ought to be tried within a fortnight or thereabouts and from inquiries which I have made I think that before the war that period was not, as a rule, much exceeded. In the case of general courts-martial there is more delay. Three weeks, I think, is the minimum time that is requisite, but especially during the war there have been very long delays.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Have you had experience during the war with delays in a case going to 30 or 40 days?

Judge CASSEL. More than that, I am sorry to say—even three, four, or five months in exceptional cases. I have made it a rule to send in to the war office all the cases where I think there has been undue delay. The war office investigate the reasons for the delay, and if it is not satisfactorily accounted for, the officers concerned hear of it. We have constantly had this question of delay under our notice during the war. If an accused is convicted, the general rule is that the court should take the delay into account in awarding sentence, but that only holds redresses to hardships where there is a conviction or if the sentence admits of it. If the accused is acquitted or if the proceedings are not confirmed, or if a light sentence is awarded, it is not possible to remedy the hardship in that way. We are meeting that by a larger use of “open arrest,” and more frequently releasing the accused without prejudice to his trial; in fact by more closely approximating to the practice in civil courts in granting bail to the accused.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. That is a thing we have been interested in and have kept statistics for several years.

Judge CASSEL. I think it is very desirable, and when we get back to normal conditions we shall certainly keep statistics ourselves as to the periods of arrest awaiting trial.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. How long have you found it necessary to get a case through this office?

Judge CASSEL. In cases before trial we make it a point to try and send the papers back on the same day; if not possible, within 48 hours after their receipt. That is the standard we work up to; to have them passed the same day. Any case involving liberty is given precedence and is dealt with first; I mean if the liberty of the soldier would be affected by the papers being kept here. In advising before trial, we return papers generally on the same day; always within 48 hours. Of course, in reviewing proceedings it takes longer. The accused is already under sentence of a competent court. Where we particularly make a point of expedition is where the liberty of the accused is affected, and he is not yet proven guilty. Of course, asking for additional evidence and additional information may take time.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In reviewing cases, how long does it take?

Judge CASSEL. We do it as quickly as we can—with proceedings coming from all parts of the world; all cases are reviewed here except cases tried in India. There is a separate judge advocate general for India. Sometimes we get a very large number per week; during the war as many as 2,000 in a week, and we have only a very small staff of officers to deal with them. Considerable delay sometimes takes place before proceedings reach us. This was especially the case with proceedings from France while heavy fighting was going on.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Cases of death sentences, how are they handled? In what way?

Judge CASSEL. In the United Kingdom not a single death sentence on an officer or soldier in the British Army has been carried out during the war, either for any strictly military or for any civil offense.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. For strictly military offenses?

Judge CASSEL. By court-martial, none at all in the United Kingdom as regards officers or soldiers of the British Army. Abroad the death sentence has to be confirmed by the commander in chief. Before he confirms the proceedings he has the advice of the deputy judge advocate general, who can always refer to the judge advocate general at home if there is any question of doubt or difficulty. In addition to that the commander in chief has before him the recommendations of the commanding officer of the accused, the brigade commander, the divisional commander, the corps commander, and the army commander as to whether the requirements of discipline are such that the sentence should be carried out or whether clemency should be extended.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Are these recommendations required?

Judge CASSEL. There is no law which requires it, but it is a universal practice. Orders have been issued that these recommendations should be forwarded to the commander in chief. He has these before him, and on legal questions he has the advice of the judge advocate general or his deputy. If there is any question as to a man's mind having been affected, through shell shock or in any other way, a special examination by medical board is ordered.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Is the advice of the deputy judge advocate general in written form or review?

Judge CASSEL. It takes the form of submitting the proceedings to the adjutant general to place them before the commander in chief, and if the deputy judge advocate general considers that they are in order, his minute would merely be submitted to the adjutant general to place before the commander in chief. If he has grounds for thinking that the proceedings should not be confirmed, he would give his reasons. The position of the deputy judge advocate general is laid down in our field service regulations. What I have been telling you is the practice.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. One other question: Do you review proceedings afterwards in cases where the death sentences are carried into effect abroad?

Judge CASSEL. I do; but I have had no occasion to send in any minute where the sentence has actually been carried out.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Where the accused is at home you review a death case before it is carried into execution?

Judge CASSEL. Not a single death sentence has been awarded at home.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Have not had a death sentence at home?

Judge CASSEL. No. If one had been awarded I would have advised on it before confirmation.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Your recommendation is required?

Judge CASSEL. No death sentence at home would be carried into effect unless personally reviewed by me.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Have you any thought as to the advisability of having all death sentences awarded abroad being reviewed at home before being carried into effect?

Judge CASSEL. There are very strong reasons against it. Suppose in Mesopotamia a man is sentenced to death, it would take too long a time to send the case back to England. The essence of a death penalty is to carry it out quickly. The quick carrying out of a death penalty has great value, especially with native troops, to prevent mutiny from spreading. If every death sentence had to be sent back to London it would defeat some of the principal objects which necessitate the awarding of a death sentence. I should certainly say it would be a great disadvantage if the case were sent to London. If you are to have death sentences at all, the commander in chief in the field should be able to say whether it should be carried out. He has always the legal advice of the deputy judge advocate general, who in turn can refer to the judge advocate general at home in any case of doubt or difficulty.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In practice how quickly was a death sentence carried into effect abroad?

ASSEL. One case in the early part of the war a death sentence was it within three days after arrest; that was while the troops were on the move. A certificate of urgency was given by the convening and it was carried out under three days.

ol. RIGBY. Case of misconduct in the face of the enemy?

ASSEL. It was. It occurred during the retreat from Mons. The death had to be speedily carried out. The evidence was absolutely clear beyond shadow of a doubt. Other cases where it is necessary to carry out the sentence very quickly is with native troops to prevent a mutiny from occurring. For troops in the trenches there is not the same necessity for speed, and longer time is taken. I can not give you an exact figure.

Col. RIGBY. In a general way, your death sentences were very few?

ASSEL. Very few, considering the number in the army and the very circumstances of the fighting.

Vol. RIGBY. In a general way are you able to tell me in this form the of the offenses for which most of the sentences were imposed?

ARTICLE 15, UCMJ. The only offenses for which the death sentence was carried out were mutiny, cowardice, desertion, murder, striking and using violence to a superior officer, willful disobedience of lawful command of superior officer, and possession of unauthorized weapons.

Q. In a general form can you tell me the relative proportion of these offenses?

ASSESS. The great bulk of them were for desertion in the face of the section on active service.

Col. RIGBY. Does that include cowardice?

ASSEL. Desertion on active service, as a rule, involves cowardice also. • for a definite period of time is involved it is usual to frame the one of desertion; where there is not absence for any definite period • of cowardice is preferred.

ol. RIGBY. In addition to the great bulk which you say was for deer number, what proportion for cowardice?

ASSEL. The great bulk were for desertion: not many for cowardice.

Vol. Ricky. Any further information about these death cases you feel I should know about at this time?

ANSEL. I do not think I can at the moment.

Col. RIGBY. From your experience in the war, would you advise any the method of handling them or as to confirmation, any suggestion, us?

ASSEL No: I think not. The only exception I have to make is relative r character. It is this: When the accused is informed of a charge but he has been sentenced to death by the court, he is not to be informed would also be informed that he may make any statement he wishes counsel may wish to the court or a jury. It is not a case where accused who is tried on a capital charge is to be informed of a evidence him. If he wishes to be represented.

Col. RIGBY. Capital charge of the "crime" of which the accused is toward the death sentence?

Judge CASSEL. I make no distinction. If the evidence is sufficient to warrant the death penalty, it must ultimately rest with the commander in chief whether the sentence should be carried out or clemency exercised, and if it is carried out it should be done without undue delay.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY (reading next question):

"(16) Results of suspension of sentence, under suspended-sentence act—statistics and general working of the system."

Judge CASSEL (reading from his answers):

"The working of the suspension of sentences acts has been most beneficial during war time and the acts have fulfilled the purposes for which they were originally passed. They have given many a soldier the opportunity of redeeming his character by bravery in the field. They have prevented men whose services were required in the field from being detailed for long periods in prison. A feature in connection with these acts which has given rise to some dissatisfaction is the fact that, while soldiers who had committed comparatively slight offenses and who had not had their sentences suspended had to serve those sentences, others who had been guilty of graver crimes and who had their punishments suspended escaped all punishment. The adjutant general's department would be able to supply further information on this question."

"This question of suspension really does not come under my department, but under the jurisdiction of the adjutant general. It has been a most beneficial act: it has saved many soldiers from imprisonment. There is one weak point.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Have you any suggestions as to any changes?

Judge CASSEL. Any suggestion I would make is this: The court might award forfeiture of pay, and imprisonment in addition. The imprisonment could then be alone suspended. The forfeiture of pay would still stand, so that the soldier would not be altogether without punishment.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY (reading from questionnaire):

"(17) An opportunity (such as was afforded Col. Dunn, of the United States Army in 1911) of visiting detention barracks and other military prisons, and statistics as to the length of sentences and character of offenses for which the prisoners are undergoing confinement.

"(18) An opportunity to visit and make stenographic reports of the proceedings of courts-martial of the different classes—G. C. M., D. C. M., F. G. C. M.—and to procure complete copies of records of actual proceedings (with the names of the defendants omitted, of fictitious names substituted if desirable), such as has been furnished by the French authorities."

Judge CASSEL (reading):

"(17) (18) This is being arranged. Further statistics as to sentences can possibly be supplied by the adjutant general's department of the war office and the authorities at the detention barracks."

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. We had an opportunity to visit Aldershot and got information there. Very interesting. We plan to visit those at Perth and Stirling to-morrow; Gen. Childs has made arrangements for that. [Reading from questionnaire:]

"(19) Information as to the working in practice of the judge advocate general's office; e. g., the number of cases passing through the office per annum, or per month, during the war; the length of time required for the disposition of a case in the office; the routine method of handling cases; the number of cases recommended to be disapproved; number of recommendations to clemency; figures showing how uniformly recommendations of the judge advocate general have been followed by military authorities:

"(a) of disapproval, wholly or partially, on legal grounds.

"(b) of clemency."

Judge CASSEL (reading):

"(19) The work of the judge advocate general's office consists in giving advice as to courts-martial both under the army act and the air force act and legal advice on other questions. The work so far as it relates to courts-martial falls under four main heads: (i) Advice before trial; (ii) advice before confirmation; (iii) review after confirmation; (iv) review upon appeal.

"As to (i): In the United Kingdom the convening officer before ordering trial submits the charge sheet and summary of evidence in all general courts-martial cases and in all district courts-martial cases where fraud is alleged or where he desires advice. Similar duties are discharged in relation to courts-martial abroad by the deputy of the judge advocate general.

"In such cases advice is given as to whether the evidence is admissible and sufficient to support the charge and what kind of further evidence, if any, is quired, and also whether the charge is correctly drawn and what amendments and additional charges, if any, are necessary.

"The judge advocate general himself does not deal with cases 'before trial' except to lay down general principles, and it is a cardinal rule of the office that officers who deal with cases at that stage should not deal with them 'after trial.'"

I am very particular on that point.

"As to (ii): In the United Kingdom after trial and before confirmation the proceedings are forwarded to the judge advocate general in all general court-martial cases and in any other cases where the confirming authority desires advice.

"These are dealt with by the judge advocate general with the help of legal assistants. Abroad similar duties are discharged by the deputy of the judge advocate general who refers to the judge advocate general in London in cases of doubt or difficulty.

"If the proceedings require confirmation by His Majesty, the judge advocate general forwards them to the secretary of state with his opinion embodied in a minute, and the secretary of state submits them to His Majesty. In other cases he returns them to the confirming authority with his advice.

"As to (iii): All proceedings held in any part of the world except India are after confirmation forwarded to the office of the judge advocate general in London for review and custody. For India there is a separate judge advocate general who reviews proceedings of trials held there.

"In all cases sent to the judge advocate general's office the proceedings are carefully reviewed to see whether the charges are properly framed, whether the evidence justifies a conviction and whether the proceedings are otherwise legally in order. If the proceedings are in order they are filed. If not, they are forwarded to the secretary of state for war or the secretary of state for air or the lieutenant general, or other proper authority, advising that the proceedings should be quashed or that such other action should be taken as the circumstances of the case may require.

"As to (iv): It is open to any person convicted by court-martial to petition His Majesty or the army council, or air council at any time against his conviction or sentence, and persons frequently petition more than once. Such petitions if they involve any legal questions are referred to the judge advocate general and are again considered by him in the light of any further facts or arguments brought forward by the petitioner. Advice is then given to the secretary of state for war or air as to whether there is any ground for interference.

"It must be clearly understood that the judge advocate general is concerned only with the legality of convictions and sentences. He is not concerned with commendations as to clemency though he occasionally calls attention to sentences if they appear unusually severe. His recommendations upon the legal aspect of cases are almost invariably accepted and acted upon. The only cases in which this has not been done is when the attorney general has been consulted and has taken a different view.

"Cases for advice before trial and before confirmation are, so far as circumstances permit, dealt with and dispatched from the judge advocate general's office within 48 hours of receipt unless they raise some point of exceptional difficulty.

"Cases for final review after confirmation are dealt with as rapidly as possible; the delay is seldom more than three days.

"As the statistics show, nearly a quarter of a million convictions were reviewed in the office during the war."

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. How many are in your staff?

Judge CASSEL. My staff now consists of three civilians, including the registrar and nine attached officers. I had more before the armistice.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. How many then?

Judge CASSEL. During the heavy work of the war, I had 14 or 15 attached officers.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. With that small staff were you able to write reviews, opinions on a case, or did you simply make a minute?

Judge CASSEL. I am guided by circumstances. I should send in a full minute if I thought it necessary. We have to distribute the work. But we have been rather short-handed.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Do you have fixed rules to distribute the work among members of the staff?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY (interrupting). The next question.

"4. Information and statistics relating to the impartial judge advocate attached to a general court-martial (and to what extent in practice assigned to district court-martial)."

Judge CASSEL (reading):

"4. A judge advocate is always appointed for a general court-martial; he is generally an officer with legal knowledge, but may be a civilian."

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. If a civilian, is he a barrister in practice?

Judge CASSEL. Always. [Continuing reading:]

"The appointment in the United Kingdom is made by the judge advocate general; abroad, by the general officer commanding in chief. A judge advocate is at present only rarely appointed in the case district courts-martial. No statistics are available."

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. What rule is followed in the appointment of court-martial officers?

Judge CASSEL. The adjutant general's office of the war office in the United Kingdom have frequently consulted the judge advocate general as to whether an officer concerned is a fit and proper person to be appointed as a court-martial officer, but the actual appointment is made, in the United Kingdom by the adjutant general's department at the war office; abroad, by the adjutant general's branch of the commander in chief's headquarters, upon the recommendation of the deputy judge advocate general. I think abroad they always consult my deputy before appointing.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Does a court-martial officer have direct access to you or to your deputy abroad, or must he go through military channels?

Judge CASSEL. Technically, he ought to go through military channels, but I have on occasions had direct communication with court-martial officers, but technically they should go through military channels.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In practice does a judge advocate of a general court-martial in ruling on evidence or in summing up do it as a judge, as though his ruling should govern with the court? What form would the judge advocate use in advising the court that such and such evidence was not admissible? How far does he govern in ruling the court; how far advisory?

Judge CASSEL. In actual practice his advice is almost invariably followed. If the court did not take his advice it would be a serious responsibility, and it would be reported by the judge advocate himself to the convening authority. The judge advocate would be justified in that case to inform me that his ruling had not been followed by the court. I would take that into account in reviewing the case and in considering whether or not to recommend confirmation and in advising whether the conviction should be quashed. The form in which the judge advocate sums up in open court is much the same as that in which a judge would sum up to a jury, but a judge advocate's summing up is much shorter generally, and it is not necessary for the judge advocate to sum up at all if the court and the judge advocate agree that a summing up is not required.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. And does the court close to consider his advice?

Judge CASSEL. It closes on points of importance.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. And the court almost invariably accept the ruling of the judge advocate?

Judge CASSEL. If not they would incur a very grave responsibility, and the judge advocate would have the right, as he is my representative on the court, to inform me directly that his advice has not been accepted. It might lead to the proceedings being not confirmed or quashed.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Does his advice and summing up become a part of the record?

Judge CASSEL. Yes; it becomes a part of the record unless both the court and the judge advocate think it unnecessary to record it.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. It is necessary to record his ruling on the admissibility of testimony?

Judge CASSEL. It is necessary to record the decision of the court, but not necessarily the ruling of the judge advocate.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In practice is his summing up usually recorded or not?

Judge CASSEL. It is usually recorded where he does sum up. In many cases the court and the judge advocate both agree that a summing up is not necessary.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The summing up and ruling by the judge advocate—whether it points out defects in the record—whether it does cause an undue number of disapprovals on account of legal questions in any way?

Judge CASSEL. There have been a certain number of appeals against the summing up of the judge advocate on the ground that there was misdirection and error of law in them, but on the whole the number of cases on which the proceedings have been quashed on that ground have not been numerous. What I consider in dealing with questions of that kind is really the substance of the matter, whether the court has in fact been misled on the matter of law submitted in the summing up by the judge advocate. If I come to that conclusion and consider that a miscarriage of justice has resulted, I would advise quashing the proceedings. The fact that every point in the evidence has not been brought out, or that something has been omitted by the judge advocate would certainly not be a ground for quashing or not confirming proceedings, provided there is no reason for supposing that there has been any substantial injustice.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. You do not find it necessary to quash a large number of cases because of what you have stated?

Judge CASSEL. Very few have been quashed on that ground.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The alternative plan as to summing up is followed in your field general courts, where a specially qualified member of the court gives advice to the court in closed session. Between the two plans, what are the disadvantages?

Judge CASSEL. There is a good deal to be said on both sides of the question. There are advantages and disadvantages in both alternatives. My opinion on the whole inclines toward the judge advocate rather than the special member of the court. A judge advocate is the recognized representative of the judge advocate general with a definite position laid down in the rules of procedure to which all of the other members of the court are required to conform. On the whole, I think it is an advantage that the actual finding and sentence should be those of regimental officers in close touch with regimental life, and acquainted with the actual conditions of fighting. The actual findings and sentence should be theirs, and on points of law they should be guided by a legal expert.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. One proposal that has been given us is to make the specially qualified member to be president of the court. What would your thought about that be, being that you prefer a judge advocate?

Judge CASSEL. I lean to the judge advocate, though I think it would be better if you have a special officer, that he should be the president rather than an ordinary member.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In practice, has the need of a judge advocate on district courts-martial been shown?

Judge CASSEL. I think myself they should be appointed more frequently on district courts, especially on cases of fraud and for civil offenses. I find that the class of courts-martial which most frequently have to be quashed on legal grounds are district courts-martial for the trial of cases of stealing, fraud, and civil offenses where there is no judge advocate. On that ground I am personally in favor of more frequently appointing judge advocates on district courts. I do not think you want them on every district court, not for instance for ordinary cases of absence or drunkenness.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. What would be your views as to how it should be determined in that case; what cases they should be appointed on?

Judge CASSEL. By the convening authority acting on the advice of his staff officer or court-martial officer. It might be possible to lay down some general rules, such as that judge advocates should usually be appointed where the charge is one of fraud, stealing, or some other civil offense.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I noticed in attending some of your district courts, in the taking of the summary of evidence or record of evidence, the president does not require the recording of questions and answers that may have been proposed on cross-examination by the accused, which the president has ruled out as irrelevant or immaterial, so that no note is made of the fact that the question was asked and was ruled out. Is there any reason for the protection of the accused that a legal adviser should be present? Is any harm done the accused should there be carelessness in making up the record?

Judge CASSEL. That is not my ground for thinking it desirable to more frequently have a judge advocate on districts courts. The accused is entitled to have any question recorded to which objection is put.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. But if not represented by counsel, no note is made of it. That question is ruled out, perhaps properly ruled out, but no record is made of it.

Judge CASSEL. A record ought to be made.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY (reading next question):

"(5) The 'specially qualified member' of the British general field court-martial—

"(a) How many officers are required for this service?

"(b) From what department are they drawn?

"(c) By whom and how are they chosen?

"(d) Are they in practice required to have legal training?

"(e) What qualifications are required for this 'specially qualified member'?

"(f) How many courts can one such officer conveniently serve?

"(g) Do they in practice sum up the case as to the facts, as well as the law, like the judge advocate of the British general court-martial?

"(h) And, if so, how does such summing up (by an officer who is himself a member of the court and required to vote as one of the members) work in practice?

"(i) How much deference is in practice paid to the opinions of the 'specially qualified member' of the court?

"(k) How does the whole system actually work out?"

Judge CASSEL (reading):

"(5) It must be remembered that the 'specially qualified member' of a field general court-martial, generally called a court-martial officer, was unknown before, and in the early stages of the war. The first court-martial officers were appointed in August, 1915."

Lieut. Col. RIGBY (interrupting). Was there a general order or an army council letter?

Judge CASSEL. No; not abroad. At home there were army council instructions some time about September, 1916, but abroad it was done experimentally at first. I am not aware that there was any actual order issued on the subject abroad, but I will have inquiry made. The little green book which I am going to give you has in it a reference to court-martial officers abroad. [Continuing reading:]

"(a) The general rule was to have one attached to each corps of not more than two divisions. If there were more than two divisions in the corps, there were two court-martial officers. In addition, there were one or more court-martial officers attached to each army. There were special appointments for lines of communication."

There would be a court-martial officer at corps headquarters, with a corps consisting of not more than two divisions, but if there were more than two divisions in the corps, say three or four divisions, there would be two court-martial officers at corps headquarters. The court-martial officers attached to the army would be at the army headquarters. [Continuing reading:]

"(b) From the army as a whole, in which a great many barristers and solicitors were serving.

"(c) By the adjutant general's department, after inquiry as to applicant's ability and professional standing, on the recommendation of the judge advocate general or his deputy.

"(d) (e) They were all fully qualified barristers or solicitors.

"(f) The answer to this question depends on the local conditions and the length and difficulty of the cases; the number of officers referred to under (a) were found sufficient to do the work required."

That answers your question?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. These court-martial officers would be appointed to membership in several courts?

Judge CASSEL. He would go from one court to the other. One would suffice for a corps with not more than two divisions. [Continuing reading:]

"(g) They do not formally sum up (either on fact or law) in open court. When the court retires, they give their views both on law and on fact."

Lieut. Col. RIGBY (interrupting). That is not made part of the record.

Judge CASSEL. No; nothing which is not in open court is recorded. [Continuing reading:]

"(h) This does not arise.

"(i) On questions of law their opinion was generally followed; on a question of fact it had considerable weight, though not so much as on questions of law. But the obligation of secrecy imposed by the oath renders it difficult to speak with certainty.

"(k) It is considered that the system has in the emergency worked extremely well. There is, however, a difference of opinion as to whether it would not be better that the court-martial officer should sit either as judge advocate or president, and not merely as a member of the court."

In that I have not expressed a view as to which is best. The balance of my opinion is, as I have already stated, on the whole in favor of judge advocate.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY (reading from questionnaire):

"(6) What have been the results in practice of British Army Orders 110 and 111 of March 17, 1917 (analagous to General Orders Nos. 7 and 94, U. S. War Department, 1918)?

"(a) Upon what considerations were these British orders based?

"(b) Just how far has their application been extended?

"(c) How uniformly have the recommendations of the judge advocate general been followed by confirming authorities?"

Judge CASSEL (reading):

"(6) Before Army Orders 110 and 111 of 1917, in the United Kingdom the judge advocate at the trial forwarded the proceedings of general courts-martial direct to the judge advocate general.

"Under the new system introduced by Army Orders 110 and 111 the proceedings in such cases, instead of going direct to the judge advocate general, pass to him through the convening officer who adds his remarks and recommendations.

"(1) If confirmation by His Majesty was required the judge advocate general transmitted them to the secretary of state for submission to His Majesty.

"(2) If confirmation by His Majesty was not required the judge advocate general returned them with his advice to the convening officer (who was also the confirming officer)."

That was explaining what the position was before. Now [continuing reading]:

"(a) The object of the Army Orders 110 and 111 was to insure that the judge advocate general in reviewing the proceedings, and the secretary of state for war or air tendering the advice to His Majesty should have before them the views of the convening officer.

"(b) The orders extend to all general courts-martial held in the United Kingdom.

"(c) The recommendations of the judge advocate general as to confirmation have almost invariably been followed."

I can not remember a case as to confirmation that has not been followed since I have been judge advocate general.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Referring to (b), is there any analagous order for field general courts-martial—field courts at home?

Judge CASSEL. No; it only deals with general courts-martial at home.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. We will come to quashing later on. So, in speaking of uniformity in following your recommendations in confirmation, you mean now recommendations where you have advised confirmation and they have followed you?

Judge CASSEL. Yes; confirmation or nonconfirmation. I have been trying to recall a case where they have not acted on my advice as to confirmation or nonconfirmation. With regard to quashing, I will come to that later.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY (reading questionnaire):

"(7) To what relative extent during the war has the British Army made use of its several disciplinary agencies?

"(a) General courts-martial.

"(b) District courts-martial.

"(c) Field general courts-martial.

"(d) Summary disciplinary punishment.

"(8) What about the length and severity of sentences during the war in the British Army for—

"(a) Military offenses?

"(b) Civil offenses?

"(9) Statistics for the purposes of throwing light on all of the above questions, and others that may arise, as to—

"(a) Total number of court-martial trials, segregated among the different courts—

"1. General courts-martial.

"2. District courts-martial.

"3. Field general courts-martial.

"(b) Annual percentage of court-martial trial to total strength.

"(c) Number (and percentage) of acquittals.

"(d) Number and percentage of cases reviewed, disapproved, modified, etc., and by what agencies (that is, confirming authority or recommendation of judge advocate general, or otherwise).

"(10) Number and length of sentences for principal military offenses and principal civil offenses; collated and tabulated separately.

"(11) Number of sentences reduced in severity by the confirming authority or on the recommendation of the judge advocate general—

"1. Classified according to the character of the offense; and

"2. With figures as to the aggregate of such reductions and the percentage of such reductions to the number and length of original sentences.

"3. Classified to show separately those so reduced on recommendation of judge advocate general.

"(12) Death sentences, classified as to—

"1. Offenses for which imposed.

"2. How many carried into execution.

"3. Statistics as to commutation.

"(13) Detention barracks statistics: Number of such sentences, classified as to—

"1. Character of offense and length of sentence.

"2. Figures as to the restoration of men to duty.

"3. Number of men who, having served detention barracks sentences, were again sentenced to the barracks, or to severer punishment.

"(14) Summary disciplinary punishment statistics.

"1. Number and character of sentences and for what kind of offenses.

"2. Number of men so sentenced a second, third, or more times.

"3. Number of men so sentenced who were thereafter sentenced to the detention barracks or to severer punishment."

Judge CASSEL. These paragraphs have been grouped together in my answer:

"(7), (8), (9), (10), (11), (12), (13), and (14). All the statistics available in this office have been supplied. Possibly the adjutant general's department may be able to supply further information as to strength of army, detention barracks, and punishments. There are no statistics of summary punishments by commanding officers, no record of such punishments reaches the office of the judge advocate general."

Our statistics, as I told you before, during the war were improvised. When I was appointed I found no statistics at all, so our statistics previous to my appointment have been made up subsequently and they are not perhaps as full as we should like them to be.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. These statistics have been given to me in confidence and not to be submitted to Congress.

Judge CASSEL. When submitted to the British House of Commons, I may be able to authorize you to submit them to Congress. I have communicated with the secretary of state. But I would not be justified in authorizing you to disclose to Congress what has not yet been made public in our own house.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Any conclusions we may draw from them—percentages—that you may tell me. For instance, I have in mind the percentage of your acquittals before the war, which I gather from examination of the statistics. Can you tell me anything in this form—percentage of disapprovals and acquittals for the purpose of comparison with our own in times of peace. I could make up a little table of conclusions which I have drawn and submit it to you.

Judge CASSEL. I will tell you what I will do. Submit it to me and I will submit it to the secretary of state, but I do not think I would feel justified in authorizing the furnishing of statistics for Congress without having his special permission. If you will submit it to me, I will submit it to him, and if he assents I will let you know.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The next question is (15).

"(15) Average length of time elapsed between the offense and final disposition of cases:

"1. By summary disciplinary punishment.

"2. By courts-martial (classified so far as possible by the different kinds of courts-martial).

"3. Final confirmation or other disposition."

Judge CASSEL (reading):

"(15) 1. An offense would ordinarily be disposed of by summary punishment on the day following arrest, but there may be delay owing to a number of causes, such as difficulty in obtaining evidence, reference to superior authority, etc."

I will take an ordinary case—a soldier commits an offense this afternoon, say he strikes a superior officer; he is put in the guardhouse this afternoon; as a rule, he goes before the commanding officer the next morning. First, before the company commander, as I explained. The company commander if he disposes of it summarily would probably do so that morning. If it goes to the commanding officer, he would also ordinarily deal with it this morning; that is to say, the morning after the arrest. There may, however, be a number of reasons which cause delay. [Continuing reading:]

"(2) The times which would elapse between commission of the offense and confirmation of the sentence in the case of each of the four kinds of courts-martial if every step were taken as promptly as possible and no difficulty arose in connection with the obtaining of evidence or otherwise are shown in the table annexed to the evidence of the judge advocate general before the committee on courts-martial. (Appendix III, p. 27, copy attached.)

"(3) No statistics as to the actual times which elapse have been kept."

That table (referring to book). you need not regard as confidential, not treated as confidential. The table appears marked in blue pencil, pages 30 and 31. That table really does give you the information, each step, every hand through which a case passes.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. What particularly interests us is how long it takes you to run a case through, taking into consideration the delay that you do meet?

Judge CASSEL. During the war, delays have frequently arisen particularly due to the exigencies of the war, the fact that officers had to be constantly on the move or had other more important work to be attended to. District courts-martial do not cause much undue delay in peace time. District courts-martial ought to be tried within a fortnight or thereabouts and from inquiries which I have made I think that before the war that period was not, as a rule, much exceeded. In the case of general courts-martial there is more delay. Three weeks, I think, is the minimum time that is requisite, but especially during the war there have been very long delays.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Have you had experience during the war with delays in a case going to 30 or 40 days?

Judge CASSEL. More than that, I am sorry to say—even three, four, or five months in exceptional cases. I have made it a rule to send in to the war office all the cases where I think there has been undue delay. The war office investigate the reasons for the delay, and if it is not satisfactorily accounted for, the officers concerned hear of it. We have constantly had this question of delay under our notice during the war. If an accused is convicted, the general rule is that the court should take the delay into account in awarding sentence, but that only holds redresses to hardships where there is a conviction or if the sentence admits of it. If the accused is acquitted or if the proceedings are not confirmed, or if a light sentence is awarded, it is not possible to remedy the hardship in that way. We are meeting that by a larger use of "open arrest," and more frequently releasing the accused without prejudice to his trial; in fact by more closely approximating to the practice in civil courts in granting bail to the accused.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. That is a thing we have been interested in and have kept statistics for several years.

Judge CASSEL. I think it is very desirable, and when we get back to normal conditions we shall certainly keep statistics ourselves as to the periods of arrest awaiting trial.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. How long have you found it necessary to get a case through this office?

Judge CASSEL. In cases before trial we make it a point to try and send the papers back on the same day; if not possible, within 48 hours after their receipt. That is the standard we work up to; to have them passed the same day. Any case involving liberty is given precedence and is dealt with first; I mean if the liberty of the soldier would be affected by the papers being kept here. In advising before trial, we return papers generally on the same day; always within 48 hours. Of course, in reviewing proceedings it takes longer. The accused is already under sentence of a competent court. Where we particularly make a point of expedition is where the liberty of the accused is affected, and he is not yet proven guilty. Of course, asking for additional evidence and additional information may take time.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In reviewing cases, how long does it take?

Judge CASSEL. We do it as quickly as we can—with proceedings coming from all parts of the world; all cases are reviewed here except cases tried in India. There is a separate judge advocate general for India. Sometimes we get a very large number per week; during the war as many as 2,000 in a week, and we have only a very small staff of officers to deal with them. Considerable delay sometimes takes place before proceedings reach us. This was especially the case with proceedings from France while heavy fighting was going on.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Cases of death sentences, how are they handled? In what way?

Judge CASSEL. In the United Kingdom not a single death sentence on an officer or soldier in the British Army has been carried out during the war, either for any strictly military or for any civil offense.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. For strictly military offenses?

Judge CASSEL. By court-martial, none at all in the United Kingdom as regards officers or soldiers of the British Army. Abroad the death sentence has to be confirmed by the commander in chief. Before he confirms the proceedings he has the advice of the deputy judge advocate general, who can always refer to the judge advocate general at home if there is any question of doubt or difficulty. In addition to that the commander in chief has before him the recommendations of the commanding officer of the accused, the brigade commander, the divisional commander, the corps commander, and the army commander as to whether the requirements of discipline are such that the sentence should be carried out or whether clemency should be extended.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Are these recommendations required?

Judge CASSEL. There is no law which requires it, but it is a universal practice. Orders have been issued that these recommendations should be forwarded to the commander in chief. He has these before him, and on legal questions he has the advice of the judge advocate general or his deputy. If there is any question as to a man's mind having been affected, through shell shock or in any other way, a special examination by medical board is ordered.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Is the advice of the deputy judge advocate general in written form or review?

Judge CASSEL. It takes the form of submitting the proceedings to the adjutant general to place them before the commander in chief, and if the deputy judge advocate general considers that they are in order, his minute would merely be submitted to the adjutant general to place before the commander in chief. If he has grounds for thinking that the proceedings should not be confirmed, he would give his reasons. The position of the deputy judge advocate general is laid down in our field service regulations. What I have been telling you is the practice.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. One other question: Do you review proceedings afterwards in cases where the death sentences are carried into effect abroad?

Judge CASSEL. I do; but I have had no occasion to send in any minute where the sentence has actually been carried out.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Where the accused is at home you review a death case before it is carried into execution?

Judge CASSEL. Not a single death sentence has been awarded at home.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Have not had a death sentence at home?

Judge CASSEL. No. If one had been awarded I would have advised on it before confirmation.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Your recommendation is required?

Judge CASSEL. No death sentence at home would be carried into effect unless personally reviewed by me.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Have you any thought as to the advisability of having all death sentences awarded abroad being reviewed at home before being carried into effect?

Judge CASSEL. There are very strong reasons against it. Suppose in Mesopotamia a man is sentenced to death, it would take too long a time to send the case back to England. The essence of a death penalty is to carry it out quickly. The quick carrying out of a death penalty has great value, especially with native troops, to prevent mutiny from spreading. If every death sentence had to be sent back to London it would defeat some of the principal objects which necessitate the awarding of a death sentence. I should certainly say it would be a great disadvantage if the case were sent to London. If you are to have death sentences at all, the commander in chief in the field should be able to say whether it should be carried out. He has always the legal advice of the deputy judge advocate general, who in turn can refer to the judge advocate general at home in any case of doubt or difficulty.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In practice how quickly was a death sentence carried into effect abroad?

...the ... part of ...
...the ... of ...
...the ... of ...

...the ... of ...
...the ... of ...

...the ... of ...

...the ... of ...

Judge CASSEL. I make no distinction. If the evidence is sufficient to warrant the death penalty, it must ultimately rest with the commander in chief whether the sentence should be carried out or clemency exercised, and if it is carried out it should be done without undue delay.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY (reading next question):

"(16) Results of suspension of sentence, under suspended-sentence act—statistics and general working of the system."

Judge CASSEL (reading from his answers):

"The working of the suspension of sentences acts has been most beneficial during war time and the acts have fulfilled the purposes for which they were originally passed. They have given many a soldier the opportunity of redeeming his character by bravery in the field. They have prevented men whose services were required in the field from being detailed for long periods in prison. A feature in connection with these acts which has given rise to some dissatisfaction is the fact that, while soldiers who had committed comparatively slight offenses and who had not had their sentences suspended had to serve those sentences, others who had been guilty of graver crimes and who had their punishments suspended escaped all punishment. The adjutant general's department would be able to supply further information on this question."

This question of suspension really does not come under my department, but under the jurisdiction of the adjutant general. It has been a most beneficial act; it has saved many soldiers from imprisonment. There is one weak point.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Have you any suggestions as to any changes?

Judge CASSEL. Any suggestion I would make is this: The court might award forfeiture of pay, and imprisonment in addition. The imprisonment could then be alone suspended. The forfeiture of pay would still stand, so that the soldier would not be altogether without punishment.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY (reading from questionnaire):

"(17) An opportunity (such as was afforded Col. Dunn, of the United States Army in 1911) of visiting detention barracks and other military prisons, and statistics as to the length of sentences and character of offenses for which the prisoners are undergoing confinement.

"(18) An opportunity to visit and make stenographic reports of the proceedings of courts-martial of the different classes—G. C. M., D. C. M., F. G. C. M.—and to procure complete copies of records of actual proceedings (with the names of the defendants omitted, of fictitious names substituted if desirable), such as has been furnished by the French authorities."

Judge CASSEL (reading):

"(17) (18) This is being arranged. Further statistics as to sentences can possibly be supplied by the adjutant general's department of the war office and the authorities at the detention barracks."

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. We had an opportunity to visit Aldershot and got information there. Very interesting. We plan to visit those at Perth and Stirling to-morrow; Gen. Childs has made arrangements for that. [Reading from questionnaire:]

"(19) Information as to the working in practice of the judge advocate general's office; e. g., the number of cases passing through the office per annum, or per month, during the war; the length of time required for the disposition of a case in the office; the routine method of handling cases; the number of cases recommended to be disapproved; number of recommendations to clemency; figures showing how uniformly recommendations of the judge advocate general have been followed by military authorities:

"(a) of disapproval, wholly or partially, on legal grounds.

"(b) of clemency."

Judge CASSEL (reading):

"(19) The work of the judge advocate general's office consists in giving advice as to courts-martial both under the army act and the air force act and legal advice on other questions. The work so far as it relates to courts-martial falls under four main heads: (i) Advice before trial; (ii) advice before confirmation; (iii) review after confirmation; (iv) review upon appeal.

"As to (i): In the United Kingdom the convening officer before ordering trial submits the charge sheet and summary of evidence in all general courts-martial cases and in all district courts-martial cases where fraud is alleged or where he desires advice. Similar duties are discharged in relation to courts-martial abroad by the deputy of the judge advocate general.

"In such cases advice is given as to whether the evidence is admissible and sufficient to support the charge and what kind of further evidence, if any, is required, and also whether the charge is correctly drawn and what amendments and additional charges, if any, are necessary.

"The judge advocate general himself does not deal with cases 'before trial' except to lay down general principles, and it is a cardinal rule of the office that the officers who deal with cases at that stage should not deal with them 'after trial.'"

I am very particular on that point.

"As to (ii): In the United Kingdom after trial and before confirmation the proceedings are forwarded to the judge advocate general in all general court-martial cases and in any other cases where the confirming authority desires advice.

"These are dealt with by the judge advocate general with the help of legal assistants. Abroad similar duties are discharged by the deputy of the judge advocate general who refers to the judge advocate general in London in cases of doubt or difficulty.

"If the proceedings require confirmation by His Majesty, the judge advocate general forwards them to the secretary of state with his opinion embodied in a minute, and the secretary of state submits them to His Majesty. In other cases he returns them to the confirming authority with his advice.

"As to (iii): All proceedings held in any part of the world except India are after confirmation forwarded to the office of the judge advocate general in London for review and custody. For India there is a separate judge advocate general who reviews proceedings of trials held there.

"In all cases sent to the judge advocate general's office the proceedings are carefully reviewed to see whether the charges are properly framed, whether the evidence justifies a conviction and whether the proceedings are otherwise legally in order. If the proceedings are in order they are filed. If not, they are forwarded to the secretary of state for war or the secretary of state for air or the adjutant general, or other proper authority, advising that the proceedings should be quashed or that such other action should be taken as the circumstances of the case may require.

"As to (iv): It is open to any person convicted by court-martial to petition His Majesty or the army council, or air council at any time against his conviction or sentence, and persons frequently petition more than once. Such petitions if they involve any legal questions are referred to the judge advocate general and are again considered by him in the light of any further facts or arguments brought forward by the petitioner. Advice is then given to the secretary of state for war or air as to whether there is any ground for interference.

"It must be clearly understood that the judge advocate general is concerned only with the legality of convictions and sentences. He is not concerned with recommendations as to clemency though he occasionally calls attention to sentences if they appear unusually severe. His recommendations upon the legal aspect of cases are almost invariably accepted and acted upon. The only cases in which this has not been done is when the attorney general has been consulted and has taken a different view.

"Cases for advice before trial and before confirmation are, so far as circumstances permit, dealt with and dispatched from the judge advocate general's office within 48 hours of receipt unless they raise some point of exceptional difficulty.

"Cases for final review after confirmation are dealt with as rapidly as possible; the delay is seldom more than three days.

"As the statistics show, nearly a quarter of a million convictions were reviewed in the office during the war."

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. How many are in your staff?

Judge CASSEL. My staff now consists of three civilians, including the registrar and nine attached officers. I had more before the armistice.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. How many then?

Judge CASSEL. During the heavy work of the war, I had 14 or 15 attached officers.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. With that small staff were you able to write reviews, opinions on a case, or did you simply make a minute?

Judge CASSEL. I am guided by circumstances. I should send in a full minute if I thought it necessary. We have to distribute the work. But we have been rather shorthanded.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Do you have fixed rules to distribute the work among sections of the staff?

Judge CASSEL. I have certain officers who deal with cases before trial and nothing else, unless it so happens that they have not work to occupy their whole time, and one of the other groups is pressed. I then let them review cases after trial, but never the same case on which they advised before trial. No hard and fast rules—certain general rules. During the press of work, everybody has to help everybody else.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Do you divide the cases as to character?

Judge CASSEL. I have one officer who reviews district courts after confirmation. General courts I always review personally. All appeals I deal with personally. Field general courts-martial when they come here are dealt with by two officers, specially detailed. There have been a very large number of field general courts-martial during the war. All these have been reviewed once abroad by either the deputy judge advocate general or some other under him, so that they do not get so full a review here as a district or general court-martial.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Through how many hands would a case go?

Judge CASSEL. Very many hands. Take the case of a district court-martial—first of all the officer who advises the confirming officer, and the confirming officer himself, who must deal with it. After confirmation it is reviewed in my office. Afterwards it is sent by me to the adjutant general's branch, and two or three officers there read it. Some cases go before the attorney general as well as myself. In the case of a general court-martial every possible care is taken before it is finally submitted to His Majesty. Field courts are reviewed first abroad, then come here. If some point of military custom or practice is involved, I sometimes send over to the adjutant general to obtain the views of the military authorities on the military aspect of the case. Any doubt as to whether the accused was mentally responsible, I refer to the war office for a medical report—to have a medical board examine the accused concerned.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. A case coming into your office then would be reviewed by some officer in the office and he, if he saw any reason for submitting it to you—any irregularity—is his action final? Do you generally follow it?

Judge CASSEL. If he submits it to me I deal with it personally.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Does he sign it in your name?

Judge CASSEL. No; I sign personally. If an officer does not submit the proceedings of a court-martial he has reviewed to me personally, he initials them. So I know who is responsible if any question arises. In such cases he simply initials, and the proceedings go to the files. [Continuing reading:]

"In addition to court-martial work of the army and royal air force, the judge advocate general deals with other legal work, e. g., the answering of questions which arise in practice upon the construction of the army act, King's regulations, the pay warrant and other regulations and orders, the drafting of orders and new regulations, military courts upon prisoners of war, etc."

Lieut. Col. RIGBY (reading questionnaire):

"(20) Forms of actions, recommendations or memoranda used by the judge advocate general in the disposition of cases."

Judge CASSEL. Twenty and twenty-one I deal with together.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY (reading next question):

"(21) Information as to the finality of action of the judge advocate general:

"(a) From the forms used in practice.

"(b) In theory (that is to say, showing how far in practice the power of the judge advocate general is final and judicial, and how far it is, either in theory or practice, recommendatory and subject to the action of higher authority).

"(c) Information of the exact nature of the change some years ago in the status, tenure, and power of the judge advocate general."

Judge CASSEL (reading):

"(20) and (21) (a) The attached specimen minutes show the forms used by the judge advocate general in advising the secretary of state both before and after trial.

"(b) In theory his duties are advisory only. In practice his advice is almost invariably acted upon; the only cases where this is not done is when the attorney general is consulted and he differs from the judge advocate general.

"(c) Before the reconstitution of the office in 1905, on the appointment of Sir Thomas Milvain, the judge advocate general had been the direct responsible adviser of the Crown. He submitted direct to the sovereign those court-martial cases which required the confirmation of the sovereign as head of the army. To insure the responsibility of the judge advocate general to Parliament for the advice which he gave to the Crown, he was generally a member of Parliament and privy councillor, and the office was political, changing with successive governments."

Really a member of the Government.

"Since 1905 the office has not been political, the appointment has been permanent, and the judge advocate general has not been a member of Parliament or of the Government. He does not submit his advice direct to the sovereign, but through the secretary of state, of war, or air. The judge advocate general now devotes his whole time to the work of his office. Formerly the ordinary work of the office was left to the deputy judge advocate general, and it was only in cases of exceptional difficulty or if questions were raised in Parliament or advice had to be given to the sovereign that the judge advocate general acted personally."

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In what form was that change made in 1905?

Judge CASSEL. There has been no change of law affected by act of Parliament. It was a change of practice. There was a slight change in the wording of the patent.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Change in the reconstitution of the cabinet; was not a part of the cabinet?

Judge CASSEL. The change was not affected by any statutory enactment or order in council, but merely by a change of practice and in the wording of the letters patent. Sir Thomas Milvain, my predecessor, ceased to be a member of Parliament after he became judge advocate general. He, in practice, carried out the decision of the cabinet as to how the work of the office was to be carried on in future.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The cabinet determined that the work thereof should be carried on in a different way. Before that had not his predecessors been members of the cabinet?

Judge CASSEL. They had generally been members of the privy council, but not of the cabinet.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Do I get it correctly then—the change was made largely in the reconstitution of the cabinet at that time?

Judge CASSEL. No. Previously the judge advocate general had generally, though not always, been a member of Parliament and a privy councillor and he had advised the sovereign directly. After the change he ceased to be a member of Parliament or privy councillor and his position became more analogous to that of a civil servant. He ceased to advise the sovereign directly, but did so through the secretary of state for war. After this change more of the work was done by the judge advocate general personally and less through his deputy. His whole time was given to the work after the change.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In an informal way—practice since adhered to?

Judge CASSEL. Yes.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. May I ask your opinion on that—would you advise changing back to the old form? Before that your office really had executive powers that it does not have now?

Judge CASSEL. No.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. He became responsible under the old system so that in effect his advice was really an order, finally determined in effect all what should be done with a case?

Judge CASSEL. Even before the change the functions of the judge advocate general were not executive. They were advisory, though his advice was almost invariably followed. I have an opinion of Lord Coleridge and Sir George Jessel given in 1873, in which they advised that the judge advocate general had no judicial or executive functions, but that his functions were advisory only.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Prior to 1905 was there the same practice that now exists to refer to another officer the opinions and advice of the judge advocate general?

Judge CASSEL. That practice has mainly arisen during the present war.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. What are your thoughts as to reverting to the old system?

Judge CASSEL. On the whole I do not think it would be an advantage to revert to the old system. I think it is useful that the judge advocate general should give his whole time to the work of the office rather than that it should be left largely to his deputy as formerly. The secretary of state should be responsible to Parliament for the whole work of his department, including courts-martial. The position of the judge advocate general now is really that of legal adviser to the secretary of state for war.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY (reading questionnaire) :

"(23) Information as to the routine followed by confirming authorities in acting upon records of trials by courts-martial—

"(a) General courts-martial.

"(b) District courts-martial.

"(c) Field courts-martial.

"(24) Through whose hands do such records pass; and upon the recommendation of what, if any, legal officer does the confirming authority act?"

Judge CASSEL (reading) :

"(23) and (24) This is shown by the table (Appendix III) annexed to the judge advocate general's evidence before the court-martial committee and to his memorandum.

"The confirming or reviewing authority acts upon the advice of a staff officer specially skilled in military law or a legal adviser specially attached to the formation which he commands."

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. He is the legal adviser, but the final decision rests with the secretary of state for war?

Judge CASSEL. Yes.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In the case analogous, the attorney general and solicitor general are final advisers. Whose advice would be followed if there was a conflict?

Judge CASSEL. That of the attorney and solicitor general; they are advisers to the Government as a whole.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Any reason for making it a question in Parliament if the secretary of state for war overrules the opinion of the judge advocate general?

Judge CASSEL. None at all. I should not consider myself aggrieved by the fact that they had overruled me. I accept the position that they are advisers to the Government as a whole. I am happy to say the number of cases where they have differed are few.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY (reading questionnaire) :

"(25) Also to have interviews (in the presence of a stenographer, such as have been furnished us in France) with commanding generals in the field, or those who have commanded in the field during the war, for the purpose of procuring their opinions upon the disciplinary or other value of some points wherein the British court-martial and disciplinary practice varies from ours (and from the French). notably—

"(a) Summary disciplinary punishment.

"(b) Field punishment.

"(c) Lack of power to return acquittals for reconsideration.

"(d) Lack of power on revision to increase the severity of a sentence.

"(e) Power of the commanding general in Great Britain and the United States (as contradistinguished from the French practice) to review the proceedings of courts-martial).

"(f) Detailed instructions, as prescribed in the British regulations, as to the method of conducting the preliminary examination.

"(g) The value of a legal officer as an impartial judicial officer on the court-martial (judge advocate, as in the British G. C. M., or 'specially qualified member' of the court, as in F. G. C. M.)

"(h) Other questions that may be presented.

"(26) The advice and opinion of the British judge advocate general and his assistants and of military lawyers familiar with court-martial practice, as to these questions, and also particularly as to—

"(a) The value of counsel for the accused in court-martial trials and the method of choosing counsel for the accused."

Judge CASSEL (reading) :

"(25) Interviews with generals who have commanded in the field will be arranged through the adjutant general's department at the war office.

"(26) The views of the judge advocate general upon the questions asked here and in No. 25 are as follows:

"(a) The presence of counsel (including an officer acting as such) to represent the accused is a great safeguard and of great assistance to the accused and the court, provided such counsel is competent. An accused person has the right to be represented by a barrister or solicitor or an officer selected by him. Nevertheless the cases where the accused have not been represented have been frequent. The judge advocate general considers that whenever practicable the assistance of a suitable officer should be offered to the accused for his defense without in any way derogating from the right of the accused to be represented by the counsel or officer of his own choice."

Qualified officers as counsel are of great value if competent. An incompetent counsel may do a great deal of harm.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The matter of counsel is one of the problems with us. What do you think of the suggestion of having public defenders or military defenders appointed?

Judge CASSEL. Not civilian advocates. But it would be desirable to insure so far as practicable that suitable officers should be available for the purpose.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I see the French have a plan by which the president of the court has the right, the same as a civil judge, to appoint counsel for the defense, and it is the duty of the "advocate" to appear without charge to defend if directed to do so, just as if he were assigned by a civil judge.

Judge CASSEL. A civil advocate?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes; that seems to be under their laws, part of the duties—to obey the orders of a military judge.

Judge CASSEL. That would only apply while troops were in the United Kingdom.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Under the French system, in armies in the interior.

Judge CASSEL. If you did that while troops were at home, you would be less likely to have suitable officers for the defense abroad and on active service. Even in peace time a large proportion of the British Army is always outside of the United Kingdom—nearly one-half. I am inclined to think that it will be possible to secure a sufficient number of properly qualified officers. I think this is better than assigning civil advocates.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Do you think that a counsel is of real assistance to the accused?

Judge CASSEL. On the whole they are, particularly in cases of any complication. Very often a soldier is rather nervous when he goes before a court-martial. He has not the facility of bringing out circumstances in his own favor in the same way as a counsel or qualified officer would.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. When represented by an officer, in practice what is the rank of the officer representing him?

Judge CASSEL. There is no rule or requirement as to rank. Anything from a second lieutenant upward. On the whole I think that the court gives due weight to arguments irrespective of rank if the counsel is competent.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Do you find from your records and general experience in the office, in a general way, which way lieutenants stand out; is there any disadvantage in defending before a court because of the fact that he is a junior officer? Does he fail to bring out the case for the accused because of any timidity on account of his low rank?

Judge CASSEL. No; I do not think so. It has been suggested in Parliament here that the counsel for the accused should always be of high rank, of the same rank as the president of the court.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The same suggestion has been made with us. There has been criticism in some quarters of appointing lieutenants to defend the accused.

Judge CASSEL. It all depends on the competency and legal knowledge of the lieutenant. But that has been suggested in Parliament. If a junior officer is well qualified to conduct the defense, I do not think that his rank is sufficient reason for excluding him. [Reading balance of paragraph 25a:]

"To increase the number of officers competent to defend the accused, legal instruction among officers should be improved and a list of qualified officers kept.

"(b) (25a) The British system of summary disciplinary punishment works well in the hands of good commanding officers."

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Limiting to good commanding officers. Taking the army as a whole, as they are, does it work well?

Judge CASSEL. Yes.

"(c) (25b) There is very strong opposition to field punishment on the ground that it is degrading and carried out with varying degrees of severity. No effective punishment in substitution has been suggested. Some form of punishment other than a long term of imprisonment is essential on active service."

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Have you found one?

Judge CASSEL. We have not.

"(d) (25cd) Lack of the powers referred to does lead to miscarriages of justice and makes it more difficult to secure uniformity of sentences through the action of the confirming authority. On the other hand the exercise of such powers would lead to undermine confidence in the independence of the court and might lead to the belief that convictions or unduly severe sentences had been secured through pressure exercised by the confirming authority."

In the old days the confirming officer could send back an acquittal to the court or could send back a sentence in order to have it increased in severity. We should never go back to that. It would be considered as giving an opportunity to confirming officers to press for convictions or severe sentences unduly.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. We still have it as you used to have it.

Judge CASSEL. I do not think we shall ever go back to it.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. You don't know of any disadvantage that arose from practice that made that change?

Judge CASSEL. As I pointed out, our present system makes it more difficult to secure uniformity of sentences, as the confirming officer can only mitigate sentences downward. If a sentence is ridiculously light, he can do nothing. If the next soldier gets a heavier sentence, under less grave circumstances, he is very discontented, but the confirming officer can do nothing. At the same time I don't think that we shall ever go back to the old system, as it is desirable to avoid any pressure whatever being brought to bear on the court to make sentences more severe.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Is there any reason why all sentences should not be announced in open court?

Judge CASSEL. I think that they should not all be announced in open court, because it would be in many cases a disadvantage to the accused himself. Take the case of officers. Sentences of cashiering or dismissal announced in open court, to which the press are entitled to attend, and not yet confirmed by His Majesty. Suppose His Majesty does not subsequently confirm, the position of that officer is so affected by the public announcement that it is very difficult for him to regain his old prestige and position. Therefore, I think in all cases where sentence is dismissal from the service or more severe, it would be a great disadvantage to the accused to announce the sentence in open court. It would place him in a very embarrassing position during the interval while the approval of His Majesty was being obtained. I see no objection to communicating the substance in a sealed envelope.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Would you advise to change the regulations so as to direct telling him by way of the sealed envelope?

Judge CASSEL. Yes; I should tell the accused himself—the accused should be informed in a sealed envelope, being told at the same time that the sentence is still subject to confirmation. I further think that in those cases where the sentence is less severe than dismissal from the service in the case of officers, and in the case of soldiers where it does not involve loss of liberty, it should be announced in open court. In the case of light sentences I should have the announcement made in open court and the accused at once released from arrest. With us, the sentence can not be increased in severity on confirmation.

"(e) (25e) The retention of the power to 'review' appears desirable. It is a great safeguard against illegal or improper convictions and excessive sentences and helps to secure uniformity of sentences. It operates automatically without any special application which is necessary in the case of an appeal. The reviewing authority is responsible for the maintenance of discipline in the force he commands which is essential for the safety of his troops and the success of their operations. He can judge better than anyone else what the requirements of discipline are and how far exemplary punishments are necessary. On legal questions he is guided by skilled advisers.

"(f) (25f) Detailed instructions, though perhaps unnecessary in a small, fully trained army, appear to be very desirable when military law has to be administered by officers who only hold temporary commissions or who have not had a lengthy training.

"(g) (25g) Their value has been fully proved; but they should sit either as judge advocates or presidents, rather than as members only.

"(h) (25h) The judge advocate general considers that it is of great importance that legal education among officers in the army should be improved. Officers should be encouraged to qualify in law by additional pay or other advantages. So far as practicable only officers who had, after examination, been certified as fit to do so should sit as presidents or members of courts-martial or act as prosecutors or defenders of the accused. A part of the legal instruction of officers should consist in attending the hearing of cases in the civil courts."

Lieut. Col. RIGBY (reading questionnaire) :

"(27) Clemency: (a) Before the armistice and (b) since the armistice—methods adopted: Routine of procedure; theory upon which it proceeds; statistics showing results."

Judge CASSEL (reading):

Lieut. Col. RIGBY (reading questionnaire):

"(28) Any literature on the general subject—motions in Parliament, reports of any parliamentary commissions; and any debates, magazine or newspaper articles, etc., of value."

Judge CASSEL (reading):

"(28) There was a debate in the House of Commons on March 3, 1919, copy of Hansard attached, as a result of which the present court-martial committee was appointed. This committee is at present considering its report. The debate is reported in Hansard, columns 100–183, copy herewith.

"A committee on punishments on active service was appointed after the South African War and reported in 1904. Copy report herewith.

"A royal commission on courts-martial was appointed in 1868 and made two reports, dated July 24, 1868, and May 14, 1869, respectively.

"A select committee appointed to examine into the mutiny act in 1878 and reported in the same year.

"A number of articles have appeared in a weekly publication called John Bull, edited by Mr. Bottomley, M. P., and there are also articles in the Contemporary Review of March, 1919, and Blackwood's Magazine of June, 1919."

LONDON, June 14, 1919.

Memorandum for the judge advocate general, Great Britain:

On behalf of the United States Government, the following information concerning the administration of military law in the British Armies is respectfully requested, so far as it may be practicable to furnish it:

1. Results of preliminary investigation and trial and how the investigation is actually carried on in practice.

2. How far convening authorities are, in fact, governed by recommendations of law officers as to ordering cases to trial.

3. Summary disciplinary punishment.

4. Information and statistics relating to the impartial judge advocate attached to a general court-martial (and to what extent in practice assigned to district courts-martial).

5. The "specially qualified member" of the British field general court-martial—

(a) How many officers are required for this service?

(b) From what department are they drawn?

(c) By whom and how are they chosen?

(d) Are they in practice required to have legal training?

(e) What qualifications are required for this "specially qualified member"?

(f) How many courts can one such officer conveniently serve?

(g) Do they in practice sum up the case as to the facts, as well as the law, like the judge advocate of the British G. C. M.?

(h) And, if so, how does such summing up (by an officer who is himself a member of the court and required to vote as one of the members) work in practice?

(i) How much deference is in practice paid to the opinions of the "specially qualified member" of the court?

(k) How does the whole system actually work out?

6. What have been the results in practice of British Army orders 110 and 111, of March 17, 1917 (analogous to General Orders, Nos. 7 and 84, United States War Department, 1918)—

(a) Upon what considerations were these British orders based?

(b) Just how far has their application been extended?

(c) How uniformly have the recommendations of the judge advocate general been followed by confirming authorities?

7. To what relative extent during the war has the British Army made use of its several disciplinary agencies?

- (a) General courts-martial.
- (b) District courts-martial.
- (c) Field general courts-martial.
- (d) Summary disciplinary punishment.

8. What about the length and severity of sentences during the war in the British Army for—

- (a) Military offenses?
- (b) Civil offenses?

9. Statistics for the purposes of throwing light on all of the above questions, and others that may arise, as to:

(a) Total number of court-martial trials; segregated among the different courts—

- (1) General courts-martial.
- (2) District courts-martial.
- (3) Field general courts-martial.

(b) Annual percentage of court-martial trials to total strength.

(c) Number (and percentage) of acquittals.

(d) Number and percentage of cases reviewed, disapproved, modified, etc., and by what agencies (that is, confirming authority or recommendation of judge advocate general or otherwise).

10. Number and length of sentences for principal military offenses and principal civil offenses, collated and tabulated separately.

11. Number of sentences reduced in severity by the confirming authority or on the recommendation of the judge advocate general—

(1) Classified according to the character of the offense; and,

(2) With figures as to the aggregate of such reductions and the percentage of such reductions to the number and length of original sentences.

(3) Classified to show separately those so reduced on recommendation of judge advocate general.

12. Death sentences, classified as to—

- (1) Offenses for which imposed.
- (2) How many carried into execution.
- (3) Statistics as to commutation.

13. Detention barracks statistics: Number of such sentences, classified as to—

(1) Character of offense and length of sentence.

(2) Figures as to the restoration of men to duty.

(3) Number of men who, having served detention barracks sentences, were again sentenced to the barracks, or to severer punishment.

14. Summary disciplinary punishment statistics:

(1) Number and character of sentences and for what kind of offenses.

(2) Number of men so sentenced a second, third, or more times.

(3) Number of men so sentenced, who were thereafter sentenced to the detention barracks, or to severer punishment.

15. Average length of time elapsed between the offense and final disposition of cases:

(1) By summary disciplinary punishment.

(2) By courts-martial (classified, so far as possible, by the different kinds of courts-martial).

(3) Final confirmation or other disposition.

16. Results of suspension of sentence, under suspended sentence act; statistics and general working of the system.

17. An opportunity (such as was afforded Col. Dunn of the United States Army in 1911) of visiting detention barracks and other military prisons; and statistics as to the length of sentences and character of offenses for which the prisoners are undergoing confinement.

18. An opportunity to visit and take stenographic reports of the proceedings of courts-martial of the different classes—G. C. M., D. C. M., F. G. C. M.—and to procure complete copies of records of actual proceedings (with the names of the defendants omitted, or fictitious names substituted if desirable), such as has been furnished us by the French authorities.

19. Information as to the working in practice of the judge advocate general's office; e. g., the number of cases passing through the office per annum, or per month, during the war; the length of time required for the disposition of a case in the office; the routine method of handling cases; the number of cases recommended to be disapproved; number of recommendations to clemency; figures showing how uniformly recommendations of the judge advocate general have been followed by military authorities;

- (a) of disapproval, wholly or partially, on legal grounds,
- (b) of clemency.

20. Forms of actions, recommendations or memoranda used by the judge advocate general in the disposition of cases.

21. Information as to the finality of action of the judge advocate general.

(a) From the forms used in practice.

(b) In theory (that is to say, showing how far in practice the power of the judge advocate general is final and judicial; and how far it is, either in theory or practice, recommendatory and subject to the action of higher authority).

(c) Information of the exact nature of the change, some years ago, in the status, tenure, and power of the judge advocate general.

22. Information showing the routine disposition or action upon recommendations of the judge advocate general, by the secretary of state for war, army council, chief of staff, or other authorities.

23. Information as to the routine followed by confirming authorities in acting upon records of trials by courts-martial—

- (a) General courts-martial.
- (b) District courts-martial.
- (c) Field general courts-martial.

24. Through whose hands do such records pass; and upon the recommendation of what, if any, legal officer does the confirming authority act?

25. Also to have interviews (in the presence of a stenographer, such as have been furnished us in France), with commanding generals in the field, or those who have commanded in the field during the war, for the purpose of procuring their opinions upon the disciplinary, or other, value of some points wherein the British court-martial and disciplinary practice varies from ours (and from the French), notably—

- (a) Summary disciplinary punishment.
- (b) Field punishment.
- (c) Lack of power to return acquittals for reconsideration.
- (d) Lack of power on revision to increase the severity of a sentence.
- (e) Power of the commanding general in Great Britain and the United States (as contradistinguished from the French practice) to review the proceedings of courts-martial.

(f) Detailed instructions, as prescribed in the British regulations, as to the method of conducting the preliminary examination.

(g) The value of a legal officer as an impartial judicial officer on the court-martial (Judge Advocate, as in British G. C. M., or "Specially qualified member" of the court, as in F. G. C. M.).

(h) Other questions that may be presented.

26. The advice and opinion of the British judge advocate general and his assistants, and of military lawyers familiar with court-martial practice, as to these questions, and also particularly as to—

(a) The value of counsel for the accused in court-martial trials; and the method of choosing counsel for the accused.

27. Clemency: (a) Before the armistice, and (b) since the armistice; methods adopted; routine of procedure; theory upon which it proceeds; statistics showing results.

28. Any literature on the general subject; motions in Parliament; reports of any parliamentary commissions; and any debates, magazine, or newspaper articles, etc., of value.

WILLIAM C. RIGBY,
Lieutenant Colonel, Judge Advocate.

---

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS RAISED IN THE MEMORANDUM DATED JUNE 14, 1919, OF LIEUT COL. W. C. RIGBY, JUDGE ADVOCATE, CHIEF OF SPECIAL MISSION, U. S.
ARMY.

(1) (a) No statistics are available as to the number of charges investigated by commanding officers, nor as to the proportion of such charges which are dismissed, remanded for trial by court-martial, or dealt with summarily.

(b) In the case of a N. C. O. or man, a charge is first investigated by his company (battery or squadron) commander, whose powers of punishment are very restricted. (See King's Regulations 501.) If the company commander can not, or thinks that he ought not to, deal with the case, he sends it on to be dealt with by the commanding officer. The latter after the charge has been read to the accused hears the witnesses. The accused may cross-examine the witnesses called against him, and may make a statement (or give evidence) in his defense, and may call witnesses. If the accused so required, the evidence must be taken on oath; but it is only very rarely that such a request is preferred. The accused has no right to be represented by counsel or by an officer before the commanding officer.

The commanding officer then takes one of the following courses:

(I) He dismisses the charge;

(II) He disposes of it summarily, if he can do so without reference to superior authority. The charges that may be so disposed of are set out in King's Regulations 487. The punishments which a commanding officer can award to a N. C. O. or man are set out in section 46 (2) of the army act and King's Regulations 493.

(III) If he thinks that the case is one which may be dealt with summarily, but he is not empowered to so deal with it without sanction from superior authority, he refers it to such authority. He will then either be authorized to deal with it summarily, or be directed to send it to a court-martial.

(IV) He adjourns it in order that the evidence may be reduced to writing, with a view to a court-martial.

In every case where the award or finding involves a forfeiture of pay, and in every other case unless one of the minor punishments referred to in army act, section 46 (9) and King's Regulations 493 is awarded, the commanding officer must give the accused the option of being tried by court-martial (army act section 46 (6)).

Where a case is adjourned for the evidence to be reduced to writing, this is (as a rule) done by the adjutant, though any officer may be detailed by the commanding officer for the purpose. The witnesses attend again, give their evidence and are cross-examined as before; the accused makes any statement (or gives any evidence) that he wishes (after being cautioned that he need not say anything), and calls witnesses if he wishes. The whole evidence is taken down in writing by the adjutant or other officer detailed for the purpose. Each witness signs the evidence given by him, and the evidence so taken is called the "Summary of evidence." The evidence is generally not taken on oath, and the accused has no right to be represented. This, however, has sometimes been allowed in cases of exceptional difficulty or importance.

The commanding officer then reconsiders the written record, and finally decides whether to apply for a court-martial or whether to dispose of the case summarily (assuming that he has power to do so and that the accused has not elected trial by court-martial).

If he decides upon a court-martial, he prepares and signs a charge sheet and formal application for trial, which he forwards with the summary of evidence and conduct sheets of the accused to an officer having power to convene a court-martial for the trial of the accused. That officer considers whether the summary of evidence justifies trial, and, if he comes to the conclusion that it does, makes an order accordingly.

In the case of an officer, the case goes at once to the commanding officer without the intervention of the company (battery or squadron) commander. The commanding officer has no power to punish an officer. He can either dismiss the case or apply for a court-martial, or (if the accused officer is below field rank) can refer the case to a superior officer, not under the rank of general. The latter, in the case of an officer below field rank, can award certain minor punishments or can direct trial by court-martial. (See army act, sec. 46A.) Where a court-martial is decided upon, a written summary of evidence must be taken as in the case of a soldier; if the accused so requires otherwise, a summary may be dispensed with, and an "abstract" of the evidence given to the accused.

(2) On legal points, e. g., as to whether the acts alleged constitute an offense against the army act or whether the evidence is sufficient to justify trial, the advice of a qualified officer is taken; but questions of difficulty would generally be referred to the judge advocate general or his deputy, whose advice is almost invariably taken.

(3) A commanding officer can not punish an officer or warrant officer. A general officer holding a general court-martial warrant and a general officer commanding in chief in the field and any officer (not under the rank of major general) appointed by him or by the Army council can award the following to an officer below field rank:

Forfeiture of seniority of rank (subject to right of accused to elect trial by general court-martial).

Severe reprimand or reprimand (without such option to elect).

This power was only conferred in 1919 by the annual army act of that year.

A N. C. O. may be severely reprimanded, reprimanded, or admonished; also, if holding "acting" or "lance" rank, may be ordered to revert to his permanent rank.

In the case of privates, the "summary" punishments awardable by a commanding officer are:

Detention up to 28 days.

For drunkenness, a fine not exceeding 10/—, in addition to or without detention.

Authorized deductions from pay (e. g. to make good damage done, or loss of arms and kit).

On active service only, field punishment up to 28 days.

On active service only (in addition to or without any other punishment), forfeiture of ordinary pay up to 28 days.

The following minor punishments may also be awarded:

Confinement to barracks up to 14 days.

Extra guards or picquets.

Admonition (see King's Regulations, 493).

If the commanding officer is not of field rank his powers in respect of detention are limited to 7 days (except in cases of absence).

A company (squadron or battery) commander can award normally—

Confinement to barracks up to 7 days.

Extra guards and picquets.

Fines for drunkenness.

He can deal with cases of absence which entail automatic forfeiture of pay.

His awards can be reduced by the commanding officer, and if he has not three years' service his powers may be limited by the commanding officer. (See King's Regulations, 501.)

A commanding officer must give a soldier the option of claiming a trial by court-martial in every case where the award or finding involves a forfeiture of pay, and in every other case unless he awards one of the "minor" punishments. (Army act, sec. 56 (8).)

Subject to this option, a commanding officer can in law deal summarily with any offense if he considers that his powers of punishment are sufficient; but King's Regulations (487) require him to first refer certain of the more serious offenses to superior authority for directions as to whether they shall be dealt with summarily or whether a court-martial shall be held.

(4) A judge advocate is always appointed for a general court-martial; he is generally an officer with legal knowledge, but may be a civilian.

The appointment in the United Kingdom is made by the judge advocate general; abroad, by the general officer commanding in chief. A judge advocate is at present only rarely appointed in the case of district courts-martial. No statistics are available.

(5) It must be remembered that the "specially qualified member" of a field general court-martial, generally called a court-martial officer, was unknown before and in the early stages of the war. The first court-martial officers were appointed in August, 1915.

(a) The general rule was to have one attached to each corps of not more than two divisions. If there were more than two divisions there were two court-martial officers. In addition, there were one or more court-martial officers attached to each army. There were special appointments for line of communication.

(b) From the army as a whole, in which a great many barristers and solicitors were serving.

(c) By the adjutant general's department, after inquiry as to applicant's ability and professional standing, on the recommendation of the judge advocate general or his deputy.

(d) (c) They were all fully qualified barristers or solicitors.

(f) The answer to this question depends on the local conditions and the length and difficulty of the cases; the number of officers referred to under (a) were found sufficient to do the work required.

(g) They do not formally sum up (either on fact or law) in open court. When the court retires they give their views both on law and on fact.

(h) This does not arise.

(i) On questions of law their opinion was generally followed; on a question of fact it had considerable weight, though not so much as on questions of law. But the obligation of secrecy imposed by the oath renders it difficult to speak with certainty.

(k) It is considered that the system has in the emergency worked extremely well. There is, however, a difference of opinion as to whether it would not be better that the court-martial officer should sit either as judge advocate or president, and not merely as a member of the court.

(6) Before Army Orders 110 and 111 of 1917, in the United Kingdom, the judge advocate at the trial forwarded the proceedings of general courts-martial direct to the judge advocate general.

Under the new system introduced by Army Orders 110 and 111 the proceedings in such cases, instead of going direct to the judge advocate general, pass to him through the convening officer, who adds his remarks and recommendations.

(I) If confirmation by His Majesty was required, the judge advocate general transmitted them to the secretary of state for submission to His Majesty.

(II) If confirmation by His Majesty was not required, the judge advocate general returned them with his advice to the convening officer (who was also the confirming officer).

(a) The object of the Army Orders 110 and 111 was to insure that the judge advocate general in reviewing the proceedings and the secretary of state for war or air tendering advice to His Majesty should have before them the views of the convening officer.

(b) The orders extend to all general courts-martial held in the United Kingdom.

(c) The recommendations of the judge advocate general as to confirmation have almost invariably been followed.

(7), (8), (9), (10), (11), (12), (13), and (14). All the statistics available in this office have been supplied. Possibly the adjutant general's department may be able to supply further information as to strength of army, detention barracks, and punishments. There are no statistics of summary punishments by commanding officers; no record of such punishments reaches the office of the judge advocate general.

(15) (1) An offense would ordinarily be disposed of by summary punishment on the day following arrest, but there may be delay, owing to a number of causes, such as difficulty in obtaining evidence, reference to superior authority, etc.

(2) The times which would elapse between commission of the offense and confirmation of the sentence in the case of each of the four kinds of courts-martial if every step were taken as promptly as possible and no difficulty arose in connection with the obtaining of evidence or otherwise are shown in the table annexed to the evidence of the judge advocate general before the committee on courts-martial. Appendix III, page 27, copy attached. No statistics as to the actual times which elapse have been kept.

(16) The working of the suspension of sentences acts has been most beneficial during war time and the acts have fulfilled the purposes for which they were originally passed. They have given many a soldier the opportunity of redeeming his character by bravery in the field. They have prevented men whose services were required in the field from being detained for a long period in prison. A feature in connection with these acts which has given rise to some dissatisfaction is the fact that, while soldiers who had committed comparatively slight offences and who had not had their sentences suspended had to serve those sentences, others who had been guilty of graver crimes and who had their punishments suspended escaped all punishment. The adjutant general's department would be able to supply further information on this question.

(17) (18) This is being arranged. Further statistics as to sentences can possibly be supplied by the adjutant general's department of the war office and the authorities at the detention barracks.

(19) The work of the judge advocate general's office consists in giving advice as to courts-martial both under the army act and the air force act and legal advice on other questions. The work so far as it relates to courts-martial falls under four main heads:

- (I) Advice before trial.
- (II) Advice before confirmation.
- (III) Review after confirmation.
- (IV) Review upon appeal.

As to (I) in the United Kingdom the convening officer before ordering trial submits the charge sheet and summary of evidence in all general courts-martial cases and in all district court-martial cases where fraud is alleged or where he desires advice. Similar duties are discharged in relation to courts-martial abroad by the deputy of the judge advocate general.

In such cases advice is given as to whether the evidence is admissible and sufficient to support the charge and what kind of further evidence (if any) is required, and also whether the charge is correctly drawn and what amendments and additional charges (if any) are necessary.

The judge advocate general himself does not deal with cases "before trial" except to lay down general principles and it is a cardinal rule of the office that the officers who deal with cases at that stage should not also deal with them "after trial."

As to (II) in the United Kingdom after trial and before confirmation the proceedings are forwarded to the judge advocate general in all general court-martial cases and in any other cases where the confirming authority desires advice.

These are dealt with by the judge advocate general with the help of legal assistants. Abroad similar duties are discharged by the deputy of the judge advocate general who refers to the judge advocate general in London in cases of doubt or difficulty.

If the proceedings require confirmation by His Majesty, the judge advocate general forwards them to the secretary of state with his opinion embodied in a minute, and the secretary of state submits them to His Majesty.

In other cases he returns them to the confirming authority with his advice.

As to (III). All proceedings held in any part of the world except India are, after confirmation, forwarded to the Office of the Judge Advocate General in London for review and custody. For India there is a separate Judge Advocate General who reviews proceedings of trial held there.

In all cases sent to the Judge Advocate General's Office the proceedings are carefully reviewed to see whether the charges are properly framed, whether the evidence justifies a conviction, and whether the proceedings are otherwise legally in order. If the proceedings are in order they are filed. If not, they are forwarded to the Secretary of State for War or the Secretary of State for Air or the Adjutant General, or other proper authority, advising that the proceedings should be quashed or that such other action should be taken as the circumstances of the case may require.

As to (IV). It is open to any person convicted by court-martial to petition His Majesty, or the Army Council, or Air Council at any time against his conviction or sentence, and persons frequently petition more than once. Such petitions, if they involve any legal questions, are referred to the Judge Advocate General and are again considered by him in the light of any further facts or arguments brought forward by the petitioner. Advice is then given to the Secretary of State for War or Air as to whether there is any ground for interference.

It must be clearly understood that the Judge Advocate General is concerned only with the legality of convictions and sentences. He is not concerned with recommendations to clemency, though he occasionally calls attention to sentences if they appear unusually severe. His recommendations upon legal aspect of cases are almost invariably accepted and acted upon. The only cases in which this has not been done is when the attorney general has been consulted and has taken a different view.

Cases for advice before trial and before confirmation are, so far as circumstances permit, dealt with and dispatched from the Judge Advocate General's Office within 48 hours of receipt unless they raise some point of exceptional difficulty.

Cases for final review after confirmation are dealt with as rapidly as possible; the delay is seldom more than three days.

As the statistics show, nearly a quarter of a million convictions were reviewed in the office during the war.

(b) In addition to court-martial work of the Army and Royal Air Force the Judge Advocate General deals with other legal work, e. g., the answering of questions which arise in practice upon the construction of the Army Act,

King's Regulations, the Pay Warrant, and other regulations and orders, the drafting of orders and new regulations; military courts upon prisoners of war, etc.

(20) See 21.

(21) (a) The attached specimen minutes show the forms used by the Judge Advocate General in advising the Secretary of State, both before and after trial.

(b) In theory his duties are advisory only. In practice his advice is almost invariably acted upon. The only cases where this is not done is when the attorney general is consulted and he differs from the Judge Advocate General.

(c) Before the reconstitution of the office in 1905, on the appointment of Sir Thomas Milvain, the judge advocate general had been the direct responsible adviser of the Crown. He submitted direct to the sovereign these court-martial cases which required the confirmation of the sovereign as head of the army. To insure the responsibility of the judge advocate general to Parliament for the advice which he gave to the Crown he was generally a member of Parliament and privy councillor, and the office was political, changing with successive Governments. Since 1905 the office has not been political, the appointment has been permanent, and the judge advocate general has not been a member of Parliament or of the Government. He does not submit his advice direct to the sovereign, but through the secretary of state for war or air. The judge advocate general now devotes his whole time to the work of his office. Formerly the ordinary work of the office was left to the deputy judge advocate general, and it was only in cases of exceptional difficulty or if questions were raised in Parliament or advice had to be given to the sovereign that the judge advocate general acted personally.

(23) (24) This is shown by the table (Appendix III) annexed to the judge advocate general's evidence before the court-martial committee and to this memorandum.

The confirming or reviewing authority acts upon the advice of a staff officer specially skilled in military law or a legal adviser specially attached to the formation which he commands.

(25) Interviews with generals who have commanded in the field will be arranged through the Adjutant General's Department at the War Office.

(26) The views of the judge advocate general upon the questions asked here and in No. 25 are as follows:

(a) The presence of counsel (including an officer acting as such) to represent the accused is a great safeguard and of great assistance to the accused and the court, provided such counsel is competent. An accused person has the right to be represented by a barrister or solicitor or an officer selected by him. Nevertheless, the cases where the accused have not been represented have been frequent. The judge advocate general considers that whenever practicable the assistance of a suitable officer should be offered to the accused for his defense without in any way derogating from the right of the accused to be represented by the counsel or officer of his own choice. To increase the number of officers competent to defend the accused, legal instruction among officers should be improved and a list of qualified officers kept.

(b) (25a) The British system of summary disciplinary punishment works well in the hands of good commanding officers.

(c) (25b) There is very strong opposition to field punishment on the ground that it is degrading and carried out with varying degrees of severity. No effective punishment in substitution has been suggested. Some form of punishment other than a long term of imprisonment is essential on active service.

(d) (25c d) Lack of the powers referred to does lead to miscarriages of justice and makes it more difficult to secure uniformity of sentences through the action of the confirming authority. On the other hand, the exercise of such powers would lead to undermine confidence in the independence of the court and might lead to the belief that convictions or unduly severe sentences had been secured through pressure exercised by the confirming authority.

(e) (25e). The retention of the power to "review" appears desirable. It is a great safeguard against illegal or improper convictions and excessive sentences and helps to secure uniformity of sentences. It operates automatically without any special application, which is necessary in the case of an appeal. The reviewing authority is responsible for the maintenance of discipline in the force he commands, which is essential for the safety of his troops and the success of their operations. He can judge better than anyone else what the requirements of discipline are, and how far exemplary punishments are necessary. On legal questions he is guided by skilled advisers.

(f) (25f). Detailed instructions, though perhaps unnecessary in a small, fully trained army, appear to be very desirable when military law has to be administered by officers who only hold temporary commissions or who have not had a lengthy training.

(g) (25g). Their value has been fully proved; but they should sit either as judge advocates or presidents, rather than as members only.

(h) (25h). The judge advocate general considers that it is of great importance that legal education among officers in the army should be improved. Officers should be encouraged to qualify in law by additional pay or other advantages. So far as practicable, only officers who had after examination been certified as fit to do so should sit as president or members of courts-martial or act as prosecutors or defenders of the accused. A part of the legal instruction of officers should consist in attending the hearing of cases in the civil courts.

(27) The adjutant general's department of the War Office should be applied to for the information.

(28) There was a debate in the House of Commons on March 3, 1919, copy of Hansard attached as a result of which the present court-martial committee was appointed. This committee is at present considering its report. The debate is reported in Hansard, columns 100-183. Copy herewith.

A committee on punishments on active service was appointed after the South African War and reported in 1904. Copy report herewith.

A royal commission on courts-martial was appointed in 1868 and made two reports, dated July 24, 1868, and May 14, 1869, respectively.

A select committee appointed to examine into the mutiny act in 1878 and reported in the same year.

INTERVIEW BETWEEN LIEUT. COL. WILLIAM C. RIGBY, JUDGE ADVOCATE, AND CAPT. EASTWOOD, COURT-MARTIAL OFFICER, DISTRICT OF LONDON, JULY 17, 1919, AT LONDON.

Capt. EASTWOOD. With us, a man is probably put under arrest by some sergeant or noncommissioned officer. Brought before the platoon commander and investigated, and he may give a light punishment, such as extra drills. In any event he listens to the evidence and decides it is not his case. "You will have to go before the company commander." He goes before the company commander. Investigation is made there; this officer usually has a little more experience; he may decide to send the case to the commanding officer. There the investigation is thorough, and a summary of the evidence is made [indicating papers]. Here are two papers which just came in. That case comes up to us here with the application for trial. If a case goes further than the commanding officer it must be accompanied by a summary of the evidence and application for trial.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Does the accused and counsel see the summary?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Before the trial. [Indicating a paper.] Here is an application: An officer comes in one night to his mess, and this sergeant goes up to this officer and says, "You are drunk." He is reported. A most insubordinate thing. The officer put him under arrest for saying it. He was remanded for summary, and summary of evidence was taken. The application came in here on this Army form [B-116, Army form]. They have submitted this case here. I look into the case. I come to the conclusion that there was enough evidence to justify trial; three or four men are prepared to swear that he was drunk. They said so in the summary. The accused in the summary also gets other witnesses to come forward to say, "You fellows are drunk." I took the case down to the general. I told him I believed that discipline ran a certain amount of risk by a court-martial, and I thought it better that the commanding officer deal with the case, which he can do. The general did not like that, and he said, "No." The general then had the commanding officer up and wanted to know all about this sergeant. A most insubordinate fellow and troublesome among the soldiers. That being the case, the general said, "I want to try him."

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. What general do you mean?

Capt. EASTWOOD. General officer commanding the London district.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In striking out evidence you do it on the face of the summary itself?

Capt. EASTWOOD. I always do. When I submit it back I say, "The evidence as amended in blue pencil is irrelevant."

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In doing that, in just what official capacity are you acting?

Capt. EASTWOOD. I am court-martial officer to the London command. I am last word in advising on court-martial matters in the command.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. You are legal adviser to the commanding general?

Capt. EASTWOOD. I am.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. You are what we call a staff judge advocate?

Capt. EASTWOOD. As far as legal matters are concerned. I can appeal to the judge advocate general, as in this case I did [indicating paper]. As far as discipline is concerned, I can take advantage of the field regulations, or when in doubt go to a superior officer. I can go to the war office.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. You have access to the judge advocate general and to the war office?

Capt. EASTWOOD. I sign for the commanding general. Everything that we do we do in the name of the general officer commanding. Here are some proceedings [explained and showed Lieut. Col. Rigby how he signed papers as "Captain for Commanding General"]. The papers in all cases are eventually forwarded to the judge advocate general.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Court-martial officer to the command—by whom is that appointment made?

Capt. EASTWOOD. By the war office on the application of the general commanding.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Not on recommendation of the judge advocate general?

Capt. EASTWOOD. No. As a matter of fact it is a new office. In the old army, done by the staff captain to the brigade. Of course with the growth of the army, and the lowering of discipline most pronounced, court-martials increased until we were getting several a day during the war. The war office then appointed these court-martial officers with extra duty pay—12 shillings per day. It is not a very princely amount. They are mostly all barristers. The court-martial commission, which has just published its report, has recommended the permanent retention of that office, making it worth while. They want to have court-martial officers; they will have to do something for them, as you can not get good men with low pay. It is not worth while to work here all of my life at the regular army pay. So I believe that they are going to make this office a permanent one, and give the officers substantial pay. That is why I am staying on. It is very interesting work.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Are court-martial officers required to be barristers?

Capt. EASTWOOD. No. Young Lockwood here—he is a solicitor.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In what method was the office established?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Done on a war office letter. Originally this command was given one court-martial officer, some two and one-half years ago. War office ordered some time ago that all offenses committed in London by officers passing through on leave would be tried in London, because the witnesses are here. That is not strictly followed out here. We are very good friends with all the commands and we arranged it very much between ourselves. If we have a case here where the witnesses are in Ireland, we write to the Ireland command and transfer the case.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. That authority appointing court-martial officers is a war office letter?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Yes. All the correspondence we have with the war office is addressed to the secretary of the war office. Before they appointed court-martial officers he was confidential aid to the staff captain. He attended to all court-martial work and the staff captain signed.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Are there any regulations that the summary be referred to the court-martial officer, or is that just practice?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Just practice—no regulation. But the commands shove that work on the court-martial officer.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Does the commanding general in practice usually follow the advice of the court-martial officer?

Capt. EASTWOOD. In 99 per cent of the cases.

(Capt. Eastwood referred to one case where there was a difficulty with a brigade commander.)

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. What did you have to do?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Wrote back, "The general officer commanding insists that this evidence will not be used."

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In order to do that, did you have to consult the general?

Capt. EASTWOOD. In those cases, I usually do. [Referred here to Army Council Instructions, called A. C. I.—A. C. I., 1852.] These instructions are issued monthly and govern all cases. They correspond to general orders.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. They correspond to our general orders and bulletins. The general orders deal with more important matters and the bulletins with small matters.

Capt. EASTWOOD. We are precisely the same. Any letter that comes from the war office is a war-office letter and some of them lay down advice how to deal with this or that.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Has A. C. I. 1852 been supplemented in any way?

Capt. EASTWOOD. No; except to this extent: That is appendix 1 that has been amended to 2. [Furnished a copy of these instructions.] I think that you will find that you will get a lot of information out of the report of the court-martial committee. [Capt. Eastwood here showed Lieut. Col. Rigby another paper which the reporter could not see or understand what it was about.] I did not want to try this fellow [indicating paper]. They wanted to try him for two things, using insubordinate language and with an alternative charge—conduct to the prejudice of good order. I did not like it. The general wanted it for disciplinary reasons, so I said I will safeguard myself and I sent a letter to the judge advocate general, requesting that I be advised as to whether the evidence will substantiate the charges.

(Other papers were referred to and the conversation was lost.)

The army act states that any witness who knows anything about the case should be called at the summary of evidence to tell what he has to say. It goes on to say that any witness called by the prosecution at the summary must be tendered to the accused for cross-examination. If I were conducting the summary I would say, "So-and-so knows something about the case." Strictly speaking, they would have to call him as a witness for the prosecution. If any of the evidence is in favor of the defense, they would have to offer him for cross-examination to the defense. If they did not do that the defense would call him as their own witnesses. [Referring to another paper.] That is what happened in this case. It came back from the judge advocate general, and on that he says we are bound to act.

As a matter of fact, if I think that I know better than they do, I go around privately and see one of them. Sometimes that gets it through, but not always. It is a little bit difficult at times. This Fratel case that you heard the other day. It has caused a lot of feeling here. The evidence does not state plainly that the individuals died as a result of the accused's treatment. Probably might have died. That is entirely a matter for the court. The most that this fellow can get is two years at hard labor. There is a case that I think the judge advocate general has misinterpreted. He disagreed with me and recommended the trial of the case on the charges I read the other day, and all the fellow can get is two years.

The judge advocate general is simply advisory and his advice is given in an advisory capacity.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY (referring to letter in Capt. Eastwood's hand). This letter is signed by Col. MacGeagh, not signed in his name of the judge advocate general. Any reason for that practice?

Capt. EASTWOOD. These fellows are all lawyers. Custom is always sign your own opinion.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The man whose opinion it is is responsible?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Yes and no. But the department will stand by him, but on the other hand it is a custom they have there. A good system.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Not signed by Judge Cassel himself?

Capt. EASTWOOD. No. As a matter of fact, I have kept a close watch on what they do. That is the situation here. This case [referring to papers] we sent back. Granted the application for trial. Either sent back for charge sheets to be redrawn, resubmitted, signed by commanding officer, or to be tried by general court-martial. Generally signed by a staff officer to the general for the general.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. General officer does not personally sign?

Capt. EASTWOOD. No.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. You advise the general here whether it should be tried by general court-martial?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Right.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Whether it should not be proceeded with at all?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Right. In cases that affect discipline. I always talk to him. May be some situation that he should know about. This case [referring to papers] which does not affect discipline, I do not bother him at all. Not until confirmed. Send it back for trial and when it is to be confirmed, I do like this [showing a memorandum]; I make a note "confirm." I go through the case to see if it is in legal order. I usually see if it is all right and then mark "confirm."

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Does the general sign or initial?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Signs.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. He is required to sign personally?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Oh, yes. [Referring to another case on his desk.] This man had 120 days' service. Guilty, found guilty of absence for 14 days; all right; confirm.

The case I check up. This is a simple one. These are the notes I make [indicating] to advise the general. [Reading:] Two and three-fourths years' service, clean sheet, no convictions by court-martial.

Next thing I look for is the convening order. Check the names of the court to see if it agrees with the order.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. You do not have a list, a check slip that we use. It is very simple to check by—to compare the authority for the convening order, the detail of the court, whether the court was sworn, etc. We require that the check sheet be attached to the record.

Capt. EASTWOOD. I just look at that. Just look at the charge sheet to see whether it is in order. This one [indicating] is leaving his post. Make a note of it to tell the general. Leaving his post while on duty as a sentry. "Guilty." Pleaded "guilty"; sentenced to 21 days' detention. Has a clean sheet. Accused: "I have nothing to say." Declined to cross-examine. One other thing: Is there enough in the summary of evidence to justify the charge? Done that when the application for trial came in. He pleaded guilty, and there is enough in the summary of evidence to justify the charge. Sentence, 21 days' detention: "confirm." Very simple when a man pleads guilty. When we get one here where the man pleads not guilty I have to go through the evidence.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Twenty-one days was within the power of the commanding officer?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Quite right. We got into the way of sending them to court-martial, because the sentences were very heavy during the war. They are away down now.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. As a matter of habit?

Capt. EASTWOOD. A sentry leaving his post is a serious offense and ought to go to a court-martial.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. And the court only gives him 21 days?

Capt. EASTWOOD. He has had 2½ years' service and a clean sheet. [Referring to another case.] Here is a case I will have to show to the general. Absent seven times since enlistment; one drunkenness, using insulting language, making improper remarks, wearing unauthorized wound stripe.

Here is another one [indicating]: Had five courts-martial and got field punishment and hard labor.

Here is a case where the court gave one year. We have got an army council or war-office letter—gotten out last month—in every case where a private soldier is sentenced to hard labor he shall be discharged from the army. I think it is a mistake myself. If he steals from his comrades he usually does hard labor. He may have been an excellent soldier, and the army loses him. Not every one that gets hard labor should be discharged.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In practice some of these sentences are being changed, are they not? Changing the order to detention?

Capt. EASTWOOD. That is what I am doing here. Have two cases here now—follows with a bad sheet. But I will have to let them go; they are worthless.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Impossible to make him a good soldier?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Mass of offenses against him. He is no good; let him go. In this case had had four courts-martial. [Capt. Eastwood read off the offenses, including absence, escape from custody, etc.] The court gave him two years—two years at hard labor. Domestic trouble was given as an excuse. To see if there is anything in it, got the commanding officer of the unit to investigate. Two years is too much, and I am going to advise the general to remit one year. In view of the fact that he is always going absent will have to discharge him.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In that case he will be discharged under this army letter?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Yes.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Tell me something about field punishment.

Capt. EASTWOOD. Field punishment amounts to this. A man is put generally on parade; this corresponds to being confined to the barracks. Also, he has an hour a day tied up. Tied to a wheel; tied to a fixed post; but tying the wheel is very rarely done. A man is not tied so it hurts him—merely tied there in any permanent place where he can be seen. It is a fine punishment. Makes a man think. There has always been a political outcry against it—a demand for the rights of man—that it was an inhuman business. An army on active service in camp behind the lines, what punishment can you give without taking the man away from the front? I saw a man doing 28 days for committing a nuisance in a tent. A lot of others sleeping in there; very insanitary, and you got to put a stop to it before it starts. This man got 28 days field punishment. Was confined to camp, took part in parades, and for one hour a day tied up to a post. A most excellent punishment. I think the men quite approve of it.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. There is no general feeling among the men against it?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Not a bit. The country would never stand for the lash. As a matter of fact, there are many offenses for which 12 strokes of the lash, properly given, would be the best punishment. But the country would never stand it. Nothing inhuman about this field punishment, merely degrading.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Does it leave any stigma on the man?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Not a bit.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Among his associates?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Not a bit. You will find a fellow with three sentences to field punishment quite a popular fellow around the barracks.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. If it is given by the commanding officer, that goes on his service record also?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Yes, sir. They have regimental sheets from which these small offenses are taken.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I notice that the French are different from you and from us—do not put a commanding officer's award on service record at all. Does a commanding officer's award go on the regimental sheets?

Capt. EASTWOOD. No; not unless it exceeds seven days. Since I left the battalion, it has been altered. I am not familiar.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Anything over seven days?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Yes.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Under seven days, it does not?

Capt. EASTWOOD. No; that goes on the conduct sheet.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Does the conduct sheet become part of the man's permanent record?

Capt. EASTWOOD. No; it is destroyed after three years.

(Capt. Eastwood showed his record book of executions of civilians in the Tower of London, etc., during the war, for treason, espionage, etc., remarking that many death sentences were commuted.)

(Lieut. Col. Rigby mentioned officers' cases.)

Capt. EASTWOOD. Most of our officers' cases are for drunkenness—severely reprimanded.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. You do not dismiss?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Yes; we do.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Did you take the summary for the Fratel general court?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Yes; we do as much as we can. In any offense which we think requires a punishment of more than two years we usually send to a general court.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Practically before the war you used the district court for almost everything?

Capt. EASTWOOD. District courts-martial can not give more than two years. Here is a case of stealing tried by general, and got three.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Can a district court award a discharge with ignominy?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Yes; under the army act.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. That is a matter within the jurisdiction of the court—discharge with ignominy?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Not unless it awards hard labor. You see it from these things here [indicating papers]. Two men tried for desertion under the fourtieth section of the army act—the court only gave two years. A district court might have given that. In the Fratel case—the most he can get is two years. The reason we are trying him by a general is that there is so much feeling we want to show the public that something was done.

Capt. EASTWOOD (making a casual remark). The more dignity you have in a court the more justice you get. [Referring to district courts attended by Lieut. Col. Rigby.] A private soldier has a man with fixed bayonet to guard him. An officer also has an officer to guard him.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The first man before the district court was between two guards with fixed bayonets. The guards over the second man had no fixed bayonets.

Capt. EASTWOOD. They were from different regiments—perhaps not the custom for one regiment.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Was the judge advocate at the Fratel trial an officer?

Capt. EASTWOOD. From the Judge Advocate General's Office. He is a civilian—not an officer. He is the Deputy Judge Advocate General. An important case, so we asked for him.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. What about counsel for the defense?

Capt. EASTWOOD. As a matter of fact, the prosecutor always helps. When I am taking a summary, I always help the accused and ask him if he knows anyone in England whom he wants as counsel. I ask, "Can I help you?" and sometimes they ask me if I can recommend anyone, and I do according to what they are able to pay. This man Fratel stated that he could pay 50 or 60 pounds, and I recommended his counsel. He is a very good counsel; lawyer here in London.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Let me ask you about the efficiency of the counsel for the accused?

Capt. EASTWOOD. As far as private soldiers are concerned, it is most difficult. It is a national problem. Situation now being brought before Parliament to provide public defenders.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Public military defenders?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Yes. Now, we generally get him an officer from his regiment.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Do you try to get an officer with any legal training?

Capt. EASTWOOD. It is very difficult, particularly in peace times. In war time you have people in the army from all walks of life, including many lawyers and solicitors. Generally speaking, the president of the court is very fair and the prosecutor will help. In fact, he must help.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In district courts, you do not use a judge advocate at all?

Capt. EASTWOOD. No.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Really is it then in the hands of the president and the prosecutor that he finds his protection, or does the counsel really assist?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Very often, if he is a good solicitor, and if he has handled many cases of soldiers. Near large barracks there is generally a little solicitor, nearly always the same one that appears for the men. I find them generally most tiresome; do not know the defense, and are apt to go into the case with very elaborate statements.

I think that the administering of justice by district courts is very good. My experience is that the president assists the men. "What have you to say?" he asks. "My wife is sick." "Have you a certificate?" "No." "You better get one." The president helps considerably. When a case comes up to us, we confirm the sentence, and let the man start serving his sentence. We then investigate if he has any grievance. One out of ten are true. We write to his unit for a report. Nearly all the grievances are, "I am suffering from shell shock."

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Where a man does not have civilian counsel to assist him, do you always offer him a counsel?

Capt. EASTWOOD. No; he has to ask.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. You do not offer?

Capt. EASTWOOD. No. The Canadians always ask. They are a perfect nuisance. Always asking for an officer to assist them. There was an officer in France who knew the procedure very well. Some men were being tried and they asked for this officer to defend them. He got them off. After that everybody wanted him and he got the job, and he got about one-half of them off. The brigadier said, "If you don't stop this I will have to transfer you." He was a most able defender and he got them off.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Do you make any effort when you do offer counsel, or a military officer—do you make any effort to get a man of higher rank than a lieutenant?

Capt. EASTWOOD. No. A lieutenant or a captain. It just depends on who is available.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Do you sometimes get a soldier?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Now we do. There are lots of barristers in the ranks.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Has there been any complaint at all that an officer of low rank, acting as defender, is embarrassed?

(Maj. DuPlat Taylor, court-martial officer of the London command, and "permanent" president of the district court-martial of that command, entered, and this last question was not answered. The major joined in the interview.)

Capt. EASTWOOD (to Maj. Taylor). You help them to bring everything out?

Maj. DUPLAT TAYLOR. I have sat as president of the court at about 1,500 trials and have not acquitted more than 5 or 6. They do not send a case to trial unless the evidence is clear against the man. The man has already been confronted with the witnesses and all the evidence taken down.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The man at the trial yesterday asked a question in cross-examining a witness, which you ruled to be immaterial, but you did not take that down for the record?

Maj. DUPLAT TAYLOR. We do not put anything in the record that is irrelevant.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. It struck me this way—the man asked a question of the witness and you ruled it out. It is not in the record and there is no opportunity for a review on it?

Maj. DUPLAT TAYLOR. No.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The fairness of the record depends almost wholly on the president?

Maj. DUPLAT TAYLOR. It says in the Rules of Procedure that the president is responsible for the taking down of a fair summary of what is given. If the man insisted on it, it would go in the record.

Col. RIGBY. But a man not represented by counsel will never insist. Your ruling was right, but a president with less experience—suppose it was a president with less experience; there might be injustice done. Is it not pretty dangerous?

Maj. DUPLAT TAYLOR. If a man has any line of defense at all, anything in his favor, I ask for it. On 1,500 cases since the war I have sat as president—permanent president of the district court.

Col. RIGBY. About how many acquittals?

Maj. DUPLAT TAYLOR. About five or six. I can not be absolutely certain. We have about 7 per cent of the cases quashed.

Col. RIGBY. Any estimate of the number of charges sent back for further investigation or directed not to be tried?

Maj. DUPLAT TAYLOR. Cases which we send back to settle summarily or order the men released go to about 12 per cent. Very low. The commanding officer does not submit the application for trial unless it is a clear case.

Col. RIGBY. One-third of 1 per cent acquittals with you, Major?

Maj. DUPLAT TAYLOR. I can not tell you the exact number.

Col. RIGBY. You must have had a great many alternative charges.

Maj. DUPLAT TAYLOR. Oh, yes; mostly fraud cases. Possibly one-half were found guilty of part of the charge. Most of the desertion cases were found guilty of absence.

Col. RIGBY. Have you a court of inquiry?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Yes.

Col. RIGBY. Is it used for this?

Capt. EASTWOOD. No. Court of inquiry held on absence of the accused.

Col. RIGBY. Really a trial in his absence.

Capt. EASTWOOD. Yes. No further evidence is required.

Col. RIGBY. Evidence only of the fact of his absence being unauthorized?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Yes, sir.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. You do not permit its finding to be admitted to prove desertion?

Capt. EASTWOOD. No.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. As evidence of the circumstances under which arrested?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Yes. Evidence is given on oath that the man was picked up by the police for fighting. In an ordinary case of desertion—man absent six months, the charge may be of desertion. A witness comes in and identifies the man in the jug. That is all you want to prove your case.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. As long as the absence is of six months, you infer desertion?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Yes. If the case is disputed, then you call witnesses, if the man has deserted for six months. But they never dispute absence.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. If the officer that arrested the man makes a report that the man was fighting, out of uniform, gave a fictitious name and fictitious organization, if he disputes these points?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Then we call witnesses. If he disputed it, it would not be accepted as prima facie evidence of the deed.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Another matter—proving intent to desert, desert permanently. A case where a police officer has certified that the man gave a fictitious name, claimed to belong to an outfit to which he did not belong, and the man says, "No; I give him my name, all right. I was on my way back to my outfit." In that case you will have to call witnesses?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Yes; almost sure. As a matter of fact, the rough rule in this command is to nearly always submit a charge for desertion. If a man is absent under a month and surrenders, then we alter the charge to absence without leave. If absent over a month and arrested, let the charge go and let the court hear it. It is a rough rule we have in the office.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. If he is gone over six months?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Yes; then he is charged with desertion. Must have had no intention to return. During the war they were sentenced to six months' detention for desertion. For absence without leave, two days for every day absent. Now, they get a day. Of course, they also lose pay while away.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. You ordinarily do not give a man a discharge for desertion?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Not during the war. But now, peace time, we do. During the war the Army council issued an order that no discharges with ignominy be confirmed without reference to them, for the reason that you would have men deliberately committing offenses to escape active service. An excellent reason. They got detention. If fit, they were sent to France in the next draft.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I would like to get a copy of the suspension-sentence act. That act worked well?

Capt. EASTWOOD. Oh, very well, indeed; very good.

Maj. DUPLAT TAYLOR (after a reference to not having the record made verbatim). Strictly speaking, every question and answer should go down, so that the confirming officer can tell whether the question is irrelevant or not, but I do not do it.

(Casual remarks by Capt. Eastwood.)

No orders are published announcing sentences. Read to the men on parade. The men stand at ease until you come to the findings; then they come to attention.

In the case of officers, we have them come up here. In the case of dismissal of an officer, he is called up here and I take off his badges of rank.

No reviews are made. Only make a few notes.

(Reporter: Army Field Clerk F. T. McEueny.)

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I also want to offer, unless it is already in this record, a copy of paragraph 1 of General Order 88 of the War Department, which was issued July 14 last, forbidding return of acquittals for reconsideration.

Senator WARREN. Senator Chamberlain, do you know whether that has been included in this record?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It has been mentioned, but not inserted in the record. That was an order of the President, directing that after a man had been acquitted there should be no direction for a retrial and no modification of the verdict of acquittal.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes; it is a rule of procedure issued under the thirty-eighth article of war, providing for rules of procedure, which are to be submitted annually to Congress.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In effect, it is an order not to retry a man who has once been acquitted.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. No; not that, because that never could be done; but an order not to direct the court to reconsider the case, in case of an acquittal. It covers two or three other things also.

Senator WARREN. I think it had better go into the record.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; let it go into the record.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. It covers acquittal in whole or in part, and it also forbids increasing the sentence on reconsideration.

(Paragraph I of General Order No. 88 is here printed in full, as follows:

GENERAL ORDERS, }
No. 88. }

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, July 14, 1919.

1. Procedure respecting the return of proceedings to courts-martial for revision.—The following rule of procedure prescribed by the President, modifying the existing procedure respecting the return of proceedings to courts-martial for revision, is published for the information and guidance of all concerned.

1. No authority will return a record of trial to any military tribunal for reconsideration of—

(a) An acquittal;

(b) A finding of not guilty of any specification;

(c) A finding of not guilty of any charge, unless the record shows a finding of guilty on a specification laid under that charge which sufficiently alleges a violation of some article of war; or

(d) The sentence originally imposed, with a view to increasing its severity, unless such sentence is less than the mandatory sentence fixed by law for the offense or offenses upon which a conviction has been had.

2. No military tribunal in any proceedings on revision shall reconsider its finding or sentence in any particular in which a return of the record of trial for such reconsideration is herein prohibited.

3. This order will be effective from and after August 10, 1919.

(250.4, A. G. O.)

By order of the Secretary of War:

PEYTON C. MARCH,
General, Chief of Staff.

Official:

P. C. HARRIS,

The Adjutant General.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What led to the issuance of that regulation?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I had a little something to do with the thing; and so far as I know it was a direction of Gen. Crowder, given before he went to Cuba last winter, that a form of changes in the Manual and the Rules of Procedure should be prepared, forbidding the return of acquittals for reconsideration, and making some other changes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That was after the war?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. That was after the war.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What led to it? Was it agitation on the subject of courts-martial?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Of course, I do not know, sir; further than that the direction came from Gen. Kreger to me to prepare the draft of that and of these changes, and I prepared and submitted them to him before I went away last April; and during my absence on the other side, they came out.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Why was not that done during the war time?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Of course, I do not know anything about that.

Senator WARREN. The date of the issuance of the order appears?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes. This was prepared last March or April, and then, of course, it had to be submitted to the General Staff and the War Department—the Secretary of War—and there were various changes, so that these are not quite in the form in which the Judge Advocate General submitted them. They are not quite as broad, in fact, as the Judge Advocate General submitted them, in some ways; and they were promulgated on the 14th of July.

Senator WARREN. On the 14th of last July?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. July 14, 1919. There is also, in addition to this general order, a copy of "Changes No. 5," in the Manual for Courts-Martial, also promulgated July 14, 1919, amending paragraphs 6, 75, 76, 78, 94, 108, 109, 332-A, 367, 370, and 371 of the Manual, and amending Appendix 3 to the Manual, and also adding a new paragraph, 76-A.

I may say that these changes cover the submission of charges and preliminary investigations, making more definite rules in some ways as to how the preliminary investigations shall be carried on and providing also in a cautionary form—

(c) Convening authorities are advised that a majority of the officers appointed on a general court-martial should have not less than a total of two years' service, commissioned or enlisted, either in the Regular Army, the National Guard, National Army—

Or other armed forces, except in case of emergency.

That is to make sure of some experience in the officers composing the court.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Those are simply regulations that can be changed at any time?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Certainly, sir.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I judge from your mentioning them that some of these regulations are really along the lines of S. 64. The one you have just read practically follows S. 64.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I would not say that it follows it, but it is along the same line as one clause of that.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. If it is right to do that by regulation, why is it not proper to do these things by law?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. My answer to that, Senator, is that as to some of these things it is wiser to do them in a less hard and fast form, so that without the difficulty of having to get the statute changed you can change them if they do not work well, and if you see that changes are needed. I think many of these things should be in a somewhat flexible form. For instance, it was suggested by Gen. Crowder, you will remember, in his letter of March 10 last to the Secretary of War, that for the purpose of trying out the plan of having a legally qualified member of the court an order should be issued, a general order, looking to that. Now, I think there is a good reason for trying that in the first place in that way rather than by statute, because until we have tried it in our Army we do not know whether it would be better ultimately to have the legal adviser in the form of the judge advocate or to have him an additional member of the court, and under just what regulation it will best work out. A general order can be changed easily, whereas if you once embody it in a statute you have it in a very fixed and definite form.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I do not know that I have any objection to this system of doing this by regulation, but it seems to me it is simply an excuse for not enacting a law that is pending before the Senate.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Of course that is a matter of opinion, Senator. I have not myself, however, thought of it in that way.

Senator WARREN. You are touching upon something that has been running through my mind, not only all through this hearing but before, and that is that there has got to be either a different law or a different application and a different practice at the front in combat positions from the practice at home in times of absolute peace. It seems to me that I can see how more vigorous action should be had at the front and while within reach of the enemy than there should be in times of peace when it is a mere matter of a little delinquency, where a complaint comes in that would be tremendously important if it were at the front.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I am disposed to agree with that view, Senator, but here, under the system that has been followed in the United States, the punishments were even severer at home in the camps and cantonments than they were at the battle front.

Senator WARREN. Senator, that is what I think, but as this came up I thought perhaps the colonel would like to express himself upon that point, because I think the situation is as you state it, and on the other hand I think it ought to be just the reverse.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. That is a matter, Senator, that I do have some opinions on, that I should like to submit to you, with your permission. But I would like first to add just a word about the character of these rules.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. These papers will be printed in the record?

Senator WARREN. Certainly.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The further headings here are to provide for the more careful selection of counsel for the accused, as well as of the judge advocate.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is all proposed to be done by regulation.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. It is done, sir, by these regulations; which are now in effect.

Senator WARREN. They have been in force since what time?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Since August 10. They were promulgated July 14, to go into effect as of August 10, if I remember rightly as to the date of going into effect.

(The documents referred to are here printed in the record, as follows:)

MANUAL FOR COURTS-MARTIAL.

CHANGES }
No. 5. }

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, July 14, 1919.

Paragraphs 6, 75, 76, 78, 94, 108, 109, 332a, 367, 370, and 371, and Appendix 3, Manual for Courts-Martial, 1917, are changed, and paragraph 76a is added, as follows:

6. Who competent to serve.—Generally all officers in the military service of the United States, and officers of the Marine Corps when detached for service with the Army by order of the President, are legally competent to serve on courts-martial for the trial of any persons who may lawfully be brought before such courts for trial. (A. W. 4.)

Exceptions.—(a) No officer shall be eligible to sit as a member of a general or special court-martial when he is the accuser or a witness for the prosecution (A. W. 8, 9); but when there is only one officer present with a command he shall be the summary court-martial of that command and shall hear and determine cases brought before him (A. W. 10). (See chapter 8, sec. 1, par. 129.)

(b) Chaplains, veterinarians, dental surgeons, and second lieutenants in the Quartermaster Corps are not in practice detailed as members of courts-martial.

(c) Convening authorities are advised that a majority of the officers appointed on a general court-martial should have not less than a total of two years service, commissioned or enlisted, in either the Regular Army, National Guard, National Army, or other national armed forces, when such officers can be detailed without manifest injury to the service. In the selection of officers for appointment as members of courts-martial care will be taken to select those officers of the command who are best qualified for such duty by training and experience. (C. M. C. M. No. 5, July 14, 1919.)

(250.4, A. G. O.)

75. Submission of charges.—Charges for trial by courts-martial will be preferred only when, in the opinion of the officer preferring them, there is reasonable ground for believing that an offense has been committed, that the accused is guilty of the offense, and that the offense can not be properly or adequately dealt with in any other manner. All charges for trial by courts-martial will be prepared in triplicate, using the prescribed charge sheet as first sheet and using such additional sheets of ordinary paper as are required. In the preparation of charges care will be taken to observe the provisions of paragraphs 65, 66, and 67, ante. In cases referred for trial to special or general courts-martial, no indorsement will be placed on the charge sheet except the indorsement referring the charges to a court-martial for trial. The charges, when the preferring officer recommends trial by a special or general court-martial, will be accompanied—

(a) By a letter of transmittal addressed to the officer immediately exercising summary court-martial jurisdiction over the command to which the accused belongs or pertains and signed by the officer preferring the charges, which shall contain a brief summary of the material testimony expected from each material witness for the prosecution, as well as a reference to any known document or other matter of evidence which may become important or necessary in the case. It will also contain a recommendation as to the kind of court-martial, general or special, before which the preferring officer believes the trial should be held.

(b) In the case of a soldier, the letter of transmittal will be accompanied by properly authenticated evidence of convictions, if any, of an offense or offenses committed by the accused during his current enlistment and within one year next preceding the date of the alleged commission by him of any offenses set forth in the charges. (C. M. C. M. No. 5, July 14, 1919.)

(250.4, A. G. O.)

76. Investigation of charges—Action.—The officer immediately exercising summary court-martial jurisdiction over the command to which the accused belongs or pertains, when a charge is received by him, examine it carefully for the purpose of determining whether it states an offense cognizable by a military tribunal and whether it is laid under the proper Article of War and will, when necessary, cause or permit a charge to be amended or a new or additional charge to be preferred. If, in his opinion, any charge is trivial or inconsequential, he will dispose of it without trial by court-martial. Where the case presented is one which, in his opinion, should be disposed of under the one-hundred and fourth article of war he himself will so dispose of it. He may, without further investigation, refer the charges to a summary court-martial for trial. If he believes that the charges should be tried by a special or a general court-martial, he will, before taking further action thereon, either carefully investigate them himself or cause them to be investigated by an officer other than the one preferring the charges whose rank, experience, and qualifications are such as to fit him for the performance of this important duty. The officer investigating the charges will afford the accused an opportunity to make any statement, call any witness, offer any evidence, or present any matter in explanation or extenuation of his alleged offense that he may desire to have considered. He will, at the outset of his investigation, carefully warn the accused that it is not necessary for him to make any statement with reference to the charges against him, but that if he does make one it may be used against him. (See par. 225 (b).) The accused will not be interrogated without the consent of his counsel. All material testimony given by any witness in person will be reduced to a clear, succinct statement, which should be read to the witness and signed by him. When it is not practicable to obtain personal testimony from any material witness, either for the prosecution or the defense, a written statement will be obtained, if possible, by the officer investigating the charges of the testimony to be expected from such witness and submitted with the report of investigation. He will also submit available papers or documents which may serve to throw light on the case. Any written statement made by the accused will be read over to him and he will be offered an opportunity to sign it if he so desires, but he will not be required to do so and will be advised that it is not necessary for him to do so. Care will be taken to insure that the accused is fully advised of the nature of the offense charged against him and of his legal rights in the premises.

The investigating officer will submit his report to the authority appointing him, inclosing papers, documents, and the signed statements of witnesses referred to above, in the form of an indorsement on the letter of transmittal submitted with the charges by the preferring officer. The report will include a reference to any known document or other matter of evidence not inclosed but which may become important or necessary in the case. It will also include a statement of all explanatory or extenuating circumstances which shall have come to the attention of the investigating officer, a statement as to whether he believes the charges can be sustained, and a specific recommendation as to the disposition thereof. An officer charged with the important duty of investigating charges for trial by court-martial will maintain throughout such investigation an attitude of judicial fairness, the object of his investigation being to prevent unjust or unnecessary trials quite as much as to establish the existence of facts upon which the accused may properly be brought to trial. When the officer immediately exercising summary court-martial jurisdiction over the command to which the accused belongs or pertains is the officer preferring the charges, he will cause them to be investigated by some officer other than himself before reaching a decision as to their disposition, except where he decides to refer them for trial to a summary court. When the officer preferring the charges is the only officer with the command, and is of the opinion that the case is one for a special or general court-martial, he will himself investigate the charges and make the report thereof as just described.

From this investigation the officer immediately exercising summary court-martial jurisdiction over the command to which the accused belongs or pertains will decide what disposition is to be made of the charges against him. Unless such officer is the accuser or prosecutor of the person to be tried, he should not ordinarily forward charges to superior authority, except in cases where he desires to recommend trial by a court-martial not within his competency to appoint; all other cases he should dispose of without reference to higher authority. Action forwarding charges to superior authority will be in the form of an indorsement on the letter of transmittal submitted by the officer preferring the charges, following the report of investigation. The letter of transmittal, together with all indorsements thereon, will be referred with the charges to the trial judge advocate for his information in preparing the case for trial, but neither this document, nor any part thereof, will be shown to the court or any member thereof. In case of trial by general court-martial the letter of transmittal with all indorsements thereon will be forwarded to the Judge Advocate General with the record of trial.

Each commanding officer superior to the one immediately exercising summary court-martial jurisdiction over the accused into whose hands charges may officially come will either refer them to a court-martial within his jurisdiction for trial, forward them to the next superior authority exercising court-martial jurisdiction over the command to which the accused belongs or pertains, or otherwise dispose of them as circumstances may appear to require.

(C. M. C. M. No. 5, July 14, 1919.)

(250.4, A. G. O.)

76a. Further investigation of general court-martial charges.—Before directing the trial of any charge by general court-martial or military commission, the convening authority will refer it to his staff judge advocate for consideration. Should the investigation of the charges appear not to be complete and satisfactory, the charges may be returned for further investigation, to be conducted, reported, considered, and acted upon in like manner as the original investigation; or, in a proper case, the necessary further investigation may, when practicable, be conducted by the staff judge advocate, an inspector, or other suitable officer through direct correspondence or personal interview. Should any charge or specification appear to be improperly drawn, the staff judge advocate may secure its correction or the substitution of another through direct correspondence or personal interview. The staff judge advocate may, over the signature of the officer preferring the charges, make corrections in the phraseology of any charge or specification by addition, substitution, or elimination whenever such correction does not change the substantive character of the charge or specification as preferred by the officer signing it. He may also properly cause new or substituted specifications and charges, based upon the indicated competent evidence, to be preferred. When these charges are returned by the staff judge advocate to the convening authority, he should advise the latter that they are correct in form and appropriate to the indicated competent evidence in the case, and whether or not in the opinion of the judge advocate a prima facie case justifying trial exists. The duties herein prescribed for a staff judge advocate will be performed by the officer acting as such if no judge advocate is on duty on the staff of the convening authority. (C. M. C. M. No. 5, July 14, 1919.)

(250.4, A. G. O.)

78. Determination of proper trial court.—When an officer who exercises court-martial jurisdiction receives charges against an enlisted man and has decided that the case requires trial by court-martial, it is his duty to consider whether such trial should be by summary, special, or general court-martial. Subject to jurisdictional limitations, he should not withhold charges from trial by special or summary court solely for the reason that the maximum limit of punishment is beyond the jurisdiction of such courts to impose. On the other hand, he should not refer to special or summary court-martial offenses which, by reason of their inherent gravity or the circumstances surrounding their commission, merit greater formality of trial or more condign punishment than is found in the procedure or jurisdiction of such courts. As a general rule no case should be tried by a special or general court-martial in which, under the apparent circumstances of the case, adequate punishment can be imposed by a summary court-martial; and no case should be tried by a general court-martial in which, under the apparent circumstances of the case, including the previous military record of the accused, adequate punishment can be imposed by a summary or special court-martial. Beyond this no fixed rule can be laid down, and the matter must be decided after careful consideration by commanding officers. (C. M. C. M. No. 5, July 14, 1919.)

(250.4, A. G. O.)

94. Selection.—The prompt, speedy, and thorough trial of a court-martial case is largely dependent upon the judge advocate. He will, accordingly, be carefully selected. Where it can be avoided no officer who has not had experience as a judge advocate will be detailed as judge advocate of a general court-martial unless he has had experience as a member and as an assistant judge advocate of a court-martial and is otherwise qualified by character and attainments for this duty. (C. M. C. M. No. 5, July 14, 1919.)

(250.4, A. G. O.)

108. Counsel.—The accused shall have the right to be represented in his defense before a general or special court-martial by civilian counsel of his own selection, or by military counsel of his own selection if such counsel be reasonably available. Military counsel will be detailed as soon as practicable after arrest or confinement. Civilian counsel will not be provided at the expense of the Government.

Should the accused request the appointment as his counsel of an officer stationed at the station where the court sits, and such officer be not a member of the court, the commanding officer will appoint such officer as counsel if he is reasonably available. Should the commanding officer decide that the officer desired by the accused is not reasonably available, the accused may appeal to the officer appointing the court, whose decision shall be final. If the counsel desired by the accused is not under the control of the commanding officer where the trial is held, application for counsel will be submitted by the accused in writing to the appointing authority, whose decision as to whether the officer desired is "reasonably available" is final.

Every officer convening a general or special court-martial will, in the convening order, detail a defense counsel for the court whose duty it shall be to act as counsel for all accused persons tried by that court except those who have counsel of their own selection. In this latter case, the defense counsel may, by mutual agreement between himself and counsel selected by the accused, act as associate counsel. Officers so detailed should have the qualifications described in paragraph 94 for judge advocates, and should be selected with the same care. (C. M. C. M. No. 5, July 14, 1919.)

(250.4, A. G. O.)

109. An officer acting as counsel before a general or special court-martial should perform such duties as usually devolve upon the counsel for a defendant before civil courts in criminal cases. He should guard the interests of the accused by all honorable and legitimate means known to the law, but should not obstruct the proceedings with frivolous and manifestly useless objections or discussions. Ample opportunity will be given to judge advocates and counsel for accused properly to prepare the prosecution and defense of each case respectively, and for that purpose they will be excused from any other duty that may interfere with such work. (C. M. C. M. No. 5, July 14, 1919.)

(250.4, A. G. O.)

332a (Added by C. M. C. M. No. 1, and changed by C. M. C. M. No. 4.) When an officer or enlisted man has been tried by a general or special court-martial and acquitted, or has been convicted and the sentence does not include dismissal, dishonorable discharge, or confinement, the judge advocate will at once notify the commanding officer in writing, directly, of the fact that neither dismissal, dishonorable discharge, nor confinement has been imposed on the accused, whereupon the commanding officer will at once release the accused from confinement or arrest, provided he is not awaiting trial or result of trial under other charges. No officer or enlisted man so released shall be ordered to duty outside of the jurisdiction of the reviewing authority until the case shall have been finally disposed of. (Dig. Ops. J. A. G., May, 1918, p. 67.) (C. M. C. M. No. 5, July 14, 1919.)

(250.4, A. G. O.)

367. (Changed by C. M. C. M. No. 4.) By appointing authority.—(a) Records of trial by general courts-martial.—After having been acted upon by the officer appointing the court, or by the officer commanding for the time being, the record of each trial by general court-martial, with the decisions and orders of the appointing authority made thereon, will be transmitted directly to the Judge Advocate General of the Army accompanied by the statement of service, if there be any; five copies of the order, if there be any, promulgating the result of the trial, and the letter of transmittal provided for in paragraph 75, with all indorsements thereon.

(b) Records of trial by special courts-martial.—After having been acted upon by the officer appointing the court, or by the officer commanding for the time being, the record of each trial by special court-martial, accompanied by a copy of the order publishing the result of the trial, will be forwarded, ordinarily without indorsement or letter of transmittal, to the officer exercising general court-martial jurisdiction over the command, there to be filed in the office of the Judge Advocate until the statistical information in it required for the annual report of the Judge Advocate has been secured, when it may be destroyed.

(c) Records of trial by summary courts-martial.—The several records, of trial by summary courts-martial within a command shall be filed together in the office of the commanding officer and shall constitute the summary court record of the command.

(d) Reports of trial by summary courts-martial.—The report of trial by summary court (copy of record of trial) will, with the least practicable delay after action has been taken on the sentence, be completed and transmitted to the officer exercising general court-martial jurisdiction over the command, there to be filed in the office of the Judge Advocate until the statistical information in it required for the annual report of the Judge Advocate has been secured, when it may be destroyed. (C. M. C. M. No. 5, July 14, 1919.)

(250.4, A. G. O.)

370. (Changed by C. M. C. M. No. 4.) Action by reviewing authority and record thereof.—Every record of trial by general court-martial or military commission received by a reviewing or confirming authority will be referred by him to his staff Judge Advocate for examination. The latter will carefully examine the record and recommend orally or in writing the action which, in his opinion, should be taken thereon. The duties herein defined for a staff Judge Advocate will be performed by the officer acting as such if no Judge Advocate is on duty on the staff of the convening authority.

The reviewing authority will state at the end of the record of trial in each case his decisions and orders. (C. M. C. M. No. 5, July 14, 1919.)

(250.4, A. G. O.)

371. (Changed by C. M. C. M. No. 4.) Sentence not effective until approved.—No sentence of a court-martial shall be carried into execution until the same shall have been approved by the reviewing authority as defined in paragraphs 369 and 374. Upon acquittal, or upon conviction where the sentence does not include dismissal, dishonorable discharge or confinement, the accused should be released from confinement or arrest as provided in paragraph 332a. The announcement of the result of trial in orders is not necessary to the validity of the sentence or acquittal. It is not necessary for the reviewing authority to approve the findings and proceedings. (C. M. C. M. No. 5, July 14, 1919.) (250. 4, A. G. O.)

Appendix 3.—Change paragraphs 1 and 2 under "Instructions" to read as follows:

1. Submission of charges.—Charges for trial by courts-martial will be preferred only when, in the opinion of the officer preferring them, there is reasonable ground for believing that an offense has been committed, that the accused is guilty of the offense, and that the offense can not be properly or adequately dealt with in any other manner. All charges for trial by courts-martial will be prepared in triplicate, using the prescribed charge sheet as a first sheet and using such additional sheets of ordinary paper as are required. In the preparation of charges care will be taken to observe the provisions of paragraphs 65, 66, and 67, ante. In cases referred for trial to special or general courts-martial, no indorsement will be placed on the charge sheet except the indorsement referring the charges to a court-martial for trial. The charges, when the preferring officer recommends trial by a special or general court-martial, will be accompanied—

(a) By a letter of transmittal addressed to the officer immediately exercising summary court-martial jurisdiction over the command to which the accused belongs or pertains and signed by the officer preferring the charges, which shall contain a brief summary of the material testimony expected from each material witness for the prosecution, as well as a reference to any known document or other matter of evidence which may become important or necessary in the case. It will also contain a recommendation as to the kind of court-martial, general or special, before which the preferring officer believes the trial should be held.

(b) In the case of a soldier, the letter of transmittal will be accompanied by properly authenticated evidence of convictions, if any, of an offense or offenses committed by the accused during his current enlistment and within one year next preceding the date of the alleged commission by him of any offenses set forth in the charges. (M. C. M., par. 75.)

2. Investigation of charges—Action.—The officer immediately exercising summary court-martial jurisdiction over the command to which the accused belongs or pertains, will, when a charge is received by him, examine it carefully for the purpose of determining whether it states an offense cognizable by a military tribunal and whether it is laid under the proper article of war and will, when necessary, cause or permit a charge to be amended or a new or additional charge to be preferred. It will also include a statement of all explanatory or extenuating circumstances which shall have come to the attention of the investigating officer, a statement as to whether he believes the charges can be sustained, and a specific recommendation as to the disposition thereof. An officer charged with the important duty of investigating charges for trial by court-martial will maintain throughout such investigation an attitude of judicial fairness, the object of his investigation being to prevent unjust or unnecessary trials quite as much as to establish the existence of facts upon which the accused may properly be brought to trial. When the officer immediately exercising summary court-martial jurisdiction over the command to which the accused belongs or pertains is the officer preferring the charges, he will cause them to be investigated by some officer other than himself before reaching a decision as to their disposition, except where he decides to refer them for trial to a summary court. When the officer preferring the charges is the only officer with the command, and is of the opinion that the case is one for a special or general court-martial, he will himself investigate the charges and make the report thereof as just described.

From this investigation the officer immediately exercising summary court-martial jurisdiction over the command to which the accused belongs or pertains will decide what disposition is to be made of the charges against him. Unless such officer is the accuser or prosecutor of the person to be tried, he should not ordinarily forward charges to superior authority, except in cases where he desires to recommend trial by a court-martial not within his competency to appoint; all other cases he should dispose of without reference to higher authority. Action forwarding charges to superior authority will be in the form of an indorsement on the letter of transmittal submitted by the officer preferring the charges, following the report of investigation. The letter of transmittal, together with all indorsements thereon, will be referred with the charges to the trial judge advocate for his information in preparing the case for trial, but neither this document nor any part thereof will be shown to the court or any member thereof. In case of trial by general court-martial the letter of transmittal with all indorsements thereon will be forwarded to the Judge Advocate General with the record of trial.

Each commanding officer superior to the one immediately exercising summary court-martial jurisdiction over the accused into whose hands charges may officially come will either refer them to a court-martial within his jurisdiction for trial, forward them to the next superior authority exercising court-martial jurisdiction over the command to which the accused belongs or pertains, or otherwise dispose of them as circumstances may appear to require. (M. C. M., par. 76.) (C. M. C. M. No. 5, July 14, 1919.)

(250.4. A. G. O.)

By order of the Secretary of War:

PEYTON C. MARCH,
General, Chief of Staff.

Official:

P. C. HARRIS,
The Adjutant General.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Have these orders been published?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes; Senator.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In what official document may they be found?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The general order can be found in the general orders that are promulgated and published.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you have a dozen copies sent up here? I suppose they are regularly numbered?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes.

Senator WARREN. Please send them up here at your convenience.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. With pleasure. The changes will, of course, appear in the next publication of the Manual. Meantime they are sent out in circular form.

As to the matter we were speaking of a moment ago, Senator—

Senator WARREN. In view of the fact that some of our newspaper friends have come in, let me say this: I understood you in the commencement of your testimony to state that your position had been and is now, in the Judge Advocate General's Office, that of the legislative committee, so that such matters as this which you have just presented would either originate with you or would be submitted to you.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Matters of expected congressional legislation, matters to be submitted to Congress, go through our section. These matters of the drafting of proposed amendments to the Manual and things of that sort would not necessarily go to our section. I was simply detailed to do that work last March, I suppose because of the fact that I had prepared a study of the foreign statutes and was somewhat familiar with them.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In that connection, Gen. Ansell was sent over to Europe for this purpose at one time, was he not?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes; Gen. Ansell went over in 1918. My understanding was that Gen. Ansell's investigation was in a way broader and in another way narrower than mine. He was not limited to an investigation of the court-martial system entirely. He was examining other things. On the other hand, he was rather examining those court-martial systems, as I understood it, more from the standpoint of getting the laws and regulations in force, and not attempting to find out, as I was specifically directed to do, so much how the systems worked in practice.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Was not that a part of his duty, to do just what you have done?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Of course I only know by hearsay and inference. I do not quite gather that from the form of his report.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You say he was not limited, but was he not limited by the assistance given him? He had no assistants, had he?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Of course I do not know anything about that, Senator. I only know about Gen. Ansell's mission from his report, and not in a definite way.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What assistants did they furnish you in the way of interpreters, clerks, and stenographers?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I was assigned one major, Maj. Wells, to assist me, who as I testified yesterday, did the work chiefly in Belgium, and also was with me in other interviews; and I was also furnished the assistance of one second lieutenant who was a lawyer—

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Who was he?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Second Lieut. Frank Feuille; and Regimental Sergeant Major Leroy Vander Burgh, who was a New York lawyer, of the Judge Advocate General's Department. He was a very capable young man. Then I had the assistance of Lieut. Ely M. Behar, who was a French interpreter, and of Second Lieut. Henry Bosson, who was translating the Scandinavian languages, and then a major of The Adjutant General's Department was assigned as executive officer, or office manager.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Who was that?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Maj. John W. Llufrío; and I succeeded in borrowing from the peace commission for a time the services of a French court stenographer whom they were using, and he went with me to some of these interviews with the French officials, and attended French courts martial. He proved himself a very capable man also. Capt. Pierce of the interpreters' bureau of the peace commission was also good enough to go with me several times to help out in interpreting; as was also Capt. McFadden, assistant military attaché in Paris. And I had a stenographer who was a sergeant major in the Judge Advocate General's Department, Sergeant Major Henry J. Çelse. Then I was given the services of other stenographers and field clerks and some civilian translators who were just assigned to me by the officers over there in Paris from time to time as I needed them; or I think I got two field clerks from Chaumont; and three or four from Tours just before I came home, to help in arranging my material. I was really handicapped. I had hoped I might get some money with which to work, but I did not succeed in getting a penny, so I was really put to it to borrow assistants as I could. I was allowed my actual expenses for subsistence, not to exceed $5 a day, and my actual traveling expenses, which I understand is the same that Gen. Ansell was allowed.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. All of these men whom you have named, practically, received their salaries as officers and men of the Army?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Certainly; but there was no special allowance made for any of them at all. They were loaned to me. That was rather easier right then than it might have been otherwise, because different organizations were just waiting for their turns to go home.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. May I ask you when you come to revise your testimony to give the personnel, the names and official positions, of all those who assisted you?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I will be very glad to do so if I have not done it completely. I have the names.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You may want to correct them when you look over your testimony.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I will be glad to check the names.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You had an ample force to accomplish the purposes of your mission?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Oh, yes; in a way, Senator; but not to do all that I wanted to do.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. When did you go over?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I sailed on April 7, and arrived in Paris on April 16.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And when did you finish your work over there?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I really did not finish the work. I should have had two or three weeks more, but I was directed to return so as to be home by the 31st of July, and I dropped the work in time to do that, or to get here within two or three days later. Unfortunately I was held, not being able to get a boat for a few days.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That was all in this year?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. That was all in this year, yes. I was in France from April 16, the date I arrived—I arrived in Brest on April 15—until July 30, the date when I sailed from Brest.

Senator WARREN. I do not want to go too far afield, but I wish to ask you, have you had occasion, either before you went over there or since you returned, to look into court-martial matters in other armies and other countries than France and England; that is, in Italy and perhaps in Germany? We are not supposed to know anything about that.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I confess I do not know much of the German system. I did succeed, pretty nearly the last thing I did before I left, in getting quite a lot of the German material, copies of their codes and quite a lot of material which I did not have time to examine before I left, because I was immediately coming home; and I have not had time to examine it yet. I have it, but have not had time to examine it.

Senator WARREN. I do not care to lead you into any detailed statement, but I did not know but you might have some general statement to make as a comparison between the system of our country and that of some other country, or by way of comparison between England and France and the other countries.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. As to some of those countries I have, and with your permission I will simply refer to that as I go along in connection with what I say on the different points about the countries I have more specially investigated.

Now I find that I am at liberty to offer here and will be glad to offer these statistics of the French courts-martial during the war, which were given to me, and which, as I say, do not show the severity of the sentences or the number of death sentences, but do cover the number of cases tried of different kinds.

Senator WARREN. Is that simply a statement of the cases tried by the French?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. That presents a statement of all the cases tried, the number of charges brought, the number of charges not sent to trial, the number of acquittals, all that sort of thing, quite in detail; but without a statement of the quantum of the sentences.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. By whom was that furnished to you?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. By the under secretary of state for military justice in France, M. Edouard Ignace.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Does it give the number of appeals and the disposition of the cases on appeal?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. No, Senator, it does not; and it was impossible to get definite statistics on that. I will say that this is an English translation of the original French which was handed to me. I tried to get statistics on appeals, and I got estimates. I could not get definite statistics. The estimates that were given to me were that around 25 per cent, between 25 and 30 per cent, of the cases are appealed.

Senator WARREN. Are those figures given in this document?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. No; I was simply verbally told that.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That covers the French courts-martial during the whole period of the war?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes. As I say, I was informed that from 25 to 30 per cent of the cases were appealed, but that less than 10 per cent of those appealed were reversed, or sent back for new trial. In the armies on active service, the appeals were practically limited to death cases.

Senator WARREN. Was it only 10 per cent of the number appealed, or was it 10 per cent of the whole number of cases that were reversed or sent back?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Only 10 per cent of the cases appealed, which would be about 2½ per cent of the whole number of cases tried.

Senator WARREN. That is what I wanted. I wanted to establish the fact, whatever it might be.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. That was the situation. That, of course, relates only to the regular courts. In the cases in the "special courts," there was no appeal at all, and until 1917 there was no provision for stay of execution. In 1917 there was a direction from the President to stay executions in cases where death was adjudged by the "special courts" until they could be submitted to the President for examination.

I just want to add to what I said the last thing yesterday, in answer to a question of Senator Warren, I believe, about those cases of the men who were restored to duty from the disciplinary barracks.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. At Leavenworth?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Referring to the cases cited in Senator Chamberlain's speech, I want to add that our records show really two cases, either one of which might, as it left the court-martial, have been the case mentioned of the 17-year-old boy sentenced to 10 years for sleeping on post. One is the Urben case, 114717, and the other is either the Sabbri case or the Walworth case. I seem to have those two names—Sabbri and Walworth—confused in my mind, somehow. It is one or the other of them. I had assumed, however, and do assume, that the Senator was not referring to the Urben case, because in that case the reviewing authority cut down the sentence to a guardhouse sentence of six months. The other case to which I was referring yesterday, where the man was restored after nine months in the disciplinary barracks, is, as I say, either the Walworth or the Sabbri case.

Senator WARREN. I had no idea of singling out any persons, but I wanted to know the general plan. I had supposed all these years—not since the question has come up before us, but all the years before—that the disciplinary barracks were on a different plan than county jails or State penitentiaries. I assumed that the men were sent to the disciplinary barracks with the intention of getting them out and getting them into the service as fast as possible, provided they were worthy; and if not, to get them out of the Army.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. That is my understanding also, Senator; and my memory is that in pursuance of that policy 1,182 men were restored in that way to the colors from the Fort Leavenworth barracks alone during the year 1918.

Senator WARREN. I only wanted to know whether that is the plan or not. It ought to be, and I wanted to know whether it really is. How many men do you say were restored to the colors?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. One thousand one hundred and eighty-two; is my memory; but that is only memory and may be wrong.

Senator WARREN. Within the one year?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Within the one year, from the one barracks.

Senator WARREN. How many were committed there?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I would have to look up those figures.

Senator WARREN. Can you approximate the proportion?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. It would not be safe for me to try. I do not know how many were restored from Fort Jay, or how many were restored from Alcatraz. I could easily get and put into the record those figures for you, however, covering the committals to the three institutions and the restorations from the three.

Senator WARREN. We ought to have these figures, because that is the point we ought to get above all others, so as to see what is done; and if there is to be a change made, this Congress ought to be in a position to propose the change.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. If that may be added to my statement I will have it inserted.

Senator WARREN. Certainly.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The figures, as given to me by Lieut. Col. Dinsmore, the Chief of the Statistical Division of the Judge Advocate General's Office, are as follows: For the period April 1, 1917, to July 31, 1919, the committals to all the disciplinary barracks amounted to 11,492; and the total restorations to the colors from the same barracks were 2,528. On April 1, 1917, there were 2,100 persons in confinement in the various disciplinary barracks. On August 30, 1919, the number so in confinement in those barracks was 3,728; which is only 1,628 more than before we entered the war.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Taking the Sabbri case to which you have referred—and I really do not remember to what case I referred in my speech—it would seem from the fact that he was committed for a long term, and practically restored to the colors or given an opportunity to be restored to the colors within nine months, that there is much force in the suggestion of Gen. O'Ryan and others that the original sentences were in the nature of sentences in terrorem.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I might say to you, Senator, that that is quite in line with what was told me soon after I entered the service. I suppose I had the same experience that every other lawyer coming from civil life into the Judge Advocate General's office had, when I was set to examining records and found some of these startlingly long sentences. Of course, while I was first in the "retained in service" section this did not come before me, but immediately when I was transferred to the disciplinary barracks section I noticed them. and I went to the chief of my section and asked about it, and he said to me, "You must remember that these do not really necessarily mean what they say, because these are disciplinary barracks cases and these men have a chance to be restored to the colors; and then beside that, this is during the war, and they have to maintain discipline in the Army, and undoubtedly after the war is over there will be some kind of a review of the cases, something of that kind." Of course I am not quoting the exact language, or trying to do so, but that was the impression on my mind.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. As a matter of fact, Colonel, when you first went into the service you approved of some system of review or appeal, with power to modify or reverse, did you not?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes; and I still do.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Do you still have that view?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes; very strongly.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I am glad to know that. You find it very generally amongst the lawyers who have come into the service from civil life, do you not?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I think so; and not only among them, but among the Regular officers also. I do not think I know of anyone who has seriously considered the question who does not think there should be some such power.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. As you construed section 1199 of the Revised Statutes, when you first went into the service you thought they had a greater power than was being exercised by the Judge Advocate General, did you not?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. No, sir; I never did. Of course, it is fair to say, Senator, that I was not in the office in 1917. I came into the service in August, 1918, and my attention was never really called to this until some time along last Christmas.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You came in as a captain?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I came in as a major.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And you were promoted when?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Promoted to a lieutenant colonelcy last April. I forget the exact date. The promotion came to me by cablegram while I was over on the other side.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I believe there are two bar association committee reports, a majority report and a minority report.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Both those reports, as well as the Kernan report, recommend some kind of appellate tribunal, do they not?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I so understand.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The difference between the so-called militaristic view, if I may so designate it, and the civilian view of it is that on the one hand it is insisted that this whole business ought to be done within the military tribunal itself and the others contend for some sort of a civil appellate tribunal.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Of course, Senator, I would not like to subscribe to your use of the word "militaristic," because I do not think those who favor the plan recommended, for instance, by Gen. Crowder, are necessarily any more "militaristic" than the others.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Of course, that is only a question of opinion.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I am frank to say to you, sir, that my own opinion has been, and is, in favor of the ultimate appellate power being vested in the President as Commander in Chief of the Army. It seems to me that is the logical place to put it; and also that that is in accord with the practice in the British system, which is the nearest akin to ours.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In theory there is no objection to that, but in practice it is a physical impossibility for the President to review these cases.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In practice, Senator, as I understand it, that would mean always the same kind of review that we now have; that is, it would be done on the advice of the Judge Advocate General.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Surely.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. As it is in Great Britain; and that, it seems to me, is the right way to do it. In other words, I think the review should be a careful legal review, and the President advised in that way, leaving the President in the last analysis free to act on his own judgment.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Still, the great difference between the British system as you have narrated it and our system is that in Great Britain the judge advocate general is completely dissociated from the military establishment. He is a civilian, while here your tribunal would still be within the military régime.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Well—

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Within the military establishment?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. That is in a sense true, Senator; but not quite in the way you put it. It is also true, of course, that while the British judge advocate general is a civilian, he reports through a military officer, namely, the deputy adjutant general, who reviews his work; so that it is much on the same plan as ours.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. But you have stated that in nearly if not all the cases the opinion of the judge advocate general is followed both by the deputy adjutant general and by the attorney general.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. In nearly all cases; I think about the same as with us. There is no great difference that I can see, one way or the other, between the British plan and our plan in that regard.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Colonel, let us be perfectly frank about it. The cases that stand out in this hearing, so far are those of the four young men who were sentenced to be shot in France. The record that Gen. Crowder has made is one of presenting a solid military front in the disposition of those cases. He has so stated in his letter to the Chief of Staff. A man ought not to be influenced by that consideration. It ought to be a consideration first, of doing justice to the young men, rather than the presenting of a solid military front with reference to the disposition of the cases.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Senator, I can only say that I can not read that letter of April 5, 1918, in that way. My reading of that letter is that the letter strongly pointed to clemency; and my reading of the Judge Advocate General's memorandum of April 16, in which he gathered up together the cases cited in Lieut. Col. Clark's memorandum of April 10, and the cases cited, together with the arguments in Gen. Ansell's memorandum of April 15, which were all put together and sent to the Chief of Staff, is that it, to my mind, constitutes a very strong presentation of the reasons for clemency, and points very strongly to clemency. It is very true that he very carefully said that he did not want to formally reopen the case. He was very careful not to invite conflict with the Chief of Staff if he could avoid it; but to my mind that memorandum of April 16 was a very effective argument for clemency; and I can not help thinking it had a great deal to do with the clemency ultimately given in those cases.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is a difference in the construction of what took place.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Wholly and entirely so.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I take a different view of it; and it seems to me now, in the light of the history of those cases, that a firm recommendation for clemency on the part of Gen. Crowder would have brought about the results you seem to think he wanted.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Of course, that is only an opinion on the construction of the papers.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; that is all. The language speaks for itself. But however that may be, that is the great difference between the British system and the American system. The appellate tribunal there is civilian, and it does not interfere with the military discipline of the Army, because it goes through military channels in the last analysis.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I think it is true that the only substantial difference between their plan and ours is that their judge advocate general is a civilian, whereas ours is a military officer. The functioning of the two systems seems to be almost the same.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. On the other hand, the judge advocates in Great Britain are appointed, are they not, by the judge advocate general?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. No, sir; they are appointed by the commanding officer, the convening authority, except within the United Kingdom, where they are appointed always, I think, by or on the recommendation of the judge advocate general.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly; and his recommendations usually "go"?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I think so; but, in practice, he asks the commanding general, the convening authority, to nominate a fit person for the appointment.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Then there is this further difference: The judge advocates over there, while not members of the court, sit by and advise the court with reference to the admissibility of testimony and the proceedings to be had. They do not appear in the rôle of prosecutors, do they?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. That is, sir, the great difference in the organization of the court, and I am frank to say to you that is a thing wherein I think we might well copy their plan.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I am glad to know that.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. And as I understand it, that was what Gen. Crowder had in mind in his recommendation in his letter of March 10 to the Secretary of War, where he thought a general order should be issued to try out that plan and see how well it will fit here in our Army.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I am glad you entertain that view, because it does not stand to reason that under our system a man acting as judge advocate and acting as prosecutor can see to it that justice is done to the prisoner.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I very thoroughly agree with you, Senator. It seems to me the only question there is a practical question, the working out of the plan in a way most adaptable to our Army, and without overloading the personnel of our Army with lawyers.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. It does seem to me, Colonel, that there can be no more effective system for the maintenance of discipline in the Army than to see that justice is done, both to the enlisted personnel and to the commissioned personnel. Any system that leaves in the mind of the military forces a feeling of injustice, or the possibility of injustice, will do more to destroy morale than anything else.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I thoroughly agree with you, Senator, in that, of course. What I had in mind was simply this, the practical way of doing it. Now, the British during the war worked out this plan for their "court-martial officers," and found that they could get along with just about two to each division, provided that one acted as staff judge advocate and the other as this additional member of the field courts, without being required to be present at all the trials. Now, they say that worked pretty well. On the other hand, Judge Cassel is inclined to think that for the permanent purposes of their army there ought to be a judge advocate who is the legal adviser of the court, and not a member of the court, but only to be present at the trials of serious, difficult, and complicated cases, outside of their rarely used general court. They are going to experiment with that,

Senator. Now, of course, if in the reorganization of our Army, it is to be gathered into rather large aggregations—to use a word purposely not technical—it may be easier for one legal officer to cover a good deal of work. On the other hand, if the Army were to be scattered as it was before the war, it would be another proposition and another problem, and for that reason it seems to me, personally, that it would be wiser to try it out in the first place with a general order, as Gen. Crowder suggested, which is flexible and can be changed from time to time so as, with experience, to finally whip it into such form as may ultimately seem best; and then, as he suggests, when it has been tried out and we find what is the most practical way to apply it in our Army, then embody it in legislation.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The danger about that is that the Judge Advocate General's position is not a permanent one, and neither is that of the Chief of Staff, so that the regulations are likely to be changed according to the whim of the man who happened to fill those two places at the time. That can not be done under a statute, but recommendations for a change or modification of a statute might be made, but it would still be up to Congress to make it.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. That is true, Senator. Only I can not quite see the danger of the thing being changed simply as a matter of whim.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I have been connected with this machine for 10 years, and I find that these whims are quite common on the part of the different heads of the different bureaus.

Proceed. I did not mean to interrupt you so much.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I would like to offer in evidence and put in a translation of this French presidential decree of September 6, 1914, to which I referred yesterday, establishing their "special courts," and of the preamble to the letter of Marshal Joffre of September 9, 1914, promulgating that decree.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. We want to have it in, do we not?

Senator WARREN. Certainly.

(The documents referred to are here printed, as follows:)

TRANSLATION OF PRESIDENTIAL DECREE OF SEPT. 6, 1914, ESTABLISHING "SPECIAL COURTS MARTIAL" FOR THE PERIOD OF THE WAR (PP. 71-72, "GUIDE PRATIQUE ET SOMMAIRE DES CONSEILS DE GUERRE AUX ARMÉES").

Decree concerning the functioning of courts-martial in the armies in active service ("Conseils de Guerre aux Armées").

The President of the French Republic upon the report of the Minister of War in view of the Code of Military Justice for the Territorial Armies and in view of Article 3 of the law of February 25, 1875, concerning the organization of public powers.

DECREES.

ARTICLE 1. Provisionally and during the continuance of the war, courts-martial in the armies on active service are empowered to function in accordance with the conditions hereinafter indicated under the form of "Special Courts Martial" to try military persons and those assimilated to that status taken in the act of committing an offense and also any person following or employed in whatever capacity with the army, or permitted to accompany it, and also prisoners of war. Their accomplices are also equally subject to trial before the special courts-martial.

ARTICLE 2. Special courts-martial will be organized upon the order of the general-in-chief commanding the armies, at headquarters of an army, a corps, a division, a brigade, a regiment, or other unit of not less than a battalion.

ARTICLE 3. They will be composed of three judges appointed by the commandant of the army, corps, division, brigade, regiment, or other unit where they are established. The president should be, if possible, a general officer or field officer. The two other judges will be, when the accused is an officer, of rank at least that of the accused: in case of a lack of sufficient number of officers of that grade, one of the two judges may be of the next lower rank. If the accused is a noncommissioned officer, corporal, or soldier, one of the judges will be a noncommissioned officer. The commanding officer will appoint an officer to act as commissaire du gouvernement, and a noncommissioned officer as clerk.

ARTICLE 4. The special courts-martial will take cognizance of "crimes" (i. e. not including misdemeanors) punishable under the Code of Military Justice, and also "crimes" punishable under articles 295 to 304, 309 and 310, 331 to 333, 434 and 435 of the Penal Code.

ARTICLE 5. The procedure before the special courts-martial will be that indicated in articles 152 to 158 of the Code of Military Justice; except that no delay will be imposed between the citation of the accused and the meeting of the court. The judgment will be pronounced by a majority of two votes against one.

ARTICLE 6. The judgments of the special courts-martial will not be subject to recourse to revision nor to cassation (i. e. no appeal is to be allowed to the "Conseil de Revision" nor to the Court of Cassation).

ARTICLE 7. The Minister of War is charged with the execution of this decree. Done in Bordeaux, September 6, 1914.

R. POINCARÉ.

For the President of the Republic.

The Minister of War,

A. MILLERAND.

TRANSLATION OF PREAMBLE OF CIRCULAR LETTER OF MARSHAL JOFFRE, No. 4487, SEPTEMBER 9, 1914, PROMULGATING THE PRESIDENTIAL DECREE OF SEPTEMBER 6, 1914, ESTABLISHING "SPECIAL COURTS-MARTIAL."

Subject: Instructions for the application of the decree of September 6, 1914, relative to special courts-martial.

The generals commanding the armies have several times called to my attention, in most pressing terms, the extreme difficulty of reconciling the forms and delays prescribed by the Code of Military Justice with the imperious necessities of discipline and of the maintenance of public order.

Acting upon their advice, I asked the Government to introduce into the procedure of courts-martial ("conseils de guerre") in the armies on active service the necessary simplification by giving those tribunals a simpler composition and a more rapid procedure and providing for the possibility of their establishment in every organization or unit where it may appear to be necessary.

A decree of September 6, 1914, adopting this point of view, now authorizes the organization, provisionally and during the war, of special courts-martial in the armies on active service; the jurisdiction, organization, composition, and procedure of which will accord with the views above set forth.

I have the honor to send you with the text of the decree the following instructions for its application.

(Here follow instructions, divided into four paragraphs, under the following headings, viz: Organization of special courts-martial; Composition of special courts-martial; Jurisdiction of special courts-martial; Procedure.)

J. JOFFRE.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That decree was subsequently repealed by the French Parliament?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Those courts were abolished in 1918.

Senator WARREN. Those were war measures?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Emergency measures, so denominated. It simply shows that an emergency court was created during the war, or the early part of the war. The reasons for its creation are stated in the letter of Marshal Joffre.

Just a word more on the question of appeal in our Army. I think Senator Chamberlain asked me yesterday whether we have any appeal. In that sense we have none. But I think it is fair to say that I think the review that we do have in the office of the Judge Advocate General is really at least as careful an examination as is made by most appellate courts; and that is true, not only of the death cases and dismissal of officers' cases, but of all other cases. The same review precisely, I think, is had, at least was had while I was in the penitentiary section, of all penitentiary cases. A penitentiary case has to go through the hands of, and the review has to be approved by, at least six men besides the Judge Advocate General.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. When was that reviewing board established?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The second board referred to was established in November, 1918, I think; but before that those cases went to the first board of review, so there was no difference in practice. It simply was dividing the board of review, because they were getting behind with their work. The practice was not changed at that time at all.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In theory that was a review without power to afford remedy, without power to reverse, without power to modify; without any other power, where the court had jurisdiction and the proceedings were regular, than the power to advise the commanding officer.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Of course, that is like the British system. Under General Order No. 7, which became effective February 1, 1918, before the approval becomes final—and, therefore, while it is possible to set aside the whole proceedings and disapprove them, if there is error in the record—in around 98 per cent of the cases at least, where the judge advocate general advises disapproval or modification, his advice is followed; so that, while not formally executive in its form, the judge advocate general's recommendation practically is so.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Can you give the number of cases which were actually reviewed by the board, and the number of cases where the judge advocate general advised a modification of the sentence to the commanding general, and the number of cases where that advice was acted upon favorably?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I could get and insert the number of those, I think. I can not tell you from memory the number reviewed. I can state substantially the number where reversals were recommended, as I remember it, up to the 1st of October of last year. During the year prior to that, there were about 276 sent back to the commanding officers, and roughly 250 sent up to the Secretary of War, or possibly I have them just turned around, vice versa.

Senator WARREN. You will get those figures?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes, and put them in. Out of all of them there were only 13 where we were not followed, 6, I think, by the Secretary of War, and 7 by the commanding officers, or maybe that is vice versa.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I would like to have in the record the total number of sentences and the total number of reviews, the total number of cases where you had made recommendations to the commanding officer—

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. That is other than he approved, you mean. Senator?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes. That would include the total number of approvals, the total number of those sent back to the commanding officer and the total number of cases where the commanding officer followed your advice. Can not that be put in the record?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I think we can put that in the record, yes, sir.

I can put in a table giving the figures from October 1, 1917, to August 31, 1919, prepared by Col. Dinsmore.

I may say that during the first six months of the war no accurate records were kept covering these matters, so that it is impossible to give statistics for that early period of the war without having an examination made of all the original records for that six months in our office and the corresponding records in The Adjutant General's office. The table is as follows:

	Number of cases examined in Judge Advocate General's Office during period covered (Oct. 1, 1917, to Aug. 31, 1919).	Number of cases in which recommendations for modification or disapproval of sentence on legal grounds were made.	Recommendations given effect.	Per cent of total number of cases in which recommendations were made.	Recommendations not given effect.	Per cent of total number of cases in which recommendations were made.	Per cent of total number of cases examined.
To reviewing authority....	28,463	275	271	98.54	4	1.46	0.00014
To War Department.....		182	176	96.70	6	3.30	.00021

Then, continuing a little further with my comparison of the composition of the court, which was what I started out to make, I think I have told how the judges of the French court are constituted. There is attached to the court an officer corresponding somewhat roughly to our trial judge advocate. They call him the "commissaire du gouvernement."

Senator WARREN. You are going back to about where you were yesterday?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes. In the territorial courts, that is, the courts in use in the armies not in active service, the commissaire receives from the reporter or rapporteur the report of the preliminary investigation. He advises the commanding general whether the case should be referred for trial. If it is referred for trial he acts as the prosecutor before the court and also as the legal adviser to the court. He is supposed to be the minister of justice—or to represent the minister of justice—before the court. The commissaire du gouvernement is an officer in the army, and the only requirement is that he be an officer of field rank and be at least 25 years of age.

Senator WARREN. Their field rank is relatively about the same as ours?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The same as ours—colonel, lieutenant colonel, commandant, who is the same as major. There is no requirement that he be a lawyer. In practice he sometimes is, and he sometimes is not, a lawyer. As it happened last May when I had occasion to look it up in Paris—six courts were running in Paris, with six commissaires du gouvernement, and exactly half those men were lawyers and the other half were not men of legal training—three lawyers and three who were not lawyers. I was told an effort had been made during the war to get lawyers so far as possible for those positions. But it had not always been possible to do it. Before the war it was almost always a regular army officer who did the work. The position carries with it the same double responsibility as that of our judge advocate does; that is, he is both prosecutor and adviser to the court.

It might be well to say there, in connection with the method of trial, of course the French procedure is a great deal more rapid than ours. It can be so, because they have the preliminary investigation conducted, where there is one—and there always must be one in the territorial armies, although not always when in active service—by this officer, the rapporteur, who investigates the charges, questions the accused, and makes a report of the testimony of each witness; and the court at the trial sits rather in the position of an American equity judge or chancellor hearing a case on objections to a master's report, than like our court. In other words, their court does not sit primarily to listen to witnesses and get at the facts—that is supposed to have been done by the rapporteur—but sits primarily for the purpose of applying the law to the facts which the rapporteur has gathered up. Some witnesses may be called, but usually not nearly all of them; and they may go ahead without even a single witness in court. If the commissaire has called a witness or two witnesses and they are not there for any reason, the court may direct adjournment until they can come; or the president of the court may direct that their evidence as contained in the rapporteur's report be read; and they may even go so far, as I was told by two of the commissaires du gouvernement, whom I really cross-examined on that question, that they can try a man and even condemn him to death without even a single witness appearing in open court against him, by simply reading to the court the testimony that was taken by the rapporteur.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You would not advocate such a system?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I certainly would not, sir. I am simply giving you a comparative view, as I got it, of the French method of trial. Of course, their belief is that the men are wholly protected by their method of investigation by the rapporteur. They have the plan of what they call "confrontation of witnesses" in the course of that preliminary investigation. The accused is permitted to have counsel at the preliminary investigation.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Before the charge is preferred?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Before the charge is referred to the court for trial. When it is first preferred, the commanding general, if he thinks it is worth investigating, refers it to this rapporteur to investigate, and the rapporteur must give the accused an opportunity to have counsel present at the last hearing, and the first hearing. He may see him in between times, without the counsel. If he finds a witness who contradicts the statements of the accused, he must confront the accused with the witness, and they thresh it all out in that way; so that, as I said, the nearest analogy that we have, that I know of, is the hearing before a master in chancery, and then the trial in court on objections to the master's report—assuming that the chan cellor had power to call witnesses if he chose to in his discretion—and you have pretty nearly a picture of the French trial.

In the Belgian Army they have a court composed of five judges. They call it the “conseil de guerre,” the same term the French use. They have but the one court. That court is composed of one civilian, and four military officers.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. What is the function of the civilian?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. He is president of the court. He is appointed by the king for three years. He must be a doctor of laws. He must have had at least 10 years' experience as a judge of a civilian court, in order to be eligible.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He sits in the trial and participates in the sentence?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes, sir; he is president of the court, and he occupies a very important position. He is the permanent member of the court. The military members, four officers, are appointed by roster for periods of one month. At the end of every month there is a change, the theory being apparently that the military officers should be kept in close touch with the army itself. The permanent civilian judge sits there to get the legal element into the court. They do not have any noncommissioned officers nor any enlisted men on the court. They have four officers temporarily appointed, and the one president, a permanent civilian judge, who sits in his robe of office, in the way they do over there, formally; and there is a great deal of formality about the Belgian court. The one in Brussels sits in the Palace of Justice, in as fine a courtroom as perhaps there is anywhere, and there is a great deal of formality about it all.

Then, corresponding to our trial judge advocate, they have what they call the “auditeur militaire.” He again has the double function of adviser to the court and of prosecutor.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Is he a civilian?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. He is a civilian, and is appointed by the king for three years, and must be a lawyer. He occupies a really more powerful position than that of the French commissaire du gouvernement, because he is also the chairman of what they call the “judiciary commission” which makes the preliminary investigation. This preliminary investigation is always made by this judiciary commission composed of three men.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Does that court have to do only with commissioned officers?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. The trial court, the conseil de guerre?

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. It tries everything.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Of course their army is smaller and their territory is much smaller than ours.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes.

Now, I was just going to add that their preliminary examination is by the judiciary commission of three members, composed of this same civilian “auditeur militaire,” with two officers of the army to assist him; and of course he is in an advantageous position if the case is referred to trial and he appears as prosecutor at the trial.

Summing those up and comparing them with what to my mind are the outstanding features of Senate bill 64:

In the first place as to the position of the judge advocate: Senate bill 64 provides that the judge advocate shall organize the court. He really is to appoint the court from the panel. I do not find any such power given to any corresponding officer, or to any legal officer, in either of the other systems that I mentioned; nor, I may say, in any other system of which I have knowledge. I have some knowledge of the Italian, the Swiss, the Netherlands, the Norwegian, and the Swedish systems, and there is no such power in any of those systems given to any legal officer or to any subordinate officer, by which I mean staff officer subordinate to the appointing authority.

Then, second, as to the provision of Senate bill 64, that the rulings of the judge advocate as to matters of law shall govern the court. There is no such power as that in the corresponding legal officer either in Great Britain, France, or Belgium, or in any that I know of.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In effect it is the same, though, according to your testimony of yesterday. The judge advocate of the court of Great Britain advises the court as to the law and eventually sums up the evidence, and if the court departs from his view of the law it does it at its peril, and only departs from it in cases of emergency.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. At their peril is putting it a little more strongly than the wording of section 103 (F) of their rules of procedure warrants; but that is, in effect, not far from true. To my mind this is the vital difference; that, after all, the power of decision in all of those systems is left with the court.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; that is true, Colonel, but here in the Federal court, where the judge has the power to comment both on the law and the evidence, if the jury does not follow his view the court can set aside the verdict.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. To my mind the difference is largely that, to come to the civilian courts, between the Federal courts of which you speak, and the courts of some States, for instance, of Illinois, where by statute the jury in criminal cases are made the judges of the law as well as of the facts, and where the court in instructing them has to say to them, "Gentlemen, I have told you my view of the law, but you have the right, if you see fit, to disregard my view," and once in a while the jury will do that.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is practically the way it is in the British court, and if the court disregards the instructions or the views of the judge advocate over there they are held in frequent cases in damages.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. No; but, to put it accurately, as I remember, if a damage suit is brought, and they are able to show in defense that they acted in reliance on the advice of the judge advocate, that is a substantial defense. If they are not able to show that, then it is neither one thing nor the other; it is open for the plaintiff to prove his case if he can.

But that is, as I view it, the vital difference on that between Senate bill 64 and all of those other systems, for those systems all provide that the legal officer attached to the court is merely an adviser, however much the court may in practice be expected to follow his advice. The court have the power to judge for themselves—to accept or reject his advice—whereas Senate bill 64 makes them bound by his directions.

Then, third, Senate bill 64 provides that the judge advocate of the court, the trial judge advocate, shall have the power to approve in whole or in part the findings of the court; and that carries with it, I think necessarily, the correlative power to disapprove the findings of the court. In other words, the judge advocate is to become really the reviewing authority for the court; and is not to be limited to reviewing matters of law, but may review questions of fact, and may really substitute his opinion for that of the court, so that in effect the court become simply advisers to the judge advocate. Now, I do not find any such power given to any legal officer in any of the other systems which I have examined or of which I have any knowledge whatever.

Then, fourth, Senate bill 64 further provides that the court shall not impose sentence in any case where there is a judge advocate—that is, the special court or the general court—but that the sentence shall be imposed by the judge advocate. That, again, is not provided in any of the systems of those other armies, nor in any system of which I have any knowledge; and I may say that, so far as I gather views and opinions, that would seem to be opposed to the general current of opinion, even among those who believe that the question of the guilt or innocence of the accused is to be judged as a question of law, or even pure law, or by lawyers. Most men with whom I have talked—even those who hold those views—seem to think that even then the quantum of the sentence is the thing to be determined, if any part of it is to be determined at all, by the military men, because the quantum of the punishment is a matter directly affecting discipline and of which the military men—if they are to be allowed to judge of anything at all—are in the best position to judge. At any rate, there is nothing corresponding to that provision in any of the other systems. It seems to be an entirely new plan proposed in this bill.

Then, fifth, the power given by Senate bill 64 to the judge advocate, the trial judge advocate of the court, to suspend the sentence which he has imposed and to suspend it either in whole or in part, except, I think, in death sentences or in sentences of dismissal of an officer, is different from anything in any of the other systems or in any system of which I have knowledge. No such power is given to a legal officer or adviser of the court or to any staff officer or legal officer in any system with which I am familiar to thus suspend the sentence of the court.

As I look at it, Senate bill 64 would make the proposed judge advocate really an autocrat. The court become simply the advisers to him; and there is no authority above him that can in any way affect his decisions. There is no power of review in the commanding officer, or the commanding general, or in any other military authority, even in the President; and the power of review given, in the case of special courts, to the judge advocate—the staff judge advocate—and in the case of general courts to the military court of appeals is stated in articles 39 and 52 to be a review on questions of law only. If that be the case, and if article 52 is to be construed in that way, then the trial judge advocate becomes really the sole arbiter of questions of fact. He really tries the case, and becomes the officer responsible, so far as discipline is enforced through the courts, for the discipline of the command, and subject to no higher authority whatever. There is some language used in article 52, in the latter part of it, providing for the court of military appeals' power [reading]:

To disapprove a finding of guilty and approve only so much of a finding of guilty of a particular offense as involves a finding of guilty of a lesser included offense.

To disapprove the whole or any part of a sentence.

Some provisions here that, in practically carrying them out, would almost require the consideration of questions of errors of fact. But I am assuming that the intent of the proposed bill is to provide for a review of errors of law only; and that, if there is any question about that, the bill could be amended to make that clear.

To sum it all up, I do not find any officer in any foreign system given any such broad powers as are proposed for this trial judge advocate.

Senator WARREN. You give your opinion that this proposed system is better than or not as good as those of the countries with which you have compared it, do you?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Why, for whatever my opinion may be worth, as a result of my examination of this bill and of my investigations of the other systems, it seems to me that the proposed system is not nearly as good as those of the other armies or as our own.

It seems to me, to begin with, that it is wholly experimental, and is going very far in the way of experiment, and with a very important subject, in taking away the control of the courts-martial from the commanding officer and placing them absolutely in the power—and the autocratic power, really—of a civilian; because, in effect, that is what is done. The trial judge advocate is to be a member of the Judge Advocate General's Department, if available, or otherwise to be a man recommended by the Judge Advocate General because of legal qualifications, not required necessarily to have had any military training or any special military qualifications, and is to be, really, a civilian, although wearing a uniform; and he is a subordinate officer.

Take, for instance, if the American Army should find itself some time in the position of the British during the retreat from Mons. and if it became necessary to try a man for desertion in the face of the enemy, like that man was tried by the British in the case in which the transcript of the trial was introduced here yesterday. The responsibility for determining whether it was necessary to shoot that man instantly for the purposes of discipline, or whether he should be allowed to go, would be in the hands of this civilian. instead of in the hands of the commander of the division or of the Commander in Chief of the Army; and no matter how important it appeared to the general commanding that a guilty man should be punished, and punished promptly, if the judge advocate did not coincide with that view, the judge advocate's view would be the determining factor; he would have to take the responsibility of determining what punishment should be used in enforcing discipline in the Army, even under the most strenuous circumstances. It seems to me that it is certainly dangerous, without the experience of any other army anywhere in the world to guide us, to go so far as that in taking that power away from the responsible commanding officers and putting it into the hands of a junior, who is purely a legal officer, practically a civilian.

Now, sixth, as to the provision in the same section of Senate bill 64 that noncommissioned officers and privates shall sit on the court. I may say that I do not suppose from reading this bill that it was really contemplated that more than three enlisted men, privates or noncommissioned officers, should sit on the general court, or more than one on the special court; and yet, really, as I read the language of the bill, there is nothing to prevent the trial judge advocate, if he saw fit to do so, in organizing the court, from putting eight privates on the general court, and three privates on the special court, or any number of privates or noncommissioned officers, at all. In other words, it is wholly in his discretion; except that he can not put more than five officers on the general court, or more than two officers on the special court except where the accused is an officer. Article 4 makes soldiers equally competent with officers to sit on the court. And while article 5 provides that three members of the court shall be privates in the case of the trial of a private, and three of them noncommissioned officers in the case of the trial of a noncommissioned officer, there is nothing there to say that there shall not be more than three privates or noncommissioned officers on the court in any case.

Senator WARREN. You take the ground that while it restricts the number of commissioned officers, it does not restrict the number of privates and noncommissioned officers?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. That is the way I read it. I do not suppose that was the intention in drafting the bill, Senator. The context does not seem to imply that.

Senator WARREN. It had not occurred to me in reading it.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I think it would bear that construction. I do not think there is anything to prevent the trial judge advocate, if he wanted to so constitute the court, from doing it. For instance, he might choose eight privates to try their captain.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. That is article 52?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. No, sir; articles 4, 5, and 6, Senator. But in any event it provides for three privates for the trial of a private in a general court; and I do not find any such provision, either in the French or the Belgian or the British systems.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You mean such an exact provision? They do have enlisted men on some of these courts?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. I was speaking of a private soldier. There is no provision for a private soldier on the British, Belgian, or French courts; and there is no provision for a noncommissioned officer on the Belgian or the British courts. There is a provision for one noncommissioned officer in the French court, but only one, and as I said yesterday, the trend of opinion seems to be against increasing the number, while they do think favorably of their present plan of having one noncommissioned officer on the court in France. But he is usually, in practice, of the highest noncommissioned grade.

And just in passing for a moment, I might say that you will find in Gen. Childs's statement, which I have put in, of England, his opinion as to having private soldiers or noncommissioned officers on the courts; he is against it for the English Army. I may add that I meant to say yesterday in my testimony—I have never read the statutes myself, but I have a compilation made by one of our officers in France—that during the French Revolution they did experiment with having private soldiers on the courts. They instituted a court which was practically a jury; but Napoleon I, as soon as he came into power, abolished it. Now, further than that, I do not know about that experiment, nor just why Napoleon abolished it; but he apparently did, as soon as he gained control of the army.

Senator WARREN. Is there a record showing that it was ever attempted in this country, or in any of the others that you know of, except as you have related?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. Yes, Senator, I have a list of some of the other countries. In Holland they do not do it. They have one civilian and four officers on their court, very much like Belgium. In Switzerland they do have a court of seven members, all of them appointed for three years by the Federal Council. One of those men is a lawyer, a member of the Judicial Section of the General Staff, which corresponds pretty closely to our Judge Advocate General's department. He is the president and must be an officer of field rank. Three other members of the court are officers; and the other three are either non-commissioned officers or privates. That was introduced by the law of 1889 into the Swiss system. I think it would be very interesting to know how that worked out, through their long mobilization during the war. I was unable to get to Switzerland; and I do not know anything about it; and only know from reading their laws that Switzerland has experimented, during the last century, a great deal with her courts. They tried at one time in 1851 a jury of eight jurors with three judges; and they have made, during the last century, quite a number of changes. They never seem to get anything to satisfy them; and how it worked, I do not know.

Senator WARREN. In the meantime, they have not been in actual war.

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. They have never been in actual war during the century, that I know of, Senator; and the great difference between their plan, you see, and the plan proposed in Senate bill 64, is that their judges of that court are all appointed for three years, and are appointed by the Federal Council of the Republic.

Now, I can understand, as it seems to me, that you can pick out three men from the enlisted ranks, experienced noncommissioned officers, or perhaps an experienced private, and make him a permanent judge, appoint him for three years, and give him a feeling of responsibility, practically such as an officer has. You separate him in that way from the ordinary body of the enlisted personnel. It is not, as it seems to me, quite the same as temporarily taking a soldier who may to-morrow go back among his tent mates, and be ostracized perhaps if he has voted in an unpopular way on the court to which he was temporarily assigned. I think the Swiss court really has, in that, a very different factor introduced; but, as I say, I do not know how it works.

Senator WARREN. From all that, I understand that you do not recommend the use of privates and noncommissioned officers in courts-martial?

Lieut. Col. RIGBY. No, sir; I see no reason for doing so, from what I know. And from what I have heard during my service, I have not got the impression that there is any great demand for it in our
